German artist's work is a search for identity

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A current exhibit of photographs and paintings by a German artist confronts the pain and shame of the Holocaust, which she says was hidden from her by both her German and her Jewish grandmothers.

Titled Remembrance and Reconstruction, the exhibition by Susanne Palme-Waldemer, part of Holocaust Education Week, runs until Nov. 29 at Holy Blossom Temple.

Palme-Waldemer, whose mother is German-Jewish and whose father is German-Catholic, said her paintings are a search for identity.

In Toronto for the opening, she told The CJN that the pictures are also a memorial to the Jewish members of her family, whose lives she learned of in her childhood through whispered comments.

"I now know that I was caught, so to speak, in the German-Jewish trap," Palme-Waldemer said. Her mother, she said, ran a Catholic home.

"My German family endeavoured, with a special kind of blind energy, to repress its deeply felt sense of collective and personal guilt."

She added that this was combined with a desperate attempt to make things better.

"My mother likes to look into the future, not the past, because it hurts to remember."

Palme-Waldemer's Jewish grandmother left Germany in 1938 and spent 24 years in Belgium before returning.

"My mother and grandmother wouldn't really have been able to return to Germany to live if they hadn't somehow managed to inwardly numb their memories of persecution," Palme-Waldemer said.

Susanne Palme-Waldemer

A photograph of her Jewish great-uncle's Venetian honeymoon in the 1920s (taken with his sister, Palme-Waldemer's grandmother), along with his last letter to the family from Theresienstadt before he was deported to Auschwitz, inspired the paintings in the exhibit.

The artist lives with her husband and teenage daughters in Feldafing, a small village in Bavaria south of Munich, where there was a camp during the war. She and many in her generation ask questions about what happened at the time, she said.

"There are still bad elements in Germany," she said.

Palme-Waldemer, who describes herself as a humanist with no religious identity, invites survivors to speak when she gives lectures about her experiences. Many people who attend ask questions, she said.

"I believe it is important to ask questions."

Dylan a Grammy contender

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Robert Allen Zimmerman is one of the most acclaimed singer/songwriters of the modern era, but he's never recorded under his birth name.

That's because the 60-year-old musician changed his name to Bob Dylan in the early 1960s as he launched a legendary career that would see him inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1988.

The Duluth, Minn. native was born and raised in a Jewish family. But after considering moving to a kibbutz in the early 1970s, he converted to Christianity by the end of the decade.

It was reported in 1983 that he had joined a religious Jewish sect and was studying with Lubavitch Chassidim. There has been some debate as to whether or not Dylan is still a Christian, but both the Jewish and Christian bibles have always influenced – and continue to inform – his writing.

Dylan has resisted questions about his personal life and the meaning of particular lines or songs, leaving everyone guessing about who and what he represents. And he's not doing any press interviews on his current Love and Theft tour, which brings him to the Air Canada Centre Nov. 8.

But a few months ago he told the Los Angeles Times that a lot of his songs have been "misrepresented by people who didn't know any better, and it goes on today."

Dylan's 43rd album, which received five stars in a Rolling Stone review, is being touted as a contender for Album of the Year at the Grammys. It has a little bit of everything, including a lot of humour and spirit.

Dylan's first album of new music since his Grammy-award-winning Time Out Of Mind four years ago, Love and Theft is more blues-based than the one that won him Album of the Year, Best Contemporary Folk Album, and Best Male Rock Vocal Performance.

He went on to win an Oscar and a Golden Globe Award for best original song earlier in 1997 for Things Have Changed, his contribution to the Wonder Boys soundtrack.

Dylan is said to be working on his autobiography, entitled Chronicles.

New shlichah does double duty

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rotem Ayalon traces her interest in working with young people and in the field of education to her mother, a physical education teacher.

"All the kids find themselves in my parents' house talking with my mother about all kinds of issues," said the new shlichah, who splits her time between the Habonim Dror Zionist Youth Movement (and its affiliate Na'amat Canada) and the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario (RJCO).

Rotem Ayalon

Ayalon – who has a BA in European and Far Eastern History from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and is working on her master's thesis on Women in Modern Japan – has been spending much of her time since she began her term of shlichut at the beginning of September discussing Jewish issues. "I love working with people," she said.

When she was interviewed at the Habonim Dror office last week, Ayalon, 31, had already visited Barrie, St. Catharines, Kingston and Oshawa in her capacity as RJCO shlichah. In that role, she is dealing mostly with adult education.

In Kingston, however, she worked on a new parent-teen program covering issues related to Jewish values and Israel. Most of the communities in RJCO's purview will also be running the program, she said. (There are 26 "regional" or unfederated communities in Ontario. Their umbrella, RJCO, is a partnership between Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region and UIA Federations Canada.)

The partnership between Habonim Dror/Na'amat and RJCO is new. Ayalon's predecessor, Shiri Achiasov, split her time between the youth movement and the Jewish Student Federation at York University.

In Toronto – and in Hamilton and Ottawa, where the organization also has chapters – Ayalon is working to revitalize Habonim Dror's local activities for students from Grade 2 to 8. The left-wing Labour Zionist youth movement holds large-scale events and monthly chapter activities during the year, but its main focus is its kibbutz-style summer camp, Camp Gesher, which serves approximately 150 campers per session and for which Ayalon will serve as educational director.

The movement also has a shlichah in Vancouver and a summer camp, Camp Miriam, in British Columbia.

In Israel, where Ayalon grew up on a moshav near Hadera and as part of Habonim Dror's Israeli counterpart HaNoar Hoeved V'Halomed, the focus is on twice-weekly meetings, she noted. "But there is nothing big like a summer camp." Israeli members may attend camp for anywhere from one to three weeks, she said.

As shlichah, Ayalon is "trying to build monthly activities," she said. The opening event in Toronto focused on world hunger. About 40 children and seven counsellors took part in food-related activities and a discussion on hunger. They also collected food that was donated to a local shelter.

Older students recently participated in a retreat on peace and conflict, and are now working on a memorial for slain Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, to be held Nov. 11 at the Borochov Centre. The event is being organized jointly by Habonim Dror, Hashomer Hatzair, Bnei Akiva and BBYO.

"What I like is that teens [planned] the program," said Ayalon. "They chose which songs they will sing, which poems to read. They wrote something in the name of youth." Maya Goldenberg, a Tel Aviv University political science professor who used to work with Rabin, will speak at the memorial. She is currently on sabbatical at York University.

Before coming here on shlichut, Ayalon spent seven years working for the Jewish Agency in the area of youth education. Most recently she was director of Machon Masa Student Leadership and Activism Training, an enrichment program for English-speaking university students from overseas.

Hapoel Tel Aviv advances after stunning Chelsea—again

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Hapoel Tel Aviv last week recorded one of the greatest shocks ever in European soccer, eliminating English Premier League side Chelsea from the second round of the UEFA Cup on their home ground. With the upset, Hapoel becomes the first Israeli team to reach the third round of UEFA Cup competition.

Coach Dror Kashtan's players forced a 1-1 draw on Claudio Ranieri's multi-million dollar collection of international stars in the second leg of their second round match. The Reds from Tel Aviv progressed to the third round, 3-1 on aggregate, thanks to their 2-0 victory in Tel Aviv three weeks ago.

Every Hapoel player gave a performance worthy of Chelsea's famous stadium and none more so than goalkeeper Shavit Elimelech. The 30-year-old made over a dozen world class saves, keeping Chelsea's most prolific strikers, Jimmy-Floyd Hasselbaink and Eidur Gudjohnsen, at bay time after time.

Chelsea's budget 20 times larger than Hapoel's

Slovakian striker Milan Ostrec gave Hapoel a 1-0 lead in the 36th minute after Chelsea had dominated the early possession but failed to score. It was Hapoel's first shot on goal after Chelsea had had at least a half dozen.

Ostrec scored from 15 yards after he broke in across the 18-yard line and then chipped the ball in behind goalkeeper Mark Bosnich.

Substitute Gianfranco Zola made it 1-1 in the 64th minute with a 20-yard shot that gave the Blues a glimmer of hope. Zola had a point-blank shot in the 86th, but Elimelech saved bravely at the Italian's feet.

Chelsea dominated in the second half and had one shot bounce off the goal post and another header go just high. With Chelsea gambling on offence, Ostrec nearly scored again in the 59th minute as Bosnich made a diving save.

The loss is a major embarrassment for the west London club, which is reported to have a budget 20 times larger than Hapoel's. Last year Chelsea was knocked out in the first round.

"There was a lot of pressure on us and it was as tough as we knew it would be," said Hapoel's Shimon Gershon. "Shavit [Elimelech] was fantastic and we made our own luck. We made history here tonight and I am delighted for everyone at home. After the disappointment of the national team last week, we were all devastated and I just hoped that we could do something at Chelsea."

"These two games have brought a smile back to the face of Israeli soccer. The fact that an Israeli team is in the third round of the UEFA Cup speaks volumes. I am proud of my players. They gave a whole nation something to be proud of," Kashtan said.

Chelsea boss made crude remarks about Israelis

By ELI SHVIDLER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A scandal hit English soccer last week with a report by the London-based tabloid the Daily Mirror that Chelsea chair Ken Bates made remarks that could be construed as anti-Semitic.

Bates was commenting on Hapoel Tel Aviv supporters who were attempting to buy cheap tickets to the UEFA Cup game at Stamford Bridge in which Hapoel eliminated Chelsea – tickets that were allocated to the home-team supporters.

"I know Hapoel fans in London have been trying to purchase cheaper tickets that have been set aside for the Chelsea supporters. We know the Israelis – they will always look to get a discount," Bates was quoted as saying.

A leading spokesperson for Jewish organizations in Britain, who asked not to be identified, told the Mirror that "Bates is a dangerous man.

"It is very sad that somebody who holds such a high position in English sport should say such hurtful things, which show a prejudice against the Jews," the spokesperson said.

"The stereotype of the miserly Jew is an ancient anti-Semitic notion, and [the comment] is particularly serious as Chelsea, like other major London clubs, has so many Jewish supporters," he continued.

"The Chelsea chairman lacks tact and diplomacy and it taints the reputation of a man who represents a popular football club," the spokesperson said, adding that Bates' remark was a slight on the entire Jewish community in England.

Hapoel Tel Aviv chair Moshe Teomim's response was more reserved. "I know our supporters, they always pay full price for their tickets," he said. "More importantly, we have to be focused on the task ahead: to beat Chelsea and prove we are a valuable outfit despite the fact the worth of all Chelsea's players is 200 million pounds – 60 times more than Hapoel."

Hapoel's management remained in London a day longer than the players to meet with members of the Jewish community. Teomim said Hapoel had been "swamped with requests" from people who had wanted to come to the game, adding he wished the team could have satisfied them all.

Maccabi TA out of UEFA Cup despite 2-1 win over Roda

TEL AVIV — Maccabi Tel Aviv defeated Dutch team Roda JC Kerkrade 2-1 in a return match last week at the Blumfield Stadium in Tel Aviv in the second round of the UEFA Cup. Despite the victory, Maccabi was eliminated from the tournament after a 4-1 loss in the first game in Holland three weeks ago, making the aggregate final score 5-3 for the Dutch team.

Maccabi fell behind quickly, with Roda scoring in the fifth minute of the game. The Israeli team had hoped for a quick goal in order to achieve the 3-0 aggregate away score it needed to reach the next round, but Roda scored from its first dangerous offensive strike. Nigerian Garbaya Lowell took the ball just outside the penalty area and put it in the net with a strong and accurate kick.

Despite the evident shock to the Israelis, the game was evenly played from then on, each side rarely having any opportunities near the goal.

Rodrigo Goldberg broke through Roda's crowded defence in the 38th minute, when he passed the ball to Eli Biton who faced the Dutch goalkeeper one-on-one before equalizing.

The goal awakened Maccabi, whose players began to exert heavy pressure on the Roda goal, but lack of accuracy inside the penalty area by Goldberg and Avi Nimni prevented Maccabi from taking the lead.

Maccabi continued to apply the pressure at the start of the second half. Maccabi scored in the 57th minute following an incident in which Nimni was brought down as he broke into the penalty area, although it did not result in a penalty.

Another spurious claim

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

News item: A gay couple from Israel is seeking refugee status in Canada, claiming they were subjected to persecution and harassment while living in the Jewish state.

The Western Jewish Bulletin reports that Steven and Derick RodRozen (they combined surnames upon becoming partners) are settling in nicely in Vancouver, where they are seeking asylum from the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB), having been forced, they contend, to flee Israel because they could stand the discrimination no longer.

Israel is blue in the face saying that, as a vibrant democracy, it does not produce refugees. Ottawa seems to be getting the message: Last year, the IRB granted asylum – based on claimants' "well-founded fear of persecution" should they be sent back – to just 16 Israelis, the lowest total in years. But these were probably former Soviets, with their own spurious tales of oppression in Israel, who use the Law of Return to springboard to Canada.

The RodRozens claim they were evicted from two Tel Aviv apartments. Derick says he was fired from his job, while Steven says he was physically attacked on the street – all because they are gay. Both men were active in Israel's gay community, and made waves through their highly publicized wedding, thought to be the first of its kind in Israel (police had to provide security).

The men decided not to pursue their grievances through the courts, but to quit the country. I wonder how their compatriots in the gay and lesbian movement, which has achieved so much in the face of adversity and won so many hard-fought battles, feel now that two of their own have turned tail.

Here's what galls me: Gays, lesbians, bisexuals and the transgendered have made advances in Israel that are nothing short of miraculous, especially when one considers that a sizeable chunk of the populace won't budge from the belief that homosexuality is an abomination, a sin and a disease, and won't even hear of equality or talk of rights.

A quick Internet search yields the following: In 1988, references to homosexual activities were excised from Israel's sexual offences code. In '92, the Knesset passed a law banning workplace discrimination based on sexual orientation. In '93, with the active support of Yitzhak Rabin, no less, the ban on gays serving openly in the IDF was lifted (a recent court ruling has accepted the principle that gay partners of fallen IDF fighters should be recognized at official memorial services). In '94, a high court ordered El Al to extend employee benefits to same-sex partners. In '97, the Knesset amended the country's libel laws prohibiting defamation on grounds of sexual preference.

Israel boasts at least 17 organizations and web sites for gay adults and students; AIDS/HIV awareness is high; there are gay pride parades, newspapers and magazines, film festivals, legal assistance funds, and telephone hotlines. All in the Middle East!

Steve RodRozen says Israel's anti-discrimination laws are "on paper but in real life, there are ways around it." They're on paper too in the United States, but that didn't prevent the brutal beating death of Matthew Shepard because he was gay. Does that mean the U.S. produces refugees? In this country, police reports that document hate crimes show consistent attacks based on sexual orientation. Does that mean Canada produces refugees? Does any enlightened Western democracy in which gays invariably face discrimination?

That's not to say homosexuals in Israel have it easy. They don't have it easy anywhere.

People leave Israel all the time, and my heart goes out to the RodRozens. But allowing them to stay in Canada as refugees – those who truly require our protection – would be a mockery of justice.

About Parenting

Rebecca Katz

Dear Rebecca,

My husband and I send our seven-year-old child to a Conservative Hebrew day school because it is close to our house and we want him to have a Jewish education. Lately, he has complained that we are not "Jewish enough" in our home. He questions why we do not keep a kosher kitchen or attend shul on Shabbat. We are members of a Reform synagogue and are comfortable with our degree of observance yet uncertain of how to address our child's concerns.

Confused

Dear Confused,

I once attended an orientation at a Jewish day school and one of the teachers told a story of a young boy who adored wearing tzitzit. His family considered themselves Reform Jews. The boy wanted to wear tzitzit at home but his mother was uncomfortable with the idea. The boy told his mother that at school he learned all levels of observance should be treated with respect and therefore he should be allowed to wear tzitzit in the home just as she has the freedom to wear the garments she chooses.

I think the little boy's appeal to respect each other's interests in Judaic customs and observance would be a good lesson to teach your child and follow yourselves.

Perhaps there is a way you could satisfy your son's desire for more Jewish exposure and customs in the home without compromising your comfort level with your own observance. For example, try incorporating some Jewish customs into your lives that may interest your child and include the whole family.

Your son's teacher or the spiritual leader of your synagogue could offer advice on how to address his concerns as well.

Readers may submit questions or comments to Rebecca Katz at rtkatz@hotmail.com. But she is not a professional, and her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, please consult a professional

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

Message to our community from the President and CEO, Joseph Mapa

Joseph Mapa, President and CEO, Mount Sinai Hospital

On behalf of our hospital community, I extend our heartfelt condolences to all those who have been affected by recent horrible events.

We are experiencing a very anxious time and, understandably, many of us have concerns with recent news stories about anthrax and other biohazards. We have been receiving inquiries from staff, patients, and the public. We are fortunate to have the guidance of our own Drs. Donald Low and Allison McGeer who are international experts on anthrax and infectious diseases. Drs. Low and McGeer have provided some in-depth background on anthrax. In service to the community, we welcome you to visit our website at http://microbiology.mtsinai.on.ca to obtain advice, information, education, and frequently asked questions and answers.

Yours truly,

Capital Gains Tax Savings Extended

On October 12, 2001, Paul Martin, Minister of Finance, announced that he would be permanently extending the capital gains tax program.

The federal government continued the reduced rate for all capital gains of 50 per cent thus automatically decreasing the inclusion rate for direct donations of publicly traded securities to 25 per cent.

On September 27, Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation President Nicholas Offord participated in a deposition before the Standing Committee on Finance in Ottawa to press for the continuation of the tax-saving incentive. In his role as Vice Chair of the Association of Fundraising Professionals (AFP), Mr. Offord reported "Many important projects will only get done if we can access the tremendous wealth of Canadians that is invested in the market."

Donors may direct gifts of securities such as stocks, bonds, GICs or mutual funds to support a particular pledge or endowment or to serve as valuable unrestricted gifts to support our hospital's most urgent needs.

To learn more about donating gifts of securities, contact the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto at (416) 586-8203.

What you should know about diabetes

Diabetes has been described as 'the epidemic of the new millennium' with rates increasing rapidly in North America and around the world. To find out more about this disease and what we should know about it, we interviewed Dr. Bernard Zinman, Director of the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes at Mount Sinai Hospital and Professor of Medicine at the University of Toronto.

Q. Dr. Zinman, can you tell us what is the best way to diagnose diabetes?

A. Diabetes can be diagnosed through a routine blood test. People 45 or older and/or with high blood pressure, should ask their doctor for a diabetes blood test every three years.

Q. If I am diagnosed with diabetes, what should I do?

A. The key to controlling diabetes is to take it seriously. It is very important to develop an individualized program of care with your health care team so that you can achieve excellent blood sugar control through a combination of a well balanced diet, exercise, and medication.

Q. If I have been diagnosed with diabetes, what should I consider before starting an exercise program?

A. Before beginning any new exercise program, ask your doctor:

- how to check your heart rate?
- if you need to adjust your medication and/or food before exercising?
- what kind of sugar you should carry with you?

and you should stop exercising if you develop chest pain or have shortness of breath or if your blood sugar dips too low.

Q. As a diabetic, how do I maintain a healthy diet?

A. It is important to eat a variety of foods from each food group in portion sizes that help achieve/maintain a healthy weight. A dietitian can help you develop an individualized meal plan that includes the proper amounts of each food group.

Q. If you need to control your diabetes through medication, what types of therapy options are available?

A. Your health care team will determine the best treatment options right for you. Oral medications are available for use in Type 2 diabetes; however, many people require insulin to control their diabetes and insulin is a must for those with Type 1 diabetes. If left untreated, diabetes can cause serious complications. Working with your health care team, eating properly, exercising, quitting smoking, maintaining a healthy weight, and taking your medication will help you control your diabetes.

Dr. Paul Walfish wins 2001 Dr. Jonas Salk Prize!

Dr. Paul Walfish of Endocrinology has been selected as a co-winner of the 2001 Dr. Jonas Salk Prize. The award recognizes Dr. Walfish's pioneering work in the development of a newborn screening program for congenital hypothyroidism. This program allows doctors to treat mental and physical disabilities and even prevent them from developing in the first place.

The $10,000 award is co-sponsored by the March of Dimes and Aventis-Pasteur. It honours a Canadian scientist or physician who has made an outstanding contribution in science or medicine to the prevention, alleviation or elimination of a physical disability.

The award was presented to Dr. Walfish at the Paul Martin Sr. Society Dinner on October 24th by Dr. Salk's son, Dr. Darrell Salk.

Peres addresses GA

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

WASHINGTON — Israel's Foreign Minister, Shimon Peres, delivered a message of reassurance Sunday evening to the Jews of the United States.

"Some worry in your hearts about a misunderstanding between America and Israel. There is no reason for worry," Peres told an audience of more than 3,000 people, among whom were approximately 250 Canadians, at the Marriott Wardman Park Hotel.

Vatican commission over: Marrus

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An interfaith historians' commission charged with studying the role of the Vatican during the Holocaust has run its course, says Michael Marrus, one of its six members.

"My understanding is that our work is over," said Marrus, a professor of history and dean of graduate studies at the University of Toronto, as well as the author of The Holocaust in History and Vichy France and the Jews.

His comments came as two Jewish scholars on the panel resigned in frustration.

Robert Wistrich of Israel and Bernard Sucheky of Belgium tendered their resignations last week, several months after the Vatican effectively called off the probe.

Last summer, the Vatican blocked access to its unpublished documents relating to the period before and during the Holocaust.

By way of response, the Jewish and Roman Catholic historians suspended their activities, saying they could not maintain their credibility as impartial investigators unless the Vatican had a change of heart.

The resignations caught Marrus by surprise.

"I haven't see any resignation statement or letter," he said in an interview. "People do what they want to."

Michael Marrus

For now, Marrus has no intention of formally resigning. "I don't see the point. We suspended our work, and the Vatican hasn't got back to us. It's time to go on."

The panel was jointly established in 1999 by the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews and the International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations.

Consisting of an equal number of Jews and Catholics, the panelists were charged with reviewing 11 volumes of published Vatican records from World War II and raising questions about that material.

Last autumn, they released a report containing 47 "significant" questions about the policies and actions of Pope Pius XII – a controversial figure whom some historians claim was largely indifferent to Nazi Germany's persecution of Jews.

They also requested access to unpublished wartime Vatican archives.

In reaction to their request, Walter Cardinal Kaspar, the president of the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews, replied that an examination of post-1923 documents would be impossible.

Citing "technical reasons," he asked the historians to prepare a final report.

Rabbi Departs

CALGARY — After two years, Rabbi Jamie Korngold is leaving her job as spiritual leader of Temple B'nai Tikvah, and returning to Boulder, Colo., reports the Jewish Free Press of Calgary. The paper described Rabbi Korngold's tenure at the synagogue as "difficult" and "turbulent," marked by frequent clashes with the temple's board.

ISRAEL

Jobs Lost

JERUSALEM — Almost two percent of Israeli jobs have been lost due to the tourist slump. Israel's tourism ministry said tourism has dropped 50 percent in the first seven months of this year.

Shift in Tactics

JERUSALEM — Israel plans to rely less on large-scale military operations and more on "guerrilla" tactics, says Ra'anan Gissin, a spokesperson for Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. Gissin said Israel would resume using "guerrilla warfare" tactics against suspected Arab terrorists. "We'll rely more on intelligence," he said, adding that there will be more "pinpointed operations."

No Abductions

JERUSALEM — There were no state-sponsored abductions of Yemenite children in the 1950s, says a newly released report. Echoing the findings of earlier commissions, a panel headed by retired Supreme Court Justice Yehuda Cohen found the children died of various illnesses. Some members of the Yemenite community have long alleged that hundreds of their children who arrived in the early 1950s were kidnapped and sold to Ashkenazi families. The Jewish Agency is criticized in the latest report for not tracking infant deaths and providing burial information to parents.

Israeli Computer

JERUSALEM — Intel Corp. will develop its next generation computer in Israel. The new computer, to be unveiled in 2003, will be a notebook with always-on Internet connection via wireless communications that is also being developed in Israel. The notebook will be powered by a chip code-named Banias.

WORLD

Shul Opens

DRESDEN — Germany's annual commemoration of Kristallnacht had an uplifting side this year, as Dresden prepared to open the first new synagogue in the former East Germany. The building stands on the grounds of the original synagogue, one of hundreds destroyed during Kristallnacht. The dedication of the new synagogue, which has space for 300 worshippers, took place exactly 63 years after the original building was destroyed by Nazi arsonists.

Rabbi Dies

WASHINGTON — Rabbi Chaim Stern, the editor of Reform prayer books, including Gates of Prayer and Gates of Repentance, died Nov. 5 at 71. Rabbi Stern defined the liturgy of the Reform movement for over three decades. At a 1998 prayer breakfast for religious leaders, then U.S. president Bill Clinton used words written by the rabbi to apologize for Clinton's relationship with Monica Lewinsky.

Winning Programs

LOS ANGELES — Three Holocaust-related television programs won 2001 Emmy Awards last week. Anne Frank won for best miniseries, and Brian Cox won for best supporting actor in Nuremberg. The movie Conspiracy, about the Nazi decision to commit genocide against the Jews, garnered the best actor award for Kenneth Branagh and the writing award for Loring Mandel.

Children of Survivors

PRAGUE — Representatives of nine countries have founded the European Association of Jewish Child Survivors of the Holocaust. The Prague-based association's goals include establishing and developing ties with Holocaust victims groups in Eastern Europe, and staging cultural and social events for survivors. The founding countries are Britain, Croatia, the Czech Republic, Germany, Hungary, Italy, the Netherlands, Poland and Slovakia.

Polls Suggest Relations Are Strong

NEW YORK — Two recent polls suggest U.S.-Israel relations remain strong.

One indicates that American Jews feel a stronger attachment to Israel than they did before Sept. 11. The survey of 606 U.S. Jewish adults conducted by The Forward newspaper also shows that almost half say they are "more in touch" with their Jewish identity since the terror attacks.

The second poll shows Americans do not believe the U.S.-Israel relationship provoked the terrorist attacks. The survey, released by the Anti-Defamation League, shows 63 percent of Americans say the United States' close relationship with Israel had nothing to do with the attacks, while 22 percent think there was a connection.

The poll also showed that 48 percent of Americans support the Israeli position in the Middle East, compared with 11 percent for the Palestinian position. As well, the poll suggests 42 percent of Americans blame the current violence on the Palestinians, while 13 percent blame Israel.

CJC urges swift passage of anti-terrorism bill

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has heartily endorsed the federal government's proposed anti-terrorism law, just as Canadian Muslims and Arabs condemned it as "obscene."

Congress praised the government's "vigorous efforts," adding it is "gratified" by the bill's introduction. Bill C-36 should be passed and implemented "as soon as possible," CJC urged a Commons committee in Ottawa last week.

By contrast, officials representing Arab and Muslim groups slammed the bill as flawed, reflexive and overly simplistic, saying it would terrorize their law-abiding constituents.

The main argument by Arab and Muslim groups is that the bill would silence legitimate protest and grant excessive powers to law enforcement agencies.

"This bill is obscene," said Rocco Galati, a lawyer for the Canadian Islamic Congress. "You might as well delete the constitution from our landscape."

In their submission to the Commons' standing committee on justice and human rights, CJC representatives, while lauding the bill's overall intent, urged Ottawa to make changes that would provide "maximum" transparency in identifying terrorist organizations and protect the right to legitimate protest.

"It is terrorism, and not the measures taken to combat it, which represents the greatest threat to our human rights and cherished values of freedom and democracy," said Manuel Prutschi, CJC's national director of community relations.

But overall, Congress stated, the bill's strength is that it defines "terrorist activity" appropriately. The bill "recognizes both the domestic and international impact of terrorism."

CJC praised the proposed law because it rejects distinctions between "good" and "bad" terrorism, confirms the duty of governments to act by lawful means, and makes no distinction between civilians and military personnel as terrorism's victims.

However, Congress added, definitions need further clarification in order not "to cast the net so wide as to ensnare expressions of advocacy or workers' rights. Language should be added to ensure [the law] cannot be invoked even in the event of strikes and

Jewish education top priority at WJC plenary

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — How to confront the challenge of increasing anti-Semitism in the Muslim world was one of the main issues arising out of the 11th Plenary Assembly of the World Jewish Congress (WJC), says Keith Landy, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

"It is important to educate children and adults [so they can learn] to counter the lies and misconceptions that are pervasive," said Landy, one of 50 Canadians who attended the recent plenary.

Before Sept. 11, he said, few people knew about the Arab television station Al-Jazeera, which "spews forth anti-Semitic and anti-Israel propaganda across Africa and Asia.

"The only time North Americans became aware of it was when Osama bin Laden was given a platform. The Arab press is also filled with anti-Israel invectives on a daily basis."

Edgar Bronfman, 72, who was elected for his fifth five-year term as president of WJC is championing the revitalization of Jewish education, Landy said.

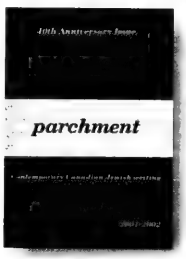
New Jewish writing

In a recent issue of the New York-based weekly newspaper the Forward, two of our age's pre-eminent Jewish writers and thinkers, Ruth Wisse and Cynthia Ozick, gave answers to the question, "What is a Jewish book?"

In characteristically forthright and laser-precise language, both offered starkly different responses, yet they also shared in those responses the notion that something unique and important is missing in Jewish writing and in Jewish writers in the United States. To paraphrase them simplistically, for Wisse it was an absence of Jewish values; for Ozick it was an absence of Judaism itself.

If "Jewish writing" means writing that, in some sense at least, springs from or reflects the nature of Jewish life in the community, then the absence of Jewish values or Judaism in modern Jewish writing suggests, alas, the concomitant absence of Jewish values or Judaism in modern Jewish life.

The question is not an idle one. But in whichever way Wisse and Ozick answer it in relation to the United States, they would probably answer differently for the Jews of Canada.



Though the number of publishing outlets and the opportunities for Jewish writing are vastly fewer here, the extent of Jewish writing, published and unpublished, is probably greater on a proportionate basis. In this vein, we owe a considerable debt to publishing houses such as Mosaic Press who make available Jewish writing to the Canadian public.

In celebration of the vibrancy of Jewish writing in Canada, I call readers' attention to two recent publications.

Parchment, the annual collection of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing, has just released its 10th anniversary issue.

An independent journal published by the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, Parchment has come to be both a showcase for established Jewish writers and a springboard for younger, aspiring ones. In the words of its editor, Adam Fuerstenberg," [Parchment] is recognized in Canada and abroad as Canada's journal of current creative Jewish writing, the place where new and unknown writers desiring to give voice to authentic Canadian Jewish experience can be assured of publication alongside already established authors."

Myriad manifestations of "authentic Canadian Jewish experience," expressed by a bulging roster of creative, interesting writers and poets are the constant treasure of Parchment.

This year's trove is crowned by a poignant "old country" short story written in French by Naim Kattan, called Les Guardians, or The Guardians. An English translation of the story appears alongside.

Fuerstenberg and his co-editors are to be commended, once again, for the engaging, thoughtful, entertaining, at times inspiring offerings they have gathered for us and made available for our reading pleasure.

Harold Heft is one of Canada's exciting, new Jewish writers. The Shape of This Dying, Remembering Alexander Bercovitch is his inaugural publication of poetry. It is stunningly powerful, an original creative work that combines piercing poetry with bold, literary initiative. Heft imagines himself the chronicler of the events surrounding the death of the brilliant though starcrossed painter Alexander Bercovitch who died in 1951 on his way to a showing of his own works.

Renowned Canadian poet Shel Krakofsky exquisitely captures the success of Heft's work: "With stunning subtlety and irradiated language, Heft has crafted a superb and believable portrait of the artist..."

The following is an excerpt from the poem Heft wrote imagining the voice of A.M. Klein, Bercovitch's good friend, when Klein heard the news of Bercovitch's death.

"And that is where the incomplete/ is exposed. The immortality we seek/ is in that which we take,/ not in what we leave behind. It is/ in the debt for marble chipped away,/ not in the value/ of the remaining statue. Still,/ from somewhere beyond this/ sameness of winter do vapours/ rise up, as from sub-/ terranean rivers, and swim, undetected,/ across the sky, seeking always/ purer forms of themselves, while we,/ together beneath his gifts, recline."

There are a great many Jewish writers in Canada seeking merely the opportunity to show us their writing. It falls to us to encourage them.

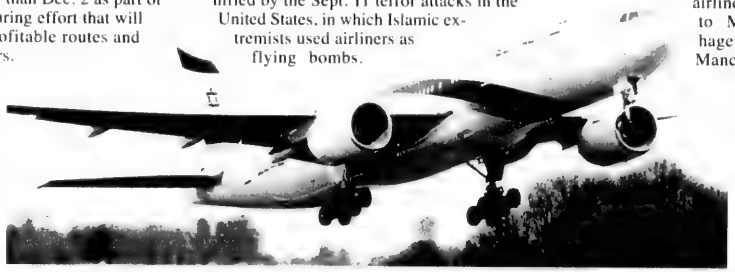
El Al implements new route ahead of schedule

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — El Al Israel Airlines will resume its non-stop service from Toronto to Tel Aviv no later than Dec. 2 as part of a major restructuring effort that will see it drop unprofitable routes and consolidate others.

The move should shave off as much as two hours on both the outbound and the return legs of the trip to Israel, said Stanley Morais, sales and marketing manager for El Al.



The non-stop flights to Israel will become part of a longer Los Angeles-Toronto-Tel Aviv route.

Passengers will benefit from the revised routing, since they will no longer be faced with a side trip to New York's JFK International Airport, where partially filled flights were routinely diverted so that other Israel-bound travellers could fill the airline's 767s.

El Al had been planning to change its North American routes in the wake of a drastic fall-off of passenger traffic that followed the onset of the Palestinian intifadah that began in late September 2000. The violence in the Holy Land cut deeply into the airline's numbers, and that trend was magnified by the Sept. 11 terror attacks in the United States, in which Islamic extremists used airliners as flying bombs.

All airlines suffered tremendous financial losses following that event, with numerous carriers pushed to the brink of bankruptcy.

Faced with a drastic reduction in passenger traffic, El Al decided to take drastic measures.

Late last month, the airline announced it would end flights to Chicago, Manchester, Copenhagen, St. Petersburg, Dusseldorf and Nairobi.

Air Canada, meanwhile, cut its Canadian departures to Israel by more than half, temporarily dropping its direct service from Monday to Thursday, while retaining its Friday, Saturday and Sunday flights. The move was part of an across-the-board restructuring that saw the airline suspend flights to Munich, Copenhagen, Glasgow and Manchester, said Air Canada spokesperson Laura Cooke.

The airline experienced a drop-off in passenger traffic even before Sept. 11 and the "seasonal suspensions" will be revisited in the spring, if not sooner, she said.

Morais said autumn traffic to Israel from Toronto has decreased substantially, with visits by Christian pilgrimage groups down as much as 90 percent from last year. Traffic by Jewish solidarity groups has made up for the shortfall only partially, he added.

El Al had planned to drop its Toronto-Tel Aviv route in the spring in favour of the Los Angeles-Toronto-Tel Aviv route. The airline was able to move ahead of schedule once it received all necessary clearances from Canadian aviation authorities.

During the fall and winter seasons, El Al will offer three non-stop flights a week – on Thursday, Friday and Sunday – with late evening departures. Currently, the airline is carrying an average of 300 passengers a week to Israel.

"What we're doing is improving the service for El Al passengers. Even though our numbers are down, we're improving the service," Morais said.

Ruth Gruber still fighting injustice at age 90

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL, Ont. — The lessons Ruth Gruber learned when she accompanied 1,000 refugees to the United States in 1944 have special resonance today.

"I knew that whatever tools I had, I had to use in rescue. Wherever there is injustice, we must fight it," the 90-year-old author and journalist said Saturday night at the closing event of Holocaust Education Week.

The program, attended by almost 900 people at Shaar Shalom Synagogue – itself a target of anti-Semitic vandalism last month – was also a community Kristallnacht commemoration.

The synagogue's Rabbi Martin Berman, in a d'var Torah, compared the targeting of Jewish businesses on Kristallnacht to the targeting of innocent people in a New York office tower.

"We can never prevent the madmen of the world from bringing destruction, but we can prevent them from destroying our spirit," he said.

The number of people killed on Sept. 11 was less than the number of Jews murdered day in and day out during the Holocaust, noted Howard Driman, chair of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

Other participants in the program included Alan Frysh, president of Shaar Shalom; Cantor David Harel; veteran Martin Maxwell; March of the Living participant Julia Driman; Auschwitz survivor Jennie Eisenstein; and Harry Wolle, chair of Shaar Shalom's Holocaust Education Committee.

"What's happening today in Afghanistan is a fight against injustice," said Gruber, speaking with a passion and clarity that are likely unmatched in many people half her age. The "wild, crazy, ultra-extreme fundamentalists" would like to change the 21st century back into the 12th century, she said.

"They want to destroy everything that you and the rest of us in the western world have created, our entire civiliation... They want to destroy everything that is of value and give us their values of evil, and we have to fight it and destroy it before it overtakes us," she warned.

The New York-based writer, whose book Haven was made into a television miniseries with Natasha Richardson that aired earlier this year (and which has just opened as a musical play in Los Angeles), said that her journey with the refugees, most of whom were Jewish, changed the whole course of her life.

"I have a theory," she said, "that even though we're born Jewish – and I was born in a shtetl, a shtetl called Brooklyn – there's a moment in our lives when we become Jewish. It happened for me during World War II."

As she documented the stories of the refugees aboard the ship, Gruber, who had earned a PhD at age 20, "learned about Jewish courage. I learned about Jews who hid in sewers, in caves, in forests, in the mountains; about Jews risking their own lives to save other lives."

Her own rescue mission came about as a result of the discovery of files suppressed by the U.S. State Department, detailing the horrors of the Holocaust. Two non-Jews – one affiliated with the State Department, the other with the Treasury – took great risks to bring the information to light, Gruber noted.

This was the catalyst for then president Franklin Roosevelt offering temporary haven to 1,000 refugees in a former army camp in Oswego, N.Y. They stayed there, in a fenced compound, for 18 months, until they were finally allowed to make the United States their permanent home. The refugees, one of whom helped create the CAT scan and MRI, "have given back everything America gave them and more," she said.

Both Canada and the United States "went out of their way to prevent Jews from entering," said Gruber, recalling the overt anti-Semitism of the 1930s and 1940s. Speaking to Holocaust survivors specifically, she said, "I think we should stop demonizing [Roosevelt] and remember him for the good he did and not for the things he failed to do."

Gruber became involved in the rescue mission after the president delegated responsibility for the project to her then boss, Harold Ickes, Secretary of the Interior.

"Those refugees are going to be terrified. Someone has to hold their hand," Gruber, Ickes' special assistant, told him.

He gave her the job – and the title of general, as a way of affording her a degree of protection should she be captured.

She recalled the words of one of the refugees, a rabbi, who told his fellow refugees on seeing the Statue of Liberty that they must "speak with one voice, with one heart, and be filled not with hatred but with love."

Gruber – who also reported on refugees to Palestine, the establishment of the State of Israel and more recently the rescue of Ethiopian Jews – spoke of her love for America and her passion for Israel.

"We must teach our sons, daughters and grandchildren the truth and beauty of our Jewishness," the mother of two and grandmother of four said.

"And we must teach them that it doesn't matter where we live, that we belong to each other, and as long as we go on knowing that we belong to each other, then Israel and the Jewish people will survive."

Remembrance Day rally focuses on terrorism fight

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Remembrance Day rally sponsored by Canadian Citizens for Freedom in conjunction with Canadian Jewish War Veterans was the first public event in support of this country's role in the fight against terrorism.

Sandra Stern, a representative of Canadian Citizens for Freedom, said the group planned the rally because "since Sept. 11, we have been deeply concerned about global terrorism, the threat to our world, and specifically to our country.

"As terrorism attempts to instil fear, create chaos, destroy democracy, with no regard for human life, theirs or ours, Canadians must show strong support for our government's participation in the U.S.-led coalition to defend the West."

The aim of the newly formed group, she said, is to "bring back a sense of Canadian pride by honouring the memory of those who gave their lives in the past, and rally for the Canadian and American soldiers today who have placed themselves in harm's way."

Speakers at the rally at at Earl Bales Park included Art Eggleton, minister of national defence; Lou Van Delman from the Jewish War Veterans of Canada; Norm Gardner, chair, Toronto Police Services Board; Citizenship Judge Sigmund Reiser; Brig.-Gen. Edward Fitch of the Department of National Defence; MP Monte Kwinter; and Norman Doidge, a psychiatrist and National Post columnist.

Eggleton said that as people across the country gather to remember those who died in past wars, we also need to honour those who have gone overseas to fight terrorism.

"The people of Israel have known terrorism for a long time. We all need to stand shoulder to shoulder against [it.] We also need to think of the troops and pray for peace."

There are steps we can take as Canadians, Fitch noted, to aid in the fight against terrorism. These steps include letting our elected representatives know about our concerns; increasing our personal vigilance; avoiding hysteria that could generate false alarms; and building a reasonable expectation of our security forces.

We have entered an era which has no counterpart, Doidge said. "Because we have become open and vulnerable, we have to take the battle to the terrorists."

Not everything changed on Sept. 11, said Doidge. "Osama bin Laden [pronounced] his war over a decade ago, but we only half listened.

"Just as Hitler could have been stopped in 1933, bin Laden could have been stopped in 1993.

"We ceased to understand the mind of a fanatic. A terrorist is not someone who experienced a bad childhood. A terrorist is a fanatic who is consumed with a self-hatred that cannot be abated. Everything he feels about himself, he projects onto others and becomes paranoid."

Although we should not panic, he said, we should remember that New York City is a one-hour plane ride from Toronto. "All major fanatics expand into the world... Fanaticism is by definition expansiveness, and Canada is at risk.

"Canada may not have a bull's-eye painted on its forehead, but it is in the circle next to the bull's-eye. We all have a bull's-eye painted on our foreheads, but we also have a shield. That shield is the armed forces."

Kwinter told the crowd that a delegation of 1,000 Canadians is planning a trip to New York later this month to show its support and to attend a rally. Both Air Canada and Greyhound buses are offering special fares, he said. For information on the delegation, please call his office at 416-630-0080.

Reiser led the group in a renewal of their citizenship vows and eight-year-old Jake Koplowitz read In Flanders Fields. The national anthems were led by Ted Labow, cantorial intern at Shaarei Beth El Congregation in Oakville.

Straight talk to the chairman

Last week, Condoleeza Rice, the national security advisor to U.S. President George W. Bush, delivered a sharply-worded, unambiguous message to PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat. The subject was terrorism. Speaking to reporters in Washington, Rice essentially put the chairman to a choice: if he won't take steps to suppress terrorism, he won't be welcome in the White House.

"There are responsibilities," Rice told the audience, "that come with being the representative of the Palestinian people. And that means to make certain that you do everything that you can to lower the level of violence, everything that you can to root out terrorists, to arrest them, to make sure that the security situation in the Palestinian territories – Area A, for instance – is one from which terror cannot spring."

But the security advisor did not stop with this expression merely of U.S. expectations. She continued, providing a brutally blunt assessment of whether Arafat had fulfilled those expectations.

"These are responsibilities that we have asked Chairman Arafat to take, and to take seriously," Rice said. "We still don't think that there has been enough in this regard. But just like with any leadership, it is extremely important to separate yourself from international terrorists. You cannot help us with al Qaeda and hug Hezbollah. That's not acceptable. Or Hamas."

The straight talk was as refreshing as it was rare.

"That's not acceptable."

Seldom have we heard western officials speak so plainly to the Palestinian leader. No one has ever called him on his duplicitous game of saying one thing to his people and saying another thing to the West, or of saying one thing to the West and doing quite the opposite on the ground.

As a contrast to this say-it-as-it-is statement to Chairman Arafat delivered by Ms. Rice was the firm, but delicate "honest broker" message delivered by Canadian Foreign Minister John Manley last month. According to all reports, Manley properly told the chairman that violence against innocents was unjustifiable under any circumstance. But he did not drive the point home, as required, and as Ms. Rice courageously did, by challenging the chairman's double game.

The foreign minister undoubtedly returned from his five-day trip exhausted and, hopefully, wiser about the myriad complexities of the region and of the conflict which has been waged unceasingly upon Israel since before its birth 53 years ago.

If there is any progress to be made in cobbling together a framework and then a lasting structure for peace in the Middle East, truth will have to be its bonding material. The security advisor to the U.S. president may have just put truth back onto the Middle East agenda.

Regarding Rebbitzen Judy Taub

The article regarding Rebbitzen Judy Taub (CJN, Nov. 8) was understated to the point of entirely missing the true depth and breadth of who she truly was.

Rebbitzen Taub was far more than an asset to the shul she and her husband, Rabbi Baruch Taub, started. Without question, she was the mother to an entire community. Not only did she make it possible for her husband to be available to use his talents, chachmah and Torah knowledge, but she also was a partner. A Shabbat did not pass without her having congregants, friends in need, new faces or visitors in her home.

A day did not go by without her touching someone with an act of chesed, a kind word or a visit. She played a crucial role in the formation of virtually every group that has been created to help the sick or feed the hungry. Today there are hundreds of women who were taught by her how to establish a Jewish home and a Jewish marriage.

She took a special interest in the great number of bat mitzvah girls she taught each and every year. She created a bond with them, as she did with so many of their mothers.

Yet she was so much more than that. Her modesty and humility were such that many of the stories will never be told, but what we do know is that she touched the lives – improved the lives – of thousands of people. Her hospital visits, her private talks, a smile at a simchah, a phone call, or a few minutes arranging shidduchim are too numerous to detail and sadly, we only know of a small number of them.

Rebbitzen Judy was the mother, the aunt, the friend and confidante to an entire community. She was the elegant, often silent partner to her husband. Yet her silence spoke volumes.

Your article left out so much about her. In fact, even this letter only touches the surface. Perhaps the over 2,000 people present at her funeral, led so proudly by the outstanding sons she raised, who were heard by a community in tears at the profound loss of its rebbitzen, can give us a glimpse of who she really was.

Elaborating on Balfour Declaration

Nov. 1 reminds us of the Balfour declaration and of the ensuing excitement in the Zionist circles: It became a document of major importance in 1926 when the League of Nations chose it as the basis of its resolution calling for a sovereign, national home for the Jewish people, with a proviso that nothing be done to prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities.

This clause does not include political rights for those communities, which makes the Jewish people sovereign in the land, and it does not mention any identifiable group, which testifies to the non-existence of any Arab entity like Palestinian people, which was cooked up in 1964.

Furthermore, this historical resolution was also signed by the government of the United States, who was not a member of the League of Nations.

Elaborating on Chaim Weizmann

In your editorial of Nov. 1, you wrote, "Chaim Weizmann, who was instrumental in eliciting the declaration from Lord Balfour." Nowhere do you mention why Weizmann was instrumental or was an influencing factor. It is important for your readers to understand all aspects, influences and ramifications that were involved the Balfour Declaration.

For your readers' interest, Weizmann was a chemist at Manchester University in England from 1904 to 1918. During World War I, he discovered an improved method for making acetone and butyl alcohol for explosives. He gave this phenomenal discovery free to the British government, which aided Britain's war effort. They were forever grateful, and this act definitely influenced Balfour's declaration.

Self-destructive frustration

For 50 years the Palestinians have been indoctrinating their children with hatred. In their homes and in their schools they have been moulding a generation imbued with hatred of Americans, Jews and Israelis.

A year ago, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat walked out on the best hope for a Palestinian state, choosing to orchestrate an apparently futile campaign of car-bomb murders and suicidal mayhem, increasing the anger, hatred and frustration of his misguided followers.

He has been forced, reluctantly, to embrace a measure of constraint and rather uncomfortable co-operation with the coalition of U.S.-led forces against terrorists. He will now find out how hatred, carefully nurtured through the years, turns into the most heinous form of self-destructive-frustration. Corrupt, despotic leaders and their cohorts usually end up on the gallows they erect for others.

Perspectives

The media's lexicon for the Middle East

The following is the first of two articles. Part 2 will be published next week.

By DONALD CARR

Most English language newspapers, television networks and radio stations have what is called a style book which dictates to writers, commentators, anchors and newsreaders the appropriate use of words in material for publication or broadcast.

Reviewing past media coverage of events in and affecting Israel, one is driven to the conclusion that for many there must be a distinct style book, or lexicon, reserved especially for reporting on that part of the world. It probably looks something like the following:

Activist
Accepted for use beginning in late 2000 to replace the words "freedom fighter" or "guerilla" which earlier referred to Arabs who engaged in terrorist attacks against Israeli targets, primarily civilian. "Freedom fighter" or "guerilla" were, in any event, not to be used when the targets were not Israeli, but were, for instance, American, Northern Irish or English, when the correct term was and is "terrorist."

Assassination
Carefully pinpointed attacks on Palestinian Authority (PA), Hamas, PFLP, Islamic Jihad or other Arab "activists" (see above) whose names have previously been given by Israel to PA Chairman Yasser Arafat for their arrest as terrorists, according to the terms of the Oslo accords. Although these attacks – in self-defence, in accordance with international law – are effected to thwart or pre-empt terrorist activities against Israeli targets, primarily civilian, no stress should be laid on this fact. Israel Defence Forces go to great pains to avoid injuring or killing innocent bystanders, but, as in all military action, sometimes cannot avoid this. Notwithstanding that, emphasis should be placed on any such civilian deaths.

Cycle of Violence
Use when describing Israel Defence Force's military actions in response to carefully orchestrated attacks on Israeli civilian targets, either by the PA-controlled Tanzim or by other terrorist Arab groups. Such actions are directed either at the sources of firing on Jewish targets, with pinpoint accuracy in an attempt to avoid any civilian injury, or at leaders and planners of subsequent attacks on Jewish targets. However, use when demonstrating the "moral equivalency" of (a) unprovoked anti-civilian attacks by those who could and should be controlled by the PA and (b) defensive moves by the Israel Defence Forces.

Equates the "arsonist" with the "fireman."

Death
Use when Israelis are either stabbed, shot or blown up by "activists" (see above), instead of "murder," an unlawful act.

Disproportionate
Use alternately with "excessive force" or "provocative" to describe Israeli reaction to Arab suicide bombers or Tanzim or Fatah mortar-bombers or machine-gunners who have attacked Israeli targets, primarily civilian. Never allude to what is considered to be proportionate. May be used even when there is no loss of Arab life, but involves the occupation of premises (such as Orient House in Jerusalem) used to co-ordinate and plan attacks by "activists" against Israeli targets, primarily civilian.

Never to be used for operations such as those carried out by the United States in bombing Muammar Khadafi's home in Libya, or by Britain and the United States when they destroy Iraqi installations which threaten or shoot at their aircraft in Iraq's "no fly" zone, or by the United States firing missiles clearly intended to reach Osama bin Laden in retaliation for the bombings of its Kenya and Tanzania embassies, or when UN peacekeepers mowed down hundreds of Somalis. To be used sparingly outside the Middle East to describe appropriate similar police reactions to uncontrollable mobs of demonstrators on such occasions as the Seattle or Quebec international economic summits.

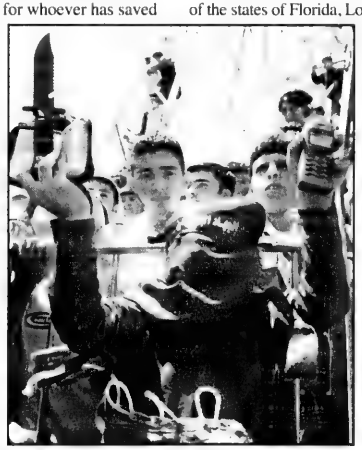
Description of Israeli governments which are (1) not prepared to surrender territory which is either (a) strategically essential for the defence of their state, or (b) which was traditionally inhabited by Jews, either long before the Arabs entered Palestine, or which had been cultivated or populated by Jews and served as an attraction for Arabs to move into Palestine from the early part of the 20th century until 1947, or (c) from which Jews had been driven in the War of Independence and to which they returned after the Six Day War; or (2) not prepared to accept written or oral commitments from Arafat, whose track record for keeping commitments (whether to Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, Egypt, the United Nations or Israel) stands at zero; or (3) will not abandon its right and responsibility to protect its citizens from wanton terror attacks. Never to be used for any PA groupings or for Arafat.

Hero
Use alternatively with "martyr" (see below). Describes young Muslim Arabs, who, having been brainwashed in training camps run by Hamas or Islamic Jihad forces, strap nail-filled explosives to their bodies and infiltrate heavily populated areas inside Israel, where they detonate the explosives, killing themselves and hoping to cause as many deaths and injuries to Israeli men, women and children as possible.

Martyr
Use alternately with "hero" (see above). Encouraged by Islamist clergy to die in the act of killing as many Jews as possible, with promises of perpetual Paradise and variously stated numbers of virgins with whom to sport if they fulfil this required injunction. Example: In August, Sheik Ibrahim Madhi gave a sermon at the Sheik Ijlin Mosque in Gaza, broadcast by PA-run television: "A young man said to me, 'I am 14 years old and I have four years left before I blow myself up amongst the Jews.' I said to him: 'Oh son, I ask Allah to give you and myself martyrdom.' All spears should be directed at the Jews, at the enemies of Allah, the nation that was cursed in Allah's book. Allah has described them as apes and pigs, the calf-worshippers, idol-worshippers… Blessings for whoever has saved a bullet in order to stick it in a Jew's head."



Martyrs' families are paid large sums of money by the PA, or by Libya's Muammar Khadafi or Iraq's Saddam Hussein, for providing a hero or martyr. Such families are interviewed with the expectation that they will declare their wish for their other children to follow the same route.

Moderate
Refers to the few Palestinian Arab leaders, usually well-versed in English, who manage to distance themselves from those whose pronouncements are filled with vitriolic exhortations to the Palestinian public to drive the Jews into the sea.

Example: Faisal al-Husseini, frequently interviewed by the media in Jerusalem for comments on current Israeli-Palestinian actions, portrayed as looking for ways to perpetuate the "peace process." Yet in his last interview, in Arabic, with Egypt's Al-Arabi just before his death from a heart attack on June 24, he said: "We distinguish the strategic, long-term goals, from the political phased goals, which we are compelled to temporarily accept due to international pressure. If you are asking me… what are the Palestinian borders according to the higher strategy, I will immediately reply: 'From the river to the sea.' Palestine in its entirety is an Arab land, the land of the Arab nation, a land no one can sell or buy and it is impossible to remain silent when someone is stealing it, even if this requires time and even [if it means paying] a high price."

The difficulty for reporters now, after al-Husseini's death, is to find a credible Palestinian Arab spokesman as capable in English of portraying the "politically phased goals" as being the long-range intent of the Palestinian Arabs.

Occupied territories
Possibly a legally correct term, yet use pejoratively when describing Israel Defence Force activity in those parts of Judea, Samaria and Gaza, which were once part of the Palestine Mandate granted to Great Britain by the League of Nations, but which were rejected by the Arabs as a separate Arab state when the UN partitioned Palestine in 1947. Those lands, which during the Arab attempt to eliminate the Jewish State created by the UN, fell outside Israeli control and were controlled by Jordan (Judea and Samaria) or Egypt (Gaza) until the Six Day War of 1967 and are not to be referred to as "occupied" during that period. Use despite the fact that they were then taken by Israel in an act of self-defence and contain many areas that were populated by Jews for centuries.

Never to be used in describing (a) any part of the states of Florida, Louisiana, Texas, California, Nevada, Arizona or New Mexico, notwithstanding that all of these states were acquired by force, nor (b) countless other lands with a similar history across the world.

Palestinian land
Alternative for "occupied territories" (see above), although often unpopulated. To be used notwithstanding that they were lands substantially "awarded" to the Palestinian Arabs by the UN in its Partition Plan, but rejected by them and all Arab states, all of whom refused to recognize, reciprocally, an Israel, or were prepared to accept, reluctantly, only a "binational" state.

The unsayable must be said

In the Oct. 18 issue of the Globe and Mail, in an article called "The Unsayable Must Be Said," David Hirst argued that there is a linkage between the war on terror and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The moment I saw the headline I knew what the article's content would be. I had anticipated its publication for quite some time.

Whenever we are faced with a problem that defies immediate solution, we look for an explanation that is easy to understand and is as simple as possible. Scientists know, of course, that this is a dead-end street, but the rest of us ordinary folk are usually inclined to look for a simple solution, even if it turns out to be simplistic.

We Jews are especially familiar with this phenomenon, because for some centuries we have been seen by many people to be the source of almost all problems in society. We are, in some convoluted fashion, connected to the problem at hand.

Although living in Canada, we are hesitant to enter religious issues into a controversy, the fact is that often they are present, and more so than we are ready to admit.

I am an ardent believer in religious pluralism and am ready to defend each denomination and its supporters from unjust attack. But I cannot close my eyes to the recognition that violent Muslim extremism is spreading in a fair part of the world and has made a rational resolution of some political problems very difficult indeed.

While such people consider Israel a cancer on the unity of Muslim culture, there is more than religious prejudice involved. Israel is seen not only as a Jewish enclave in a Muslim world – it is also considered an outpost of Western culture, and therefore civilization's greatest threat. There is more to this view than simplistic anti-Semitism, for the perpetrators are very often Semites themselves.

In this regard I am somewhat pessimistic, for I do not see a change in the near future. We seem in fact to be at the nadir of this development and change must be seen not in years or even decades, but perhaps in centuries. The 19th century was suffused with great hope, and what followed was a century of disillusionment, and we are still suffering from its fallout.

So my advice is – as I have said on several occasions before – hang in. If we live long enough, we might see a turn for a more rational way of dealing with political and social questions.

Have a heart, hug a student!

November is a particularly bad month for university students. For an arts student like me, this month will consist of handing in many lovely papers and preparing for a whole bunch of exams. Needless to say, of all times during the year, November is a time that students might need extra pampering and attention.

If you know of a student or two nearby, now is the best time to reach out to them. This does not mean having to entertain them, but sometimes an invitation for a Shabbat dinner (and a reminder that they can make it a quick dinner if they like) is much appreciated.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

I don't want to sound whiny about this stress – I know it only goes downhill from here – but often, people will ask how to help students in their communities. Students away from home do enjoy a family-type setting, especially when they are spending a lot of time in isolation doing loads of hopefully productive work. One would not believe how refreshing it is to spend some time with people outside of the daily school community and getting away for a brief break from studies. As well, it gives both parties an opportunity to better acquaint themselves and make a new friend.

During a recent visit to Toronto, I found myself in the middle of what seemed to be a "beginning-life crisis". As a fourth year student, I am slowly coming to grips with the idea that my undergraduate days are going to be over very soon. While it is something that can be very exciting, many in my predicament are feeling overwhelmed right now, especially with exams around the corner.

Wherever I seemed to go, people asked, "So, what do you plan to do with your life?" What a question! I'm not sure if I represent the majority of people, but I must say that that question is one of the most difficult to answer. In high school, many of us had plans for the future, but we kept our options open. I always assumed that by near the end of my undergraduate degree, I would have a clearer picture of what my future would hold. I do have many long term goals, but when I am asked about them, I may not always want to reveal or expound on them.

The truth is most university students do not reach such a realization about their futures so quickly. I have a lot of direction in my life and many ideas, but nothing has really been ruled out just yet. Still, every time a curious, albeit caring, person asks me what I want to do, I find myself saying, "I don't know... I have a few different ideas... blah blah blah." In the end, I feel like a flake, but at least an honest one. So what's the best bet for those who only mean well? How about an optimistic comment such as: "With all of the information that you are taking in, you must feel a little inundated, but don't worry, it all comes together eventually."

And, as if an already softening economy wasn't enough, along came Sept. 11. People in their graduating year, or not far away, have heightened insecurity about a job market that, for now, is not ideal for newcomers. Furthermore, people like me who have considered travelling for a year prior to – possibly – going to graduate school now feel that this might not be a good idea anymore.

Some time in the next few weeks, why not do us a favour and reach out to a student in your community in any way you like. Even just a quick encouraging phone call can do much more than you think. To students, I wish you good luck through November. Remember that having a little fun during this time is very important and will help you focus better. Hang in there – Chanukah is not far away.

Should you go on Birthright?

It's another year for Birthright and that means revisiting the question, "Should I go to Israel?"

For the last few Birthright trips, the situation in Israel has been grave enough that many young adults have decided to cancel their free 10-day excursion to the holy land. If you have read this column since I have started writing, you would know that if it were last year, I would say, definitely go to Israel. These days, however, my answer is not as direct.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

Many people who are thinking about taking the Birthright trip in December are now deciding whether or not to travel to Israel. Several of the would-be participants have asked me my opinion on the matter.

When the question was originally posted to me, I had to ask myself what is different now from before. I think the current situation in Israel is not necessarily worse than the situation last year. There are still suicide bombings and clashes between Palestinian and Israeli authorities, but all of these occurrences still take place in the occupied territories. Outside of last year's bombings in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, there have not been any incidents on that scale since then.

My concern is for the unknown. As of my deadline (Nov. 5), there has not been any retaliation from terrorist organizations to the war on terrorism, but it can be expected that something will happen sometime in the future. Israel is a very possible target for any retaliation, as among other things, it is a close ally with America. There has been a lot of talk about the United States targeting Iraq in this war. We all remember the Scud missiles raining down on Israel in the Gulf War. It is conceivable that this could happen again. Could it happen within the 10 Birthright days? That's a question that the participants need to answer themselves.

If I were going on Birthright in December, there would be a number of questions that I would ask my trip coordinators. What is the itinerary? Is Jerusalem still on the list? Will you be avoiding any tourist attractions that you would otherwise be seeing?

Most people going on Birthright have never been to Israel before so just being there is probably enough to get them excited, but they have to ask themselves if avoiding sites and having major restrictions is something they want. I don't know what the plans are for the itinerary, but I do think it would be wise to find out.

Israel is an amazing country and even spending 10 days in the desert would be an incredible experience, but my biggest concern and my ultimate question for the organizers of the Birthright experience is about security. What security measures are they taking? If they do let the participants shop on Ben Yehuda Street will they have extra security on hand? How do they make sure the places that Birthright attends are safe?

You might feel uncomfortable asking this to the people in charge, but the reason you are having doubts about going to Israel is because of safety. The best that could happen by finding out about security is that it will ease your concerns, and the worst is that you won't feel satisfied and then you will realize that maybe this a trip to pass on. Birthright is a trip that sends mainly Americans and Canadians to Israel, so (not to scare anyone) this may be an appealing target to someone who wants to make a statement. So I will reiterate my point one more time: check out the security.

"Should I go on Birthright?" is not an easy question to answer. While there may not be a significant increase in violence, the climate in the Middle East is ripe for change. The Birthright trip is only 10 days, you won't be taking public transportation and you will be on an organized tour, so things are probably safer than if you were to visit Israel alone, but the question still persists and if you are aware of all the issues, then the answer will be easier to reach.

Israeli incursions into Area A pique the U.S.

Reacting to external and internal pressures, Israel pulled its forces out of all but two Palestinian towns in the West Bank last week. Claiming it had no interest in permanently reoccupying Area A – fully controlled by the Palestinians under the Oslo accords – or in overthrowing Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority, Israel was poised this week to withdraw from Jenin and Tulkarem, thereby restoring the status quo ante in the territories.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israeli Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, however, warned that Israel reserved "the right to defend ourselves in all ways, by any means." Another Israeli cabinet minister, Dan Naveh, was blunter. If the Palestinian Authority failed to crack down on terrorism emanting from its territory, the reason for launching the raids in the first place, Israel would not hesitate to carry out additional armed incursions into Area A, comprising about 18 percent of the West Bank.

By suggesting that Area A is not off-limits to the Israeli army, Israel served notice on the United States, which staunchly opposes the incursions, that the problem may recur. Israel is thus girding itself for a renewal of festering tensions with the United States, its chief ally and benefactor.

These strains burst into the open shortly after President George W. Bush declared war on Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda terrorist network and its Islamic fundamentalist patron, the Taliban regime in Afghanistan.

Within about a week of the Sept. 11 Arab terrorist attacks in Manhattan and Washington, D.C., the United States began to urge Israel and the Palestinians to sign a ceasefire, and therefore end the intifadah, on the basis of a U.S. Central Intelligence Agency plan. As envisaged by the United States, the parties would then proceed to implement the Mitchell recommendations, which call for an immediate truce, cooling-off and confidence-building periods and a resumption of bilateral negotiations.

Worried that Bush was coming down too hard on Israel and that the United States' budding coalition against Al Qaeda would be at Israel's expense, Ariel Sharon, Israel's prime minister, delivered a diatribe comparing its current situation with that of Czechoslovakia in 1938. Outraged by the historically inaccurate comparison, the United States protested, and Sharon apologized.

But on Oct. 18 – a day after Israel's hard-line tourism minister, Rechavam Ze'evi, was assassinated by the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine in revenge for Israel's targeted killing of its leader, Mustafa Zibri, last summer – Israeli tanks and bulldozers clanked into Ramallah and Jenin.

On Oct. 19 and 20, in response to a succession of Palestinian attacks on Israeli civilians and soldiers, Israel invaded Bethlehem, Beit Jala, Qalqilya and Tulkarem. It was Israel's broadest military operation against the Palestinian Authority since the advent of the Oslo peace process in 1993.

Alarmed by the scale of the raids, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell urged Israel to withdraw "immediately" from Area A, suggesting that they were undermining the integrity of the international coalition arrayed against Al Qaeda and the Taliban, and the attempt to keep Arab and Muslim states, such as Saudi Arabia and Pakistan, on board.

To drive home Powell's point, Bush, in a White House meeting with Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, asked Israel to vacate Area A as "quickly as possible." Bush's request was in line with recent American calls on Israel to exercise "restraint" in its dealings with the Palestinian Authority, and to stop its targeted killings.

Peres, acutely aware of Labour party threats to leave the national unity government if Israel remained in Area A, assured Bush that the army would evacuate it in stages. But within hours of Bush's appeal and Peres' assurance, Israel stormed into Beit Rima – a village near Ramallah – in a hunt for Ze'evi's killers. By doing so, Israel further aggravated its pivotal relations with the United States.

Having captured a number of Palestinian militants believed to be linked with Ze'evi's assassins, Israel left Beit Rima expeditiously. But in an ultimatum to Arafat, Sharon set conditions for a full withdrawal from Area A: the extradition of suspects associated with Ze'evi's murder and that of other Israeli civilians, a serious crackdown on the terrorist infrastructure and Palestinian compliance with a ceasefire to extinguish the intifadah.

Arafat, feeling intense pressure from all sides – Israel, the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia – outlawed the armed wing of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and arrested scores of militants, but did little else.

Israel, satisfied that a measure of normality had returned to Bethlehem and Beit Jala, withdrew from these towns on Oct. 28, just hours after Palestinian gunmen killed four women in Hadera, in yet another brazen daylight onslaught against Israelis. The Hadera murders, perpetrated by Palestinian policemen on behalf of Islamic Jihad, called into question the efficacy and deterrent power of Israel's incursions into Area A.

As if to hammer home the point, Israel's Nov. 5th pullout from Qalqilya came on the heels of another atrocity: Islamic Jihad terrorists opened fire on a bus in Jerusalem's French Hill neighbourhood, slaughtering two Israeli teenagers and pushing Israel's death toll in the 14-month-old intifadah toward 200.

Since the Palestinian uprising is not expected to fizzle out in the foreseeable future, efforts by Peres notwithstanding, Israel will doubtless continue to penetrate Area A. Sharon adopted the policy shortly after he assumed office last March.

He began by ordering lightning in-and-out incursions into the Gaza Strip, the launching pad of Palestinian mortar assaults on Israeli settlements in Gaza and in Israel itself. These raids were designed to blow up buildings and uproot vegetation harbouring terrorists.

On April 17, after mortars landed in the Negev development town of Sederot, Israel seized parts of Beit Hanoun, in northern Gaza, and an Israeli army spokesperson disclosed that Israel would hold positions there for "days, weeks, months." His comment prompted Powell to criticize Israel for using "excessive and disproportionate" force.

Stung by Powell's critique, Israel promptly withdrew from Beit Hanoun. But since then, as a result of further Arab terrorist incidents, Israel has driven repeatedly into Palestinian autonomous areas. Concerned that they may exacerbate an already serious situation on the ground, the U.S. State Department has declared that the incursions "perpetuate the cycle of violence."

Yet Washington's disapproval has not deterred Israel. Last month, Israel briefly occupied two Arab districts in Hebron – Abu Sneineh and Harat a Sheikh – and raided Beit Lahiya in Gaza after Palestinians wounded several Israelis near the Tomb of the Patriarchs and killed two others in Alei Sinai. In tandem with these raids, Israel is hunting down Palestinian gunmen and bombmakers planning attacks.

An Israeli tank rumbles out of Bethlehem

Although these actions are frowned upon by the Bush administration, the basics of Israel's strategic relationship with the United States remain fundamentally sound. On Sept. 7, Israel signed a contract to purchase of 52 F-16I fighter bombers. On Oct. 30, the U.S. Senate passed a foreign aid bill allocating $2.7 billion in economic and military assistance to Israel. Underlining these facts, public opinion polls suggest that support for Israel in the United States remains strong.

Intros to Kabbalah; approaching Kabbalah

The Way into Jewish Mystical Tradition* by Lawrence Kushner Jewish Lights Publishing, 2001
The Gift of Kabbalah* Tamar Frankeil, Jewish Lights Publishing, 2001

Books
Bernard Baskin

For some time now, the Jewish mystical tradition, especially the Kabbalah, has achieved surprising popularity. A recent column in the Wall Street Journal indicates that this venerable movement that dates back to the 13th century in medieval Europe is fashionable "among the glitterati that crowd into such facilities as the Kabbalah Learning Centre in Los Angeles. Devotees include Barbara Streisand, Courtney Love, Roseanne, Elizabeth Taylor and Laura Dern." Believe it or not, Roseanne has solemnly declared, "Everything I believe in has come from Kabbalah."

What amuses or irritates genuine students of Kabbalah is the superficiality of the new and eager seekers. They are convinced that before you approach Jewish mysticism you must have a firm grounding in classic Jewish texts. Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg, an acknowledged scholar of Judaism, is scathing in his disapproval. "The notion that the Kabbalah can be taught to people who have absolutely no prior background in Jewish learning merely means that like magpies they are pecking away at a body they do not understand."

The basic text of Jewish mysticism is the Zohar, written in the 13th century by Moses de Leon, a Spanish scholar. A few centuries later in Safed, in what was then Palestine, Isaac Luria and his followers added to the occult tradition with a series of innovative and imaginative formulations. The chassidic movement of the 19th century adopted some of these ideas and added others that included a pantheistic view of the universe.

Books about all phases of Jewish mysticism are now legion – from general, popular introductions to guide books on the practical aspects of the subject. The Way Into Jewish Mystical Tradition offers an unusual approach. It makes use of 50 biblical verses, classical maxims and phrases and develops from them interpretations to be found in a variety of texts – rabbinic, medieval and chassidic.

In a concise and helpful definition of mysticism, the author writes "A mystic believes that, beneath the apparent contradictions, brokenness, and discord of this everyday world lies a hidden divine unity. Just beyond the radar screens of our five senses, all being is one luminous organism. Religion is a system of sacred word and gesture designed to increase the likelihood we will remember that it's all one, or, as we Jews say, God is One. Or, as the Chassidim used to say, 'Altz is Gott, It's all God!'"

The Gift of Kabbalah, written by a teacher of religion at the University of California, is a guide to the vocabulary, basic ideas and practical wisdom of Kabbalah. It attempts to link ancient ideas with the modern quest for spiritual meaning. The material is involved and requires from the reader close reading and perseverance.

In a final chapter on techniques for spiritual growth, the author includes rather far out material on astrology and visualization of colours – all in relation to the sefirot, the ten divine energies manifested in every process of creation.

Yiddishkeit on the Yellow River

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

One of the most remarkable Jewish genealogical record books is a 340-year-old parchment manuscript of more than 100 pages, belonging to the Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati.

Dating from about 1660, the manuscript records the lineages of the eight Jewish clans then in Kaifeng, China. All of the city's roughly 1,000 Jews used only seven surnames: Ai, Chang, Chao, Chin, Kao, Li and Shih.

The register was written with two pens, a wide one for Chinese calligraphy and a narrower one for Hebrew characters. "The mere fact that it was the only Chinese-Hebrew manuscript I had ever laid my hands on, and presumably the only one in existence, proved a magnetic attraction in itself," noted its American translator, Berthold Laufer, in 1930.

Interestingly, the names on the register correspond with names on an 1663 inscription in Kaifeng's former synagogue, which listed contributors to a rebuilding fund after a 1642 flood.

Although some Kaifeng Jews claimed descent from the lost tribes of Israel, they likely came from Persia or India as Radanites, a tribe of Jewish traders along the Silk Road, in the 8th or 9th century. The synagogue was built about 1163.

In the 13th century, Marco Polo met Jews in China and noted that Kubla Khan knew of them. But news of this exotic community did not reach Europe until 1605, when a Jesuit missionary, Matteo Ricci, met an accomplished Kaifeng Jew, Ai T'ien, in Beijing.

In the 16th century, more Jesuits befriended the community, eager to inspect their holy books. Many Christian scholars evidently believed that certain sensitive passages about Jesus had been expunged from the Talmud in Europe, and sought in vain for those passages in China.

At their height, the Jews of Kaifeng observed the Sabbath and holidays, practiced kashrut and circumcision, and prayed facing west towards Jerusalem; they also burned incense in honour of the patriarchs. At Passover they baked cakes without yeast and daubed red paint on their doorposts. Despite much intermarriage, they kept Buddhist idols from the synagogue. As required by law, they proclaimed fealty to the emperor in golden Chinese letters in the synagogue, but above this floated the Hebrew Shema.

Because of its isolation and assimilation, the community fell into an irreversible decline, numbering no more than 250 and losing its Hebrew skills by 1850. "Morning and night, with tears in our eyes and with offerings of incenses do we implore that our religion may again flourish," a diarist lamented. Their synagogue and possessions were sold off piecemeal.

Today at least 100 Kaifeng residents claim Jewish descent. Although their Yiddishkeit has almost entirely disappeared, they insist on being listed as Youtai (Jewish), as opposed to Han (ethnic Chinese), on all certificates of registry.

William Charles White, a Canadian Anglican bishop who spent 40 years in China, returned to Toronto in 1934 and later published Chinese Jews, a definitive collection of scholarly articles about the Kaifeng community (reprinted 1966). He became East Asian curator at the Royal Ontario Museum, which now holds 11 important items from the community.

Beth Tzedec's Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum in Toronto possesses a unique Scroll of Esther decorated with Chinese drawings. Although it's been linked to the Kaifeng community, scholars say the megillah probably came from Shanghai. It will be on display as of Nov. 25.

A fine model of the vanished Kaifeng synagogue is on display at the Beth Hatefutsoth Museum in Tel Aviv.

Of related interest is an exhibit on the Jews of Shanghai opened earlier this month at the Chinese Cultural Centre of Greater Toronto.

Jewish parenting

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"Train up a child in the way he should go and even when he is old he will not depart from it" (Proverbs 22:6) [http://www.breslov.com/bible/Proverbs22.htm#6].

"Honour your father and your mother" (Deuteronomy 20:12) [http:// www.breslov.com/ref /Exodus20.htm#12].

The Torah makes it seem so simple. All parenting has its challenges (and of course, rewards) and Jewish parenting is no exception. Today, Jewish parenting advice from the World Wide Web.

What does it mean to be a Jewish parent and how does it differ from parenting in general? Here's how the Mishpacha.org Web site answers the question: "Being a Jewish parent means utilizing Judaism as a map or guidebook in order to start your family's journey. Jewish values, beliefs, culture, and rituals all serve as entry points through which your family can begin or proceed on its individual Jewish journey. These Jewish practices and traditions will enrich your family's life and encourage you to continue your Jewish parenting."

Browse the Mishpacha.org site for advice on celebrating Jewish holidays as a family and traditional texts on parenting [http://www.mishpacha.org/indexparent.shtml].

All the sites agree that the best way for parents to really communicate is to participate in Jewish activities with their children. Both the Union of American Hebrew Congregations and the Jewish Theological Seminary have prepared sites for parents. The UAHC Jewish Parent has includes blessings, prayers, historical background and suggestions for celebrating the Jewish festivals [http://uahc.org/educate/parent/]. Similarly, the JTS's Together: A Child-Parent Kit presents some delightful suggestions for enjoying the holidays together. For example, the Chanukah section not only tells you about the holiday's traditions, but it also gives you ideas about what to discuss next to the glow of the Chanukah candles:

- Do you think it would have been hard or easy to be a Jew in the time of Mattathias and Judah Maccabee?
- If the candles on the chanukiyah could talk to us, what do they think they'd want to tell us?
- Do you think it's okay for Jewish families to have Christmas trees? [http://learn.jtsa.edu/topics/kids/together/].

When Anne Ludden's son had a birthday, a funny thing happened: "Somehow in turning seven, my son miraculously acquired the ability to know all there is to know about everything all the time."

Ludden says that although her son's new independent streak has made life tough for her, she has found guidance in the Talmud. "Brachot 54a obliges us to bless HaShem, or God, for the bad in one's life in the same way that one blesses God for the good. I can live with this stage of absolute defiance and opposition, because it's a very good thing, after all, that my son is growing up and becoming his own person" [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/2568.html].

How many families have been torn apart by petty bickering and grudges which fester and grow? Several sites look at how to deal with dealing with imperfection – and forgiveness – from a Jewish point of view. Rabbi Hara Person writes that her daughter finds it reassuring the Judaism has a "built-in mechanism for forgiveness. She knows that no matter how angry I get, I will ultimately forgive her. What seems to be especially reassuring to her is that I forgive her not just because I love her, but that because as Jews, it's part of how we start a new year together as a family."

She then talks about her family's variation of the Tashlich ceremony during which sins are ritually cast into a lake or stream during Rosh Hashanah. Members of their family write down on a piece of paper something they regret doing over the past year. They show each other what they have written, and forgive each other. Then they throw the pieces of paper into a plastic tub filled with water and watch their misdeeds dissolve.

"Forgiving and being forgiven enables us as a family to put the last year behind us, to grow, and to enter renewed into the new year" [http://www.clickonjudaism.com/pages/parenting01.html].

Next time, more ideas for raising a mensch.

Rav Shach's aid to Sephardim

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Since the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem, Judaism in the Diaspora has been a decentralized movement. Unlike other religions, we maintain no headquarters, we have no hierarchy structure nor any sort of umbrella organization. Indeed, Jews do not even possess a single voice that can legitimately claim to represent them as their spokesperson.

And yet, in each generation, despite this apparent chaos, individuals have risen, and through their piety, charisma or scholarship, they have been recognized as our leaders. None have ever been nominated to these positions, and no one is appointed or elected to them. They have become what they are because of who they are, and so they are recognized by the Jewish world.

On Friday, Nov. 2, at the age of 107, Rav Eliezer Shach passed away. Hours later, every shop was shuttered in Bnei Brak, and it was closed to all motor vehicle traffic in anticipation of the funeral. Thousands of parked buses lined the highways leading into the city. Along them, an endless silent sea of people marched towards the centre of town, to the Ponovitch Yeshiva. Four hundred thousand people attended. This was easily the largest funeral in the history of the Jewish people since biblical times.

Rav Shach was the undisputed leader of the Jewish world, its highest authority. His was the very last word in Halachah as it was in policy. This was a position he never sought, one he came to by virtue of neither birthright nor power. Rav Shach attained this role by the sheer will of the Jewish world that conferred their trust in him.

Rav Shach, was many things to many people. This, being a Sephardi column, needs to recognize the rav for what he was to the Sephardim – the single figure of greatest influence for Sephardi Jewry in the past 50 years.

In the '50s, the State of Israel was young. It was quickly absorbing huge numbers of Sephardim – Jews displaced from Arab lands. Rav Shach, an Ashkenazi of Lithuanian decent, readily took their sons into his yeshiva. He himself would personally tutor them, diligently and patiently elevating them to be leaders in their own right. Today, virtually every rosh yeshiva of Sephardi yeshivot in Israel is either a direct student or a student of a student of Rav Shach.

Rav Shach maintained a close contact and remained keenly interested in each of them. When he saw that the Ashkenazi yeshivot had imposed a quota discriminating against the number of Sephardi students they would enrol, Rav Shach pushed for and initiated the opening of Sephardi yeshivot by the dozens. He remained a patron, a guardian and a guide for all of these institutions.

When Rav Shach felt that the Aguda party, the political movement of which he himself was the spiritual leader, was in breach of its own promise to its constituent Sephardim, he immediately mandated the Sephardim to form their own separate party and on its first election, he himself cast his personal ballot for them!

The present Torah scholarship that the Sephardi Jew in Israel enjoys, with its all top-notch yeshivot, its nation-wide Maayan Torani educational network, the considerable political clout it has through the Shas party – the third largest in the Knesset – is wholly due to the single-handed determination of Rav Eliezer Man Shach z'l to advance the cause of the Sephardi.

Israel's ambassador to Poland comes full circle

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Holocaust can be seen as the start of a new era of compassion and tolerance says Szewach Weiss, Israel's ambassador to Poland.

"I believe in a better life after the Holocaust. The price was terrible and we can never forget the agony, but today, every human being has a name. There is a post-war new world," he said.

Holocaust Education Week

Weiss, a Polish-born Holocaust survivor, is chair of the Yad Vashem Council, a former speaker of the Knesset, and a professor of political science at the University of Haifa. He was here recently on a 24-hour visit, his first to Canada.

He spoke at a Holocaust Education Week program sponsored by Bialik Hebrew Day School and Habonim Dror Youth Organization, as well as at a breakfast meeting sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

He said that the Nazis not only murdered six million Jews, they murdered those who did not have a chance to come into the world.

Szewach Weiss

"They murdered the next generation and the third generation, and it happened in Europe under the umbrella of European civic culture... The Holocaust was the collapse of all Christian values," he said.

There are many interpretations of why the Holocaust happened and what could be behind such evil, Weiss said,.

"In the '70s and '80s there was a [belief] that every nation has in its history an anarchist and dark period, that it is a normal part of the history of nations."

There were dark periods, for example, in Germany, Russia, Vietnam and Cambodia, he said. "That is a chilling universalization of the Holocaust."

Weiss said another interpretation contends that the Holocaust was a dark period of human behaviour; a struggle between God's way and the satanic way.

"If so, maybe it will put a Jewish [point of view] in the world initiative – to struggle against the power of darkness and evil."

Today, he said, we have democracy, and "I hope we have the power to struggle against evil activity. During World War II, our cry was not part of organized world opinion.

"We are the last generation of Holocaust survivors. I think the next generation has the power, strong will and vital energy to bridge between our agony and the next generation."

As a Holocaust survivor, Weiss said, it is not easy to serve as ambassador to Poland. "The majority of Polish Jews in Israel and [North America] have anti-Polish feelings. Poland is the cemetery of the Jewish nation.

"The Holocaust was not a Polish initiative and the Poles were also victims of the Nazis, but the anti-Semitic atmosphere is there. Some of them murdered Jews, but there were more than 6,000 Righteous Among the Nations. There is a complexity of bad and good feelings, of love and hate. Every day, I have ambivalent feelings vis-a-vis the Poles."

His decision to accept his post was not a political one, he said. "It was a coming back to touch the souls of my family and nation. It is not part of my personal redemption; that was done in Israel."

He refused an offer to be ambassador to Germany, said Weiss, "because I do not have the moral power to visit there. The Holocaust began in Berlin. Without the Nazis, without Hitler, the Holocaust would not have been possible. It was a German production that was a collaboration with all the others."

The current struggle against terrorism, he said, is not an easy one. "It is mission impossible to have an easy victory. We can't use our superpowers against those from fanatic backgrounds who are ready to commit suicide."

As speaker of the Knesset during Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's government, he was involved the Middle East peace process. "I remember that period as one of hope and naiveté but after a generation of bloodshed, I believe in the freedom of dreams.

"I don't have good news [though]. We are trying to renew peace talks with the Palestinians but it is not easy. It may be that the Palestinians have no interest in finishing this conflict. In such a period, we need solidarity around the world."

Exhibit recalls Chinese saviour of wartime Jews

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Asked to recall a singular memory about being a Jewish refugee in Shanghai, Eric Goldstaub of Toronto doesn't pause. "I remember everything," he said. "Life was interesting and challenging. But when you're young, everything is interesting and challenging."

Holocaust Education Week

Goldstaub adapted well to his war-era refuge. He and his family lived in Shanghai for a decade – even for four years after World War II ended – and he found gainful work as a cosmetics salesman and an importer.

Last week, while gazing at a panel of photographs of his youthful self and his clan living and frolicking in Shanghai, Goldstaub recalled those days as happy and safe. "I have nothing but the greatest respect for the Chinese people," he said.

Now a hale 80, Goldstaub owes his life to a little-known saviour of wartime Jews. While stationed in Vienna from 1938 to 1940, Chinese consul general Dr. Feng Shan Ho issued thousands of life-saving visas to Jews, despite orders from his government to stop, and even after he was reprimanded for his actions.

In all, some 18,000 Viennese, German and Polish Jews found sanctuary from the Nazis in the teeming, cosmopolitan port of Shanghai, China's largest city, which was already home to a Jewish community of Iraqis, Indians and Russians. There, under Chinese officials and Japanese military occupiers, the Jews flourished. Holidays were celebrated, there was kosher food, and children went to classes. But above all, Adolf Hitler and Germany were half a world away.

The feeling one gets when viewing Jews in Shanghai: The Story of Survival, a remarkable exhibit that opened last Monday as part of Holocaust Education Week, is that while the refugees found a haven free of anti-Semitism and danger, it wasn't all easy going.

"It was very hard for my parents," Goldstaub recalled. "They had it rough. They lost everything and had to start over in a place that was welcoming but still very different and strange."

The exhibit, at the Chinese Cultural Centre of Greater Toronto (5183 Sheppard Ave. E.), chronicles Ho's heroics, as well as Jewish life in Shanghai before, during and after the war (with photographs of the Hongkou Jewish "ghetto" and other Jewish sites in the city); first-person recollections, videos, artifacts; and the records of several Toronto Jewish families who lived in Shanghai between 1938 and 1948.

Gathering for last week's cross-cultural opening were leaders from the Chinese and Jewish communities, Senator Vivienne Poy, Ontario Attorney General David Young and the consuls general of China and Israel.

Joining them was Ho's daughter, Manli Ho. She recalled that her father, who died in 1997, spoke only about two events during his days in Vienna: Hitler's triumphant entrance into the city following Germany's annexation of Austria in 1938, and how "appalled" he was at the Nazis' brutality toward Jews; and Kristallnacht, the night of Nov. 10, 1938, when Nazi stormtroopers smashed Jewish shops and torched synagogues.

Her father, Ho said, once faced down the Gestapo to rescue some Jewish friends with his prized visas. His death-defying efforts led to his induction a year ago as a Righteous Among the Nations at Israel's Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial.

Why did he do it? "If you knew my father," she said, "you would have known a man who lived his life according to the best of Confucian and Judeo-Christian values." Indeed, the exhibit quotes her father as explaining his acts thus: "From the standpoint of humanity, this is the way it should be."

That philosophy led Ho to issue an average 500 visas a month. At one point, the Chinese government punished the diplomat with a demerit. Undaunted, he persisted, issuing as many as 900 of the precious documents monthly.

Eighteen of those went to a young Goldstaub, who visited some 50 foreign missions in Vienna (including Canada's) to beg for exit visas for him and his extended family, after being forced to scrub the streets of Vienna in the wake of Kristallnacht. China's was his last stop.

Recently, the World Monuments Fund added Shanghai's Ohel Rachel synagogue, built in 1920, to its 2002 Watch List of the 100 Most Endangered Sites. In 1993, the city declared the Sephardic shul a historic landmark, affording it some protection. The city's only other synagogue, Ohel Moshe, has been turned into a museum.

Programs relating to the exhibit included lectures last week by Prof. Guang Pan, dean of the Centre for Jewish Studies in Shanghai and author of two books on the Jewish experience in China; and Dr. Joseph Du, chair of Winnipeg's Chinese Cultural & Community Centre, where the exhibit showed earlier this year.

This Sunday at Toronto's Chinese cultural centre, a public forum to be chaired by Karen Shopsowitz (whose film, A Place to Save Your Life, is included in the exhibit), will take place at 2 p.m.

The exhibit runs to Dec. 22. For details, call 416-292-9293.

The Jewish community realized the importance of learning to confront anti-Semitism when it attended the World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, in September, he added.

"We saw there how an agenda can be hijacked with anti-Semitic and anti-Israel statements, and we have to be educated in order to counter it."

One of Durban's biggest legacies, Landy said, is that we now wonder how we can say business as usual, when we saw human rights organizations who came to Durban and failed to speak out in a forceful way.

"As Jews, we have always rushed to assist [those in need]. Maybe it is time to pause and see if we should continue to involve ourselves when others are unwilling to involve themselves."

While in Israel, Landy met with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Canadian Foreign Minister John Manley, who was travelling through the country.

"We talked about the importance of fighting terrorism and recognizing terrorism no matter where it occurs, whether it is in New York, in Washington or in Tel Aviv."

The message that Manley – as well as other western leaders – brought was that the international community was not going to intervene in the dispute between Israel and the Palestinians, said Landy.

"That is a dispute that has to be settled between them. Yasser Arafat was put on notice that it is up to him to control extremists and get back to the negotiating table."

While the previous plenary, held five years ago, had about 4,000 delegates, this year's plenary had only 600, said Landy.

"The Americans are afraid to fly, and that is unfortunate because Israelis are getting on with their lives.

"The question I pose, is: 'Can you imagine a world where there is no Israel?' For 2,000 years we cried for a country, and now that we have it we are deterring ourselves from going.

"If it is already established that bad things happen at home, why not show our resolve to support the State of Israel?"

He is not minimizing the fact that parents sending their children to Israel are sending them to what is essentially a war zone, he said, "but as Jews we have been through so much in our history. This is something we should be able to overcome.

"If we do not support Israel now, when is a better time? Now is the time to travel there. One has to weigh how slight the risks are with how many terrible things can happen in life. We have to focus on the positive, and the positive is that Israel needs us."

As Canadians, he said, we can't put our children in the Israeli army, but we can go and visit the country.

"It does not help to hear great pontification from leaders who talk about helping Israel, if they are not willing to lead. Our leadership needs to lead the way.

"We need to ask ourselves if European Jews in the '20s and '30s would have travelled to Israel under any circumstances. What would they be saying now?"

Among the draft resolutions presented at the plenary assembly were a condemnation of terrorism and anti-Semitism, the recognition of the centrality of Jerusalem in Jewish life, a recognition of the tragedy of the Jews compelled to leave Arab lands and having it placed on the international agenda, and a call to those countries that have yet to enact legislation for the restitution of Holocaust-era assets in Europe and elsewhere to do so.

Anti-terrorism bill

protests that may turn violent or be contrary to existing law, reprehensible though this would be."

Updating and revising lists of terrorists for the purposes of the law "is absolutely essential," CJC stated.

Congress also commended Ottawa for including in the bill the criminalizing of fundraising for terrorists and allowing for the deregistration of charities or denial of tax-exempt status to groups that raise funds for terrorists.

Congress urged the government to regularly publish a list of specific terrorist organizations so fund-raisers and the public know which groups they are dealing with.

CJC also welcomed additional hate crimes legislation that was prompted by a rise in hate-related activities following Sept. 11, including attacks on at least 18 synagogues in Canada. It especially lauded Criminal Code amendments that would make attacks on property used primarily for religious worship a serious offence, above and beyond mischief or vandalism.

Congress recommended further amendments to protect all religious and communal properties, whether or not they are used for religious purposes, including schools, cemeteries and temporary structures.

Congress would also like to see amendments that would make it a serious offence to make threats against an identifiable community, whether by mail, telephone, e-mail or any other means of communication.

"While much of the debate has been about what kind of power is given to government, it all seems to boil down to this problem: Do we take seriously the threat of international terrorism coming to Canada?" said CJC Ontario region chair Ed Morgan.

Congress rejected calls for a sunset clause for any law that is passed, saying that would only complicate and hamstring the international war on terrorism.

Morgan said the proposed three-year review by Parliament is sufficient.

New president wants to raise JNF profile

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sandy Posluns, new president of Jewish National Fund of Canada, is determined to make the organization a household name.

"My generation was brought up with JNF blue boxes, and with the organization now in its 100th year, we want to make sure the next generation knows who we are and what we do," said Posluns, who is taking over from Naomi Frankenburg of Vancouver.

Sandy Posluns

Posluns, who recently completed her term as JNF Toronto president, was brought up in the Parkdale area of the city where she was one of the only Jewish students at her high school.

"This was the late 1940s, and I learned a lot about anti-Semitism, but I also learned about tzedakah from my parents. Giving to others was a family tradition," she said.

When she married Alan Posluns, also a former Toronto and national JNF president, she became involved in a number of Jewish organizations. "It was a family affair. My father-in-law Abe was called Mr. Baycrest because of his work there."

She has been with the women's auxiliary of Baycrest Centre "for about 400 years," and among her other community activities, she has been involved with Toronto Hadassah-WIZO and Mount Sinai Hospital.

She became involved with JNF when her father-in-law was the Negev Dinner honoree in 1984. "Community work is my job. It is my payback for having a wonderful life."

Posluns, who tries to visit Israel about twice a year arrived home from her last trip on Sept. 10. "The country was very quiet. While there, I met with JNF executives about the organization's centennial celebrations, and we were the only people staying at the hotel."

While in Israel, Posluns was chosen to speak at the home of Israeli President Moshe Katsav on behalf of JNF worldwide. "I talked about how important it is for Diaspora Jews to maintain a connection with Israel, and to visit the country."

When she goes to Israel, she says, she always goes to Ben Yehudah Street in Jerusalem after Shabbat – an area known for its night life – because "it lifts my heart to see young people walking on the promenade and enjoying themselves. They are not allowing terrorism to change their lives. That is their way of saying they are not afraid."

She planted her first tree in Israel in 1982, she says, and "I still remember the shock I felt at putting my hands in Israel's earth. I remember that feeling every time I plant a tree. It is very emotional."

During her two-year term, which can renewed for a second term, she wants to make people aware that when they give to JNF, they "contribute to the land of Israel. Our generation and the generation before us planted trees, and we have to teach our children how to water those trees."

Much of JNF's work also revolves around land and water, said Posluns, "and our big focus at this time is building 100 new water reservoirs. "In the middle of a drought, Israel is keeping its obligation with Jordan to keep that country with a water supply. It is a matter of water and a matter of keeping peace," she said.

JNF is planning a 100th anniversary trip to Israel in April which will include a tour of JNF projects.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I frequently eat lunch at dairy restaurants around Toronto. I am trying to eat lower-fat, lower-calorie lunches. What are good choices in these type of restaurants?

A. I recommend that lunch always include protein, so some of the following are excellent, filling, low-fat and low-calorie choices.

Try gefilte fish with horseradish or a salad with a tin of tuna or a hard boiled egg (dressing on the side); an eggwhite omelette with vegetables, mushrooms, onions, etc., with whole wheat, rye or pumpernickle toast (not a bagel); and fruit. Or order a scoop of pressed or cottage cheese with fruit or sliced raw vegetables, and cabbage vegetable, or chicken noodle soup. Poached eggs on toast are another possibility. These choices will all fill you up for the afternoon and not give you too much fat or too many calories.

Q. I really find it hard to not have some kind of evening snack before going to bed, although I know I really don't need to be eating then. Do you have any suggestions for reasonable yet satisfying snacks?

A. Most times evening eating is either emotional, as a subconscious reward for a busy or hard time, or eating out of habit or boredom in front of the TV. If you identify that you are, in fact, not really hungry then you want to make a choice that will satisfy your "emotional needs," your cravings, and not contribute a lot of fat or calories. I find the best choice is a hot drink. It can be coffee or tea, herbal tea, light hot chocolate, or clear chicken broth. These all take a long time to drink and will truly satisfy and shut off your desire. Try it!

CONFERENCE ON JEWISH MATERIAL CLAIMS AGAINST GERMANY

Important Announcement

The deadline for compensation for the slave and forced labor program is December 31, 2001. This notice is for individuals who have not already filed an application with the Claims Conference.

If during the Second World War, prior to or during German occupation, you were persecuted as a Jew and were:

- In a concentration camp or a ghetto or another place of confinement under comparable conditions of hardship and forced to work (considered as slave labor in the German Foundation Law); or
- In a place of confinement under the auspices of the Nazi regime or its allies where freedom of movement was restricted; or
- Forced to work including while living at home and this persecution occurred under German occupation or in territory controlled by German allies (including Bulgaria, Romania, Hungary, Slovakia, Croatia, Italy, etc.), you may be eligible for a payment from the German Foundation "Remembrance, Responsibility and the Future" and / or the Swiss Banks Settlement.

Persons who were forced to work in Tunisia under German occupation or in Libya during the war may also be eligible.

The German Foundation Law provides for specific payments for slave laborers (as defined in the Foundation Law) and therefore funds may not be available to make payments for all of the categories listed above.

Persons who were forced to work during World War II under the auspices of the Nazi regime or its allies, for little or no remuneration, because they were Jewish, may also be entitled to a payment from the Swiss Banks Settlement. No separate application form is necessary.

The heir(s) of eligible persons, where the eligible person died on or after 16 February 1999, can also apply. If a claim was submitted and the applicant subsequently dies, the heir(s) must contact the Claims Conference within six months of the date of death.

If you have previously filed an application with the Claims Conference for slave or forced labor there is no need to fill out any additional application.

If you have not already filed an application, please do so immediately as the Claims Conference must receive applications by 31 December 2001.

Applications are available on the website of the Claims Conference

War on terror will be long and bloody: Krauthammer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If the United States does not win its war on Afghanistan, the war on terrorism will be lost, according to Washington, D.C.-based pundit Charles Krauthammer.

But the Pulitzer Prize-winning syndicated columnist – who spoke at a UJA Federation Campaign 2002 Major Gifts dinner on Nov. 4 – told a rapt audience of 525 people at the Four Seasons Hotel that the war cannot end with Afghanistan. It will end in Iraq, where it should have ended 10 years ago, he said.

Charles Krauthammer

Iraqi president Saddam Hussein "has the weapons that no other despot has ever had in history."

"Iraq is where the war will end, but I'm not sure how it will end, because with bin Laden, we may have already crossed the nuclear and biological threshold."

A psychiatrist by training – or as he put it, a psychiatrist in remission – Krauthammer quipped that in his former profession, "the deluded and grandiose did not have access to nuclear weapons."

Although he admitted to painting a "gloomy" picture, the Washington Post and Time magazine columnist said he believes America will succeed. "But it will be difficult, long and bloody, and we will need all the help we can get."

The war on Afghanistan, ostensibly to go after Osama bin Laden, actually has as its main objective the toppling of the country's Taliban government, Krauthammer said. U.S. President George W. Bush's doctrine of holding responsible any government that harbours terrorists should have been implemented 10 or 20 years ago, he added.

"You have to make the governments that provide haven to terrorists fear for their lives. Nothing short of that would work. We have to make the world understand that if you're an enemy of the United States, you're in grave danger."

The response of the other Islamic states will depend entirely on America's success in Afghanistan, Krauthammer said. "The way to determine who will be in our coalition is by winning the war. The Arab states follow a winner, and they're waiting to see who wins. They don't want to be on the losing side."

America will never "win the Arab street," he noted. "We will never earn their love or affection, but we can earn their respect."

A victory in Afghanistan would give the United States the ability to go to Syria – which Krauthammer termed "a very pragmatic country" – and say, "Look what happened in Afghanistan. Cough up Hezbollah."

In Iran, he envisions a rise in current anti-government feelings and a renewed friendship with America.

The current war, he said, is different because it is a "war of necessity," and the first war in America's history where Americans' own existence and security are at stake.

"Americans, at least my generation [he was born in 1950], have only experienced wars of choice. You can lose a war of choice and survive as a nation."

Krauthammer, who is known for his conservative views, lauded Bush, comparing the depth and conviction of the president's post-Sept. 11 speech before the U.S. Congress to John F. Kennedy's inaugural address and Franklin Delano Roosevelt's speech after Pearl Harbor. "I think [Bush's speech] was one of the great speeches in American history."

Krauthammer bemoaned the "preposterous, dangerous and delusional" approach to terrorism taken in the past, treating previous terrorist acts as criminal rather than as acts of war. "It was a way to keep our heads in the sand."

The attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon marked a turning point, said Krauthammer. "Nothing after will resemble anything before."

The events changed the focus of his speech, which was originally intended to address mainly Israel and the future of the conflict in the Middle East, an issue he discussed in a question-and-answer session following his talk.

Krauthammer said he doesn't believe peace is possible at the moment between the Israelis and Palestinians. "Today I believe it's a cruel hope. In the end I think there will be a peace, but it may not be one that my generation will see. The best we can hope for is a series of armistices."

The hatred and anti-Semitism that is being taught to Palestinian children is "of a kind unseen anywhere in the world since the Third Reich. If you're interested in ending a conflict, you prepare your people for a compromise. That's what Israel did."

Although he noted that American interests don't always coincide with Israel's interests, Krauthammer said he believes that Bush "has very good instincts on Israel." If the early stages of the war on terrorism are successful, it will have a "remarkable" effect on the Arab-Israeli conflict, he said.

Krauthammer believes Israel faces a greater danger now than at any time since 1948, with the possible exception of 1973.

"That's why Israel needs your support – because the conflict will go on and on... For now the other side rejects Israel's right to exist. Until it accepts it, we can only have war."

Compromise needed for peace, says Israeli author

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Amos Oz, one of Israel's foremost novelists, has called for a historic compromise to break the cycle of strife between Israel and the Palestinians.

"What we need is a partition – a historical compromise," Oz said recently at Holy Blossom Temple, delivering the Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman lecture.

Appraising Israel's conflict with the Palestinians as "a clash between right and right," Oz urged Israel and the Palestinians to aim for a two-state solution based very roughly on the pre-1967 borders.

Oz said that both sides realize that partition is a necessity. "Gone are the days when most Arabs believe Israel will disappear."

Any agreement, he said, should contain strict security provisions, provide a solution for Palestinian refugees and be guaranteed by outside powers.

Oz, a Peace Now advocate, demanded that Palestinian refugees be resettled anywhere but inside Israel.

"An influx of refugees into Israel will lead to two Palestinian states."

He warned that Israel will not enjoy security unless the needs of the refugees are addressed.

Intractable issues, such as the final status of Jerusalem's holy places, will have to be deferred.

In Oz's view, about 70 percent of Israelis and Palestinians would be prepared to accept the broad outline of such an accord.

Summing up his credo, Oz said he believes "in peace, not appeasement; in compromise, not capitulation."

Israelis and Palestinians perfectly understand each other, he said. Both covet the same small land.

Israel's dispute with the Palestinians is not about religion, but Arab and Jewish radicals are trying to turn it into one.

"Deep down, it's an international conflict over real estate, which makes it easier, though not easy, to resolve."

Although both regard themselves as victims, they do not perceive each other that way.

Israelis and Palestinians must learn to coexist. Quoting the late Yitzhak Rabin on the sixth anniversary of his assassination, he said, "Make peace with the enemy, because it is the enemy."

Oz said the Palestinians miscalculated in rejecting Ehud Barak's offer of territorial compromise. No future Israeli government "can go further."

Amos Oz

The Palestinians, naively, thought that Barak's electoral defeat would usher in a right-wing Israeli government that would plunge Israel into international isolation and force it to make sweeping political concessions, he said.

Referring to the current intifadah, Oz noted it has brought the Palestinians little more than misery and near-starvation conditions, a situation for which the Palestinian leadership must take the lion's share of blame.

"Many Palestinians are bitterly disillusioned by the decision to resort to violence."

Briefly reviewing the demise of the Oslo accords since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising, Oz said they had been breached by both sides.

Speaking of the Sept. 11 Arab terrorist attacks in the United States, Oz said violent fanaticism and zealotry are humanity's worst enemies.

The roots of political fanaticism, he explained, lie in "uncompromising righteousness."

Fanatics, Oz added, want to change people rather than let them be. "The fanatic is a great altruist. He wants to save your soul and redeem you."

The vast majority of Muslims, however, are greatly embarrassed by their home-grown fanatics.

Oz said that the cure for fanaticism is humour, a sense of relativism and the ability to see two sides of an issue.

In an attempt to understand the causes of Muslim rage, he pointed out that European colonialism humiliated and exploited the Arab world.

A great civilization was morally shattered and degraded by Western imperialism, he said.

At the outset of his talk, Oz read excerpts, in Hebrew and English, from his latest work, The Same Sea.

He described it as a novel about "a peace process and a mystical merger."

COBI LEON: BRAVE DETERMINATION

Cobi, a soldier in an elite unit and his crew were selected to lead a complex and ultimately successful IDF action into the central sector of southern Lebanon.

After an exhausting night, while trudging back to Israeli territory, a roadside bomb laid by the Hezbollah exploded. An officer and a member of the combat force were killed instantly; Cobi, only 20 years old, was seriously wounded by shrapnel which had penetrated his neck and was pressing on his spine. He was told that he would never walk again.

With Cobi's strong determination and the rehabilitation support he receives at the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv, he is now able to walk assisted by crutches.

"Beit Halochem has become my second home. It's a place where I feel comfortable and can fit in. The therapy that I receive there has helped to restore my muscle strength and my confidence.

"I enjoy sailing, basketball, swimming, tennis and especially the 'Hiking Club'. I am crazy about the outdoors and driving in my 4x4 ATV is as close as I can get to what I once fantasized about. I can leave the highways and smell nature with my friends from Beit Halochem.

"Thank you for caring about us and building a 'home for the warriors'."

South Sudanese fighting North's 'holy war'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As the world turns its attention to the war in Afghanistan, little if any attention is being paid to another conflict-ridden area of the world that also bears the unmistakable imprint of Islamic holy war.

In Sudan, a civil war that has raged on and off for 46 years continues to run its bloody course, with the Muslim North attempting to suppress a separatist movement in the Christian and animist South. What's worse for the blacks of that sad African nation, who have had to contend with famine, disease and the North's devastating firepower, slavery has been imposed as another weapon in the North's arsenal against the South.

A south Sudanese refugee painted a grim picture of life under the northern Islamic regime for a recent meeting of Blacks & Jews in Dialogue. Manock Achuil Lual, a member of the Dinka people of south Sudan, told the group that more than 2.5 million south Sudanese have been killed in the civil war since 1955 and another 4.5 million have been displaced internally.

Since slavery was reintroduced in the mid-1980s by former Prime Minister Sadiq el Mahdi, grandson of the Islamic leader who defeated British Gen. Charles Gordon in Khartoum in 1885, the war has become particularly brutal. Northern militias have ventured into the South to "loot, capture and take into slavery Dinka women and children," Lual said. The Dinka's cattle have been stolen, their villages and crops destroyed.

Women taken into slavery were raped, forced to undergo female genital mutilation and turned into sex slaves or domestic workers, Lual said. Others were sold in markets. Boys were put to work tending cattle, their leg tendons cut to prevent them from running away.

Fearing that educated southerners might stir up trouble or serve as opposition leaders, northerners ensured that southern blacks were made to "disappear." Moreover, soldiers of the Sudan People's Liberation Army (SPLA) taken in battle are routinely shot, Lual said.

Lual, a sociologist by training, said Muslims have been encroaching on black lands since the 16th century, seizing the country's resources and ignoring the needs of the South. Islam, he said, has been used by the North's fundamentalist government to oppress the South. The civil war erupted when it appeared the North was reneging on a power-sharing agreement and removing the black military brigade that protected southerners.

Southerners no longer want to live in a unified state, Lual said. Southerners would rather see "a neat cut, separation, to create two countries in Sudan...We don't trust the Arabs anymore".

The northern Arabs, who account for only 39 percent of the country's population, "dominate, enslave and exploit people who look like me," he said. "The Arab minority looks towards the Arab world as where they belong. We Africans don't want to belong to that world. We look south, to Congo and the Central African Republic as our world."

Blacks & Jews in Dialogue, which has a membership of 320, is a project of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada in conjunction with Ghanian, Jamaican, Somali and other African communities.

Shul launches study bursary

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A scholarship fund has been set up by Shaar Shalom Synagogue to provide a bursary to students from the shul.

The Sharon Diamond and Walt Family Fund was established to provide assistance to young adults who want to pursue Jewish studies or other Jewish cultural and heritage programs at the university level.

The fund also co-sponsors educational lectures at the synagogue.

Coming from diverse backgrounds, this year's five bursary recipients were chosen with the belief that they "will continue to conduct themselves as ambassadors for the Jewish people," said Manfred Walt, a benefactor and member of the fund's scholarship committee.

Each one of this year's scholarship recipients has been actively involved in community work in the past.

Sarah Cohen participated in the Birthright Israel program and is currently working towards a BA in anthropology and ancient near and Middle Eastern civilization at the University of Toronto. She hopes to eventually pursue a PhD in the field.

Shawn Fried is a dean's list graduate from the University of Toronto with a BSc in human biology and has co-authored several publications resulting from his research at the Hospital for Sick Children. He will be studying Jewish medical ethics at Oxford University.

Currently studying in the Jewish Teachers' Education Program at York University, Daniel Held is also the educational director of Jewish Students for Jewish Continuity. During a year of study at Bar Ilan University in Israel, Held worked with an Ethiopian community, a group of youth from Ukraine and children in the Shomron.

A second year student at McGill University, Jordana Mednick, is majoring in Jewish studies, with a focus on Hebrew language and literature. Mednick has received various awards for her studies in languages and has volunteered her time at She'arim Hebrew Day School and Holy Blossom Nursery School.

Stephanie Schwartz is currently completing a BA at McGill University where she is majoring in cultural studies and world religions. As an international exchange student at the University of Leeds, Schwartz hopes to participate in the Leeds Jewish community.

Jews must follow laws of land, rabbi says

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The halachic imperative for Jews to obey the law of the land in which they live – dina d'malchuta dina – must be tempered with an understanding of the parameters of the mitzvah, said Rabbi Michael Broyde in a recent lecture.

The injunction assumes the government in question "is a righteous government that aims to be good to its citizens," he said, referring to democratic countries like the United States, Canada and Israel.

Rabbi Broyde is a law professor at Emory University in Atlanta, spiritual leader of Young Israel Congregation in the same city, and a dayan (judge) in the Beth Din of America.

His speech at Netivot HaTorah Day School was sponsored by the S. Daniel Abraham and Ira L. Rennert Torah Ethics Project of The Orthodox Caucus.

Rabbi Broyde used the concept of mesira – informing on fellow Jews who commit crimes – to illustrate some of the issues surrounding dina d'malchuta dina.

According to Hazal, the rabbinic sages, while one is certainly obligated to obey secular law, that obligation does generally not extend to informing on a fellow Jew who is not obeying.

This issue comes up particularly when dealing with an inherently unjust legal system that responds to major and minor crimes the same way, or treats Jews differently from non-Jews, Rabbi Broyde said.

For example, a Jewish thief in Nazi Germany in 1936 would hardly be dealt with in an appropriate or fair manner.

The exceptions – which apply to whatever kind of legal system one is faced with – are crimes of violence, where an individual or society as a whole is in danger.

For crimes such as murder, rape, child molestation, selling guns or removing the centre column from a building under construction, there is no question that the authorities should be notified, Rabbi Broyde said.

On the other hand, he added, there are times when, while it might be allowable to inform the public authorities, "I am not sure it would be appropriate." For example, he said, if a town forbids the daytime watering of lawns during the hot months, telling authorities about a neighbour who does so is hardly appropriate.

Speeding on a road where everyone else is travelling the same speed, and where the police do not enforce that limit, is another example, he said.

A dispute arises when, in Rabbi Broyde's words, "the conduct is a little dangerous," such as theft of money without violence. While Rabbi Moshe Feinstein ruled that one may not inform in that case, others say that one can, if the person is a perpetual thief.

The Orthodox Caucus, founded in 1992, is a leadership group comprised of rabbis, educators and lay leaders to address challenges facing Orthodoxy and the Jewish world today in a practical manner. The Torah Ethics Project aims to harmonize ritual and ethical issues. Each year, a different issue is highlighted, and programs are arranged for different age groups and for communities as a whole. The Toronto organizers are Rabbi Jay Kelman and Ilana Kelman.

Coverage of Israel improving: TVO host

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The media's coverage of Israel in the post-Sept. 11 era has improved markedly, contends a well-known Jewish journalist and television host.

For one, the media have shifted their emphasis away from Israel in Mideast coverage, and "I'm guessing most of you hope it stays that way," TVOntario personality Steve Paikin told a Jewish Book Fair audience recently.

"Most Jews are comfortable when Israel is not in the news at all," Paikin said at an informal talk. But of late, previously unbalanced and even hostile reporting of events in Israel has been replaced by a new even-handedness, he said. "My sense is that coverage is now better than it used to be. It's as even-handed as I've seen in the last 20 years."

An accurate barometer of that, Paikin said, has been the reporting of Neil McDonald of CBC's The National. McDonald's reports from Israel and environs "used to be one of the worst examples. During the intifadah, they were horrendously unbalanced." Now, Paikin said, "they're not nearly as bad. They're a lot less vicious."

For now, "Jews and Israel are not the focus of the story. Islam is." Paikin argued that the media and their consumers will have to develop a "better and deeper" understanding of Islam – "the Islam we respect, not the rejectionist, radical, destructive Islam of Osama bin Laden."

Paikin, co-host of TVOntario's Studio 2, spent a good deal of time defending Eric Margolis, a controversial panelist on Diplomatic Immunity, a weekly current affairs show Paikin hosts.

"There's very little Eric Margolis says that I agree with," Paikin said, conceding that Margolis is known for his pro-Arab sympathies. "But we are in the business of presenting balance. He's not such a bad guy."

Paikin was also on hand to plug his new book, The Life – The Siren Song of Politics. In it he interviewed over 100 politicians at all levels on what drew them to their profession.

Politics, said Paikin, a self-confessed political junkie, is a thankless job but still a noble one. After writing the book, he said he has no personal ambitions to politics, in fact, "even less so now."

Adler fills first university chair in Israeli studies

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canada's first university chair in Israeli studies has been filled by a scholar who was born and raised in Uruguay.

Emanuel Adler, who turns 54 on Dec. 15, officially took up his position at the University of Toronto in September.

A dual citizen of Uruguay and Israel, he is the holder of the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Chair in Israeli Studies, based in the department of political science.

It was funded with a $1.5 million gift from the Bronfmans and an additional $1 million grant from U of T.

"This is a wonderful opportunity to study Israel – its history, society and politics – from the distinctive perspective of the development of Israeli identity," explained Adler, a Hebrew University professor who intends to adopt an interdisciplinary approach to the topic.

He is teaching two courses this semester.

The first, expressly designed for the chair, is entitled Becoming Israel: War, Peace and the Politics of Israel's Identity. It traces Israel's identity from the early times of Zionism to the Oslo peace process.

The second is a generic course on the theory of international relations.

Asked to explain the need for a chair in Israeli studies, Adler cited two reasons.

"Israel plays a very important role for Jews in Canada and for the Canadian community in general. What happens in Israel can have repercussions around the world."

In addition, the issues countries face today, ranging from security and terrorism to human rights and globalism, come to the fore in Israel.

"So the study of Israeli politics, in a sense, becomes something broader."

Adler, with degrees from Hebrew University and the University of California (Berkeley), is a specialist in international relations, concentrating on the relationship between knowledge and power.

He is particularly interested in the evolution of international practices and institutions and has examined subjects from arms control and co-operative security to sustainable development.

He also studies theories of conflict resolution, with special emphasis on Israel, the Middle East and the Mediterranean basin.

His books include The Power of Ideology: The Quest for Technological Autonomy in Argentina and Brazil and Power in Transition: The Peaceful Change of International Order.

Currently, he is writing a book on practices in international relations.

Adler, who began his career as a teaching assistant at Hebrew University in 1973, was born in Montevideo.

His father, a hotelier, left Poland in the 1930s, fully expecting his fiancé to join him in Uruguay. World War II intervened, and the couple was separated.

With the help of a gentile, she survived the war in Poland and the couple was eventually reunited through the Red Cross."They were very happy in Uruguay. They had a very tranquil life," Adler said of his parents.

In Montevideo, Adler was active in a Zionist youth movement. "It was very clear that I would go to Israel," he said.

He and his Uruguayan wife, Sylvia, made aliyah in 1970. At the beginning, they lived, worked and studied Hebrew at two kibbutzim: Ginosar, on the shores of the Sea of Galilee, and Mabarot, in the Sharon plain.

Adler's brother, Baruch, also settled in Israel. He is a lawyer, with offices in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

Adler has three children. Yonatan is a soldier in a combat unit. Nadav studies law at Hebrew University. Shirli is a kindergarten teacher in Tel Aviv.

Although he was appointed to his present job in 2000, he was unable to fill it until now. For the next three years, he will teach only the first semester, spending the rest of his time at Hebrew University. Then he will reassess the situation.

His wife, an employee of a Jerusalem foundation, still resides in Israel. Their home, in Baka, is relatively close to the embattled neighbourhood of Gilo, which has come under periodic Palestinian gunfire since the outbreak of the second intifadah.

"You can hear the firing as if it was outside our home. We're only 15 blocks from Gilo as the crow flies."

Politically, Adler describes himself as "a sort of Peace Now" type. "Here, in Canada, I would be labelled as a liberal."

The failure of last year's Camp David summit, pitting former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak against Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, came as a disillusioning blow, but Adler has not succumbed to despair.

The Israelis and the Palestinians can still reach an agreement under which a Palestinian state will coexist with Israel, Adler said. But he is not optimistic they can attain anything more than a kind of truce, "sulcha" rather than "salaam."

As long as the two sides continue to bicker over the status of Jerusalem and the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their former homes in what is now Israel, the Arab-Israeli conflict cannot be solved in its entirety, he said.

For now, while the intifadah rages, a peaceful settlement of the dispute is unlikely. But Adler can envisage an end to the fighting within about a year if the United States intervenes.

"The alternative is a war few want, although this possibility has decreased since the events of Sept. 11. What we have now, as Amos Oz noted, is a clash between two rights."

University of Manitoba to offer Yiddish course

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Good news for Yiddish enthusiasts: the University of Manitoba will be offering a Yiddish course next fall.

"In view of the historical importance as Yiddish as a language and a culture, together with the current worldwide revival of interest in things Yiddish, the faculty of arts is happy to be able to offer residents of Winnipeg an opportunity to study the language," said Robert O'Kell, dean of the Manitoba University's faculty of arts.

The decision to offer an Introductory Yiddish class was made at a recent meeting between David Cohen, executive director of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba; Oscar Antel and Laurie Mainster, from the I.L. Peretz Folk School Endowment Trust; O'Kell; and University of Manitoba faculty of arts professors Lionel Steiman, Rosemarie Finlay and Miroslav Shkandrij.

The idea for the first-ever Yiddish class at a university here came about after suggestions from Professors Finlay and Steiman and the course is the result of years of lobbying by members of the community.

To help with start-up costs, Mainster reported, the Peretz School Board is contributing $15,000, with the Jewish Foundation and the federation putting up smaller amounts for a total of $30,000 over three years.

"We still have some fund-raising to do," Mainster said. "If we exceed our fund-raising goals somewhat, we may have some funds left over for bursaries for some students interested in taking the course."

"The annual cost of each full-year course is $10,000 for the instructor's salary, staff benefits and sundry expenses," O'Kell said.

The initial Yiddish course would be a conversational and reading skills class for beginners. If there is enough student interest, more advanced courses could be added. The instructor is yet to be hired.

McMaster trading floor financier's legacy

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

Dr John Siam, trading floor director, (picture left) explains how to check stock prices to Ben Gould. Inset: Milli and Allen Gould.

HAMILTON — The trading floor at Hamilton's McMaster University business school – the first simulated floor in English Canada – has been named after Allen H. Gould, a highly regarded businessman and entrepreneur who died two years ago.

The floor, which opened in 1999, has 20 computer workstations and two giant digital boards that display the latest market data. Everything in the room – from the set-up of the desks to the Reuters live news feed – resembles an actual brokerage trading floor. It is one of only three in universities across Canada.

Each week, 600 students gain financial market experience through simulated exercises and by preparing monthly reports on real companies. John Siam, the centre's director, says that although it is open 80 hours a week, the room is so popular, he has to restrict students using it to ensure everyone gets a turn.

Because they learn to operate computer programs used by professional traders, the school's graduates can begin work straight away, saving employers about six months' pay and training time.

The trading floor has become well-known in the financial world. Seminars by guest speakers from financial companies turn into impromptu head-hunting sessions.

"One guest speaker was so impressed by a student of ours that he asked to interview her before he left, and she was offered a job on the spot," Siam said.

The room's operating budget – $300,000 a year – includes costly online subscriptions. The Gould family's half-a-million-dollar endowment will itself be invested to allow the program to expand.

The donation was a perfect match. Those who knew him said Gould was passionate about business and investing. He loved to learn, and loved others to succeed. Despite his matter-of-fact, no-nonsense manner, young people sought him out. The family remembers several boys visiting Gould for advice on how to invest their bar mitzvah money. He devised an unusual allowance plan for his own stepsons, Ben and Mark.

"As kids, we were constantly in debt," said Mark. "Dad would invest a sum of money on our behalf for our university education, and each week part of our allowance went to paying him back. Once it was paid off, he'd invest some more, and our debt to him began again. It taught me to leave savings for the long term, not to dig into them.

"Dad was invariably right about many things," he added. "He was uncanny at predictions. Even a few days before he died, he called his advisors and told them not to sell his shares in a company whose prices were going through the roof. Instead he instructed them to wait two more months. Sure enough, the share prices peaked just as he had said."

Gould had managed the family's charitable foundation, and believed in giving back to the local community.

After his death, a student bursary was set up at McMaster University, and the family looked for another fitting tribute to his name. The university's dean took Gould's wife Milli and her sons on a tour, and almost as an afterthought showed them the new trading floor. The moment they walked in, they knew this was the place.

"Dad would have pulled up a chair straight away," said Ben. "He would have loved all this. He had a phenomenal memory, and could talk about stock prices from 25 years ago. Dad had a passion for the business world, and would constantly research companies – even when he went on vacation, he would take a briefcase full of reading."

Gould was born in Pittsburgh. After graduating from the city's university, he began his career in steel. While on vacation in Florida, a friend set him up on a blind date that almost didn't happen.

Milli, his intended date, was born and raised in Hamilton. She had married at the age of 20 and had three children. Tragedy struck when, at the age of 23, her husband and daughter died in a house fire. A year later, she was taking a holiday in Florida with her two young sons when a mutual friend suggested she meet Gould.

"She didn't want to meet him," said her son Mark. "[She] hung up the phone on him. This did not deter him. He got into his car and drove from Miami to Fort Lauderdale to where we were staying. He knocked on our door unannounced and demanded to meet the woman who had refused to see him."

"My mother opened the door to this tanned, handsome man, and they were married six weeks later."

Gould moved to Hamilton, continuing in steel as a broker-trader. Milli, meanwhile, had always had an interest in fashion; as a teenager she modelled for local retailers. With her young children in school, she wanted a "little store" to keep her busy for a few hours a day. Soon after "Milli's" opened, Gould left the steel business to become its driving force.

"He believed in me, and believed it could be successful," said Milli. "It was his idea to go to Europe and buy there. I had lived a small town life and had never travelled anywhere. I told him Europe seemed so far away.

"But he took me to Paris and Italy, and our store just grew. When he chose a location away from downtown, even his lawyer said 'You might as well throw your money down the garbage!'"

"My father pushed the shop to its highest level," said Mark.

"No one believed Hamilton was the place for the latest and best clothes, but we have become a destination store. Our clients might seem to have all they need in Toronto, but they come out here to get special personal service."

The "little store" became a high-end boutique, which now draws 80 percent of its customers from Toronto. Today "Milli's" is a family business. Ben manages the wholesale department, while Mark works alongside his mother buying and selling designer fashion from Paris, Milan, New York and London.

Ben recalled how in the store's early days, Gould computerized the business.

"Department stores were still using cash registers, while we had everything on NCR tapes. Instead of handwritten ledgers, he had a posting machine installed. I would work on it as a kid, and that's how I learned my accounting skills.

"If there was some new way of doing something, my dad wanted to know about it – he just loved being in business," Ben said.

Gould's legacy will enable the trading floor to expand: another row of desks and computer terminals will soon be installed to give a head start to the next generation of stock-market analysts.

New Zionist organization launched in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Izzy Asper and his Asper Foundation have launched a new initiative to strengthen the links between Israel and the Diaspora.

In partnership with World Betar, the youth group founded by right-wing Zionist Ze'ev Jabotinsky, the foundation has created the Winnipeg Zionist Initiative (WZI). "Winnipeg is to be our flagship centre," said Liat Arieh, an Israeli teacher who is the WZI's first shlichah.

Arieh said her mission is to strengthen Winnipeg and Canadian Jewry's love for Israel, as well as to educate the Jewish community about the history and significance of Zionism.

Although its founders hope the WZI will eventually sprout branches in most other major Canadian cities, Arieh said it doesn't intend to replace any existing organizations. Rather, Arieh said she looks forward to working with other Jewish groups in Winnipeg and across Canada.

Arieh and her family arrived in Winnipeg in early September.

One of her first acts has been to establish a leadership group of six university students to help her with her work and plan programs aimed at Jewish university students here.

Among the programs will be ones looking at issues in Israel beyond the headlines, as well as an examination of Israel's image in the media.

"We want to present Israel's side of things and educate people about the historical background," Arieh said.

But her mandate, she said, extends beyond educating university students about Israel.

The WZI also intends to establish adult, young adult, youth and children's divisions.

"Our ultimate goal is to help create Jewish continuity," she said. "I think the group I have started working with will form a good nucleus."

She noted that while Betar has branches worldwide, it is sparsely represented in Canada.

Betar was founded in 1923 by the controversial Jabotinsky, head of the Revisionist movement.

"Jabotinsky always emphasized the importance of youth movements," Arieh said. "He believed that youth represented the future."

BONDS HONOURS WOMEN: Five young women were honoured in Hamilton recently for their outstanding contribution to the community at the State of Israel Bonds, Women's Division lunch and fashion show. Hamilton day school defies expectations

By MOURA WOLPERT
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Kehila Jewish Community Day School, (KJCDS) – the little school that nobody thought could make it – has entered its third year financially in the black and with almost double its initial enrolment.

The plan to establish an alternative Jewish day school here met with considerable opposition when it was first proposed in the late 1990s.

Critics noted that Hamilton already had a well-established Jewish day school – the Hamilton Hebrew Academy (HHA), an Orthodox school which accepts all Jewish children regardless of background – and argued that a community of only 5,000 Jews couldn't support a second institution.

Nevertheless, a small group of determined parents, for whom the Orthodox HHA was "not an option," went ahead with the project, says KJCDS interim principal Leia Ger-Rogers.

In the fall of 1999, KCJDS – which accepts children from all parts of the community and is not affiliated with any of the three main branches of Judaism – opened with 12 pupils and three teachers in one senior kindergarten class and one combined grade 1-3 class.

The school now has five teachers teaching 20 children. Its three classes serve pupils from senior kindergarten to grade four.

It also has a new interim principal in Ger-Rogers. She succeeds Hamutal Deckel, who "did all the groundbreaking," before returning to her native Israel this summer, says Ger-Rogers, a special education teacher with a master's degree in special education from the University of Toronto.

In addition to her KJDCS duties, Ger-Rogers is also director of the Hamilton Learning Centre, a school for children with special needs that also provides tutoring, as well as administrator of Midrasha, a program of continuing Jewish education for high school students.

She will remain with KJDCS for one year while the school searches for a permanent principal.

KJCDS, Ger-Rogers says, "is not in competition with the HHA but is simply another community resource. It is good to have another option. Our program is unique in Hamilton. Now, we are growing."

A non-profit institution, KJCDS is funded largely by several major donations and tuition fees. "And we have an excellent fund-raising arm."

The school is located in the basement of Temple Anshe Sholom, but has always planned to have a building of its own by the end of its fifth year, Ger-Rogers says

So far planning has not moved beyond preliminary discussions, but the most current "hope" is to build on property owned by the Hamilton Jewish Community Centre, she says.

Scouts Canada honours Ottawa's Rabbi Bulka

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Scouts Canada has awarded its first ever National Salute Award to Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas.

The award was created to honour business and community leaders who exemplify scouting's principles of character and leadership in their daily lives.

Rabbi Bulka – an honourary chaplain for Scouts Canada's Voyageur region who has also been involved with the Canadian Jewish Advisory Council on Scouting – received the award Oct. 30 before 300 people at Scouts Canada's national office.

David Rattray, chair of the Foundation Scouts Canada Foundation, praised Rabbi Bulka as "an outstanding individual, whom we have all come to love and respect. Without a doubt, he represents a role model for the youth of this country."

Guests at the ceremony were invited to try a variety of scouting activities, such as learning to tie knots, sending messages using semaphore and learning basic first-aid techniques.

Russell Mills, publisher of the Ottawa Citizen, one of the event's sponsors, said "the motto of Scouts Canada is, 'Do a good turn daily' and we couldn't think of anyone who exemplifies that more than Rabbi Bulka."

Ramon Hnatyshyn, who as a former governor general was also a former chief scout, was the event's master of ceremonies.

Rabbi Bulka dedicated the award to his late wife, Naomi, who died of cancer last May.

Even in weakened health, she was enthusiastic about her husband being chosen for the award and encouraged him to accept it, Rabbi Bulka said..

"Under normal circumstances, after she passed away, I might have changed my mind, but to honour her memory I decided to go ahead with it.," he said. "All of the things you heard today could not have been done without the support of my devoted wife, so I dedicate this evening to her and to her memory."

Rattray said proceeds from the evening and from future National Salute Award events will go to fund a youth and activity centre. Close to $30,000 was raised by the first event.

Alberta's first shul celebrates its 95th birthday

EDMONTON — Beth Israel Synagogue, Alberta's first synagogue, will celebrate its 95th birthday with a gala anniversary dinner and a dedication of its new building on Dec. 2.

Special guest Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa, one of Canada's leading Orthodox rabbis, will participate in the champagne reception, and Lois Hole, Lieut.-Gov. of Alberta, will cut the ribbon for the new building.

Also attending will be Cantor Paul Kowarsky of Toronto, who will perform in the new sanctuary following the dinner.

Dinner co-chairs, Marilyn Cohen and Esther Starkman, along with shul president Howard Starkman and the board of directors, invite all former community members, as well as their descendants, to join them at the gala.

At the turn of the century, early Jewish immigrants settled in and around Edmonton and formed the Edmonton Hebrew Association.

The association was Edmonton's first organized Jewish institution and generated many of the community's essential services, such as the Beth Israel Synagogue, the Talmud Torah (Canada's oldest Jewish day school) and Edmonton's chevrah kadishah.

The original Beth Israel Synagogue, which opened in 1912 to serve the Edmonton Jewish community and surrounding areas, was located at 95th Street and Rowland Road. In 1952 it moved to a building on 119th Street.

The Beth Israel on 95th Street was a spiritual haven for the Jewish families in the small country towns for hundreds of miles east, north, west and south of Edmonton. When Yom Kippur and Rosh Hashanah came, Jewish store owners near Edmonton closed their establishments and made the trip into the city.

Coming to the Edmonton shul at that time was a major event. The city's Jews opened their homes, and every out-of-towner was welcomed and accommodated.

Today, the congregation has a new building on Wolf Willow Road and continues to follow the vision of its founding families.

Reservations for the gala may be made by Nov. 18 through the synagogue. Call 780-488-2840.

Jews estranged from the NDP

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

A couple of years back, I thought it would be worthwhile to examine the five federal political parties in terms of their overall sensitivity to the so-called Jewish agenda. Given the changes that have occurred since then, it seems that a second look would offer some useful insights into the challenges that present themselves for the Jewish community in its relations with the political sector. Beginning with the New Democratic Party, we'll examine them all over the next five weeks.

In some respects, Jewish roots run deepest in the NDP. Up until the 1960s, the most activist element of the Canadian Jewish community could be found in the labour movement and on a political level, that activism flowed directly into the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation and its successor, the New Democratic Party. In fact, the only Jewish leader of a modern-day federal party in Canada was David Lewis, the widely respected leader of the NDP in the 1970s.

Much has happened in the intervening years. The progressive, activist agenda that characterized the NDP – and with which so many Canadian Jews felt comfortable – has, in many respects, been transformed into a radicalized program. Indeed, one could almost say that the current Jewish-NDP relationship is best described as 'estranged'.

Leading NDP parliamentarians like Iain Angus and Nelson Riis – individuals who had strong relations with the Jewish community – are no longer around, and it seems no one within caucus has stepped up to establish new links.

Nowhere is this more evident than on Middle East issues. Historically, the views of people such as Svend Robinson and Libby Davis were tempered by those who had a greater appreciation for the other side of the story. Now, however, there is no one (least of all, the party leader, Alexa McDonough) to counter those views. As a result, the NDP positions on things like the peace process and the recent Durban conference reflect an almost extremist anti-Israel orientation.

Internally, the NDP is going through a wrenching makeover, and no one is yet willing to predict which side will win, the radicals or those who advocate a more centrist, contemporary profile. For both strategic considerations and reasons of principle, Jews should not be indifferent to that process. The question is how to make a Jewish presence felt in an environment from which the community now feels alienated.

The answer may rest with those still in the caucus and party who reflect the NDP of old. MPs like Lorne Nystrom and Bill Blaikie are still a force within the party and on a personal level, they still retain Jewish links. The onus, however, is on the Jewish community to reach out and express a desire to become engaged and forge alliances.

The ability to have an impact is real. It is only a question of whether a will exists among Jews in the more "progressive" quarters of the community to make their presence felt.

Shul's doors locked in merger dispute

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Members of Anshei Ozeroff synagogue on Bourret Street have been holding services elsewhere since the doors were locked on Oct. 15, the latest in a prolonged dispute over merging with the Adath Israel Poale Zedek Synagogue in Hampstead.

Both sides continue to blame each other a year since the dispute began.

David Waxman, a member of the 58-year-old Anshei Ozeroff who favours the merger, said it is unlikely the shul's doors will re-open until the issue is settled in Quebec Superior Court.

"Everything is status quo," Waxman said. "We had a meeting, and a decision was taken to merge. [They] want us out, to take over the shul. Period."

But for Mark Wasserlauf, a former treasurer at Anshei Ozeroff, and others who are against the merger, the locked shul doors confirm what they have predicted and feared all along.

"This was the action plan from the start," he said. "This is what we foresaw.

"They [Waxman and Harry Shaffer, Anshei Ozeroff's acting president] orchestrated the whole thing."

Meanwhile, both sides continue to claim support for their cause.

Wasserlauf and Joshua Haimovici, who was fired as cantor by Shaffer for challenging the merger in court, say that virtually all 200 worshippers at the Anshei Ozeroff are against the merger.

Twelve of the 14 Anshei Ozeroff members with voting rights support the merger, Haimovici said in a letter sent to The CJN, but the rest of the congregation doesn't have voting rights.

Since 1987, the synagogue's constitution has not allowed for new memberships with voting rights. However, worshippers who wanted to be affiliated in some way with the congregation joined as "associate" members with no voting rights.

Memberships "were never solicited or encouraged," Haimovici wrote. "In fact, any and all attempts to join the synagogue by various worshippers were always met with a definite refusal by the executive.

"The enduring message of the synagogue during the last 14 years was, contribute and pay to become associate members, which will grant you the apparent enviable luxury of not being allowed entrance to synagogue meetings, not being able to voice your concerns and opinions about policy or ultimately effect any change by not having voting rights.

"Such a policy is unheard of in any Jewish organization worldwide, let alone a synagogue which should seek to become inclusionary. Closure to membership means guaranteeing [its] imminent demise."

Despite the locked-up shul, worshippers have been able to hold daily minyans at homes in the area, Wasserlauf said.

Some Anshei Ozeroff worshippers have been going to the Chevra Shas synagogue at Bourret and Lavoie streets on Shabbat, but Wasserlauf said it has been a "hardship" for the many congregants who are older or infirm and have difficulty managing the long, uphill walk.

Both sides are holding their ground until the issue comes before Quebec Superior Court in January.

Survivor turns to the pen after his retirement

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Salomon Rubinstein, 93, retired from his work at an importing company at the age of 70, he was worried that his days would be long and boring.

Yet Rubinstein, a Holocaust survivor, began writing in Yiddish for the first time since his youth and has kept himself busy writing ever since.

It was as though his pen had a life of its own, he says.

After writing his stories in Yiddish, he laboriously translated them into English, one word at a time, resulting in the recent self-published Zerlox-bound compilation of his work in both languages, entitled A Reflection: Memories/Stories.

Based on his life story and his observations of human behaviour, Rubinstein's charming and insightful work is set in rhyme. The book is divided into eight chapters: Family, Musings, Politics, Miami, Reflection on Life, The Holocaust, Reflection on Faith and Humour. The poems have titles such as, "You Have to be Wary of Doctors and Shoemakers" and "Complaints to the Master of the Universe."

The book also contains photos of Salomon, his wife Hela, 91, and her family, many of whom perished in the camps; photos of his young family growing up in Israel and Montreal; and recent photos of Salomon and Hela, their two sons and wives, and their three grandchildren and four great-grandchildren.

Salomon and Hela, who recently celebrated their 64th anniversary, live in North York. Their son Jerry and his wife Gail own and operate Mothers World, a children's furniture store; their son David, a psychotherapist, works with his wife Louise Dorfman in their relationship counselling service, Couple Enrichment.

Born in Lublin, Poland in 1908, Salomon has clear childhood memories of World War I, the invasion of Poland by the Russians and the Bolshevik Revolution in 1917.

Salomon and Hela Rubinstein celebrate their 64th anniversary.

Married to Hela (Feldfeber) in 1937 in Demblin, Poland where she was born and raised, Salomon recalls living in the town's ghetto. There he was saved from the selections for the death camps by a young Polish friend who helped him flee the ghetto. Though Salomon was caught by the SS, he escaped once again, hiding along with many other Jews being hunted by young Polish children who would get a pound of sugar or bottle of wine for each Jew they discovered. His Polish friend was able to save him yet again by including him in a work detail of Jews at a flying school.

In 1945, Salomon was taken to Buchenwald and liberated three months later, the only survivor of 100 relatives in his family.

With no surviving family members, Salomon and Hela, along with 10-year-old Jerry, were sent to Germany in 1948 where David was born. In 1949, they left for Israel and four years later, they moved to Montreal where Hela's family lived. When Salomon retired, they moved to Toronto to be near their sons Jerry and David.

As word got out that Salomon was writing, he was asked to read his stories to family and friends and was invited to speak at synagogues. His work has been published in The CJN and The Forward, in New York.

"Over the past 20 years, my father spent considerable time translating his stories," says David, who helped compile the book. "He told me that he toiled with English because he wanted to leave a legacy for his family, most of whom could not read Yiddish."

In the introduction of A Reflection, David writes, "This book was put together to honour my father, his life and his contributions. It speaks to the spirit that is inside him, and that spark of life that has kept him going all these years."

In addition to A Reflection, Salomon is currently completing his autobiography which is being translated from Yiddish to English.

"After what we lived through, I realized that retirement is like a reward," Salomon says. "Before, we had to survive. Now we had time to enjoy and do what we wanted to do in life."

A Reflection is available at the Jewish Public Library, or by calling David Rubinstein at 905-669-8318.

Aelita entertains capacity crowd

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The audience at the recent annual fund-raising concert for the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre's 55 Plus department was treated to a thoroughly enjoyable evening.

The capacity crowd at the Leah Posluns Theatre cheered and sang along with Latvian-born singer Aelita, baritone Igor Emelianov, violinist Vassily Poppadouk, and the colourful costumed dancers from the Ontario Dance Theatre.

Aelita, an international star who sings in 16 languages, began her eclectic program, Tribute to a New Millennium, with an upbeat version of Hello Dolly entitled Hello Harry.

The concert included songs reflecting many of the styles from the last 100 years in Jewish popular music. Changing into five glittering costumes, Aelita covered many musical moods, from the uplifting Hallelluya and Matchmaker to the sentimental Mamele and Papa Can You Hear Me?

She also played to the audience, which joined her in singing The Way We Were.

And her talent and versatility shone in a Edith Piaf-style rendition of La Vie en Rose and other French favourites.

Aelita, known as the "Queen of Cabaret," has presented her flamboyant show on two worldwide concert tours spanning 40 countries.

Emelianov, who will be appearing in Tel Aviv later this fall, sang in Yiddish and performed a selection of operatic selections from La Traviata and O Solo Mio, while Poppadouk fascinated the audience with his energetic fingering on Hungarian Rhapsody and Gypsy Rhapsody.

The six dancers provided a Broadway mood as a backdrop for Aelita in tunes from Can-Can and Cabaret, and they dressed as Polish peasants for numbers from Fiddler on the Roof.

The emotion-filled finale saw Aelita singing God Bless America as the audience rose to its feet and continued with Havenu Shalom Aleichem.

אם את אוהבת מישהו- שלחי אותו לחופשי,
אם הוא חוזר אליך- סימן שהוא שלך,
אבל אם כל מה שהוא עושה זה לשבת לך בסלון, לעשות בלאגן בדברים שלך,
לאכול את האוכל שלך, ולקחת את הכסף שלך, ואינו מבין ששלחת אותו לחפשי-
סימן שאו שהתחתנת איתו או שילדת אותו.

Bush calls for two states at UN General Assembly

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

After announcing that U.S. President George W. Bush would not meet with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat at the United National General Assembly sessions in New York, the U.S. government tried last weekend to ease disappointment and anger in the Arab world, and among Palestinians.

Though Bush did not meet with Arafat – because he feels the PA leader is not doing enough to clamp down on terror – his speech to the UN gathering included support for an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel.

"We are working toward the day when two states – Israel and Palestine – live peacefully together within secure and recognized borders as called for by the Security Council resolutions," Bush told the opening session of the annual UN meetings. "We will do all in our power to bring both parties back into negotiations. But peace will only come when all have sworn off forever incitement, violence and terror."

President George Bush

The speech marked the second time he publicly supported a Palestinian state.

Responding to Bush's UN address, Israeli officials said that despite the president's remark about "Palestine" statehood, he devoted little time to the Mideast. The Israelis were pleased Bush explicitly predicated progress in the peace process on cessation of violence.

In interviews broadcast last Friday, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell affirmed support for a Palestinian state based on Security Council resolutions and the "land-for-peace formula."

Powell called on Israel to withdraw from "A" lands under Palestinian control and announced his intention to meet with Arafat during the UN sessions. No meeting had been formally scheduled, but Arafat arrived in New York Sunday (he spoke to the assembly Tuesday), and Powell was also in New York.

Powell said meeting Arafat should "jump start" the peace process.

Powell said Bush can be expected to meet with Arafat "at the right moment."

The Bush and Powell pro-Palestinian statehood declarations were perceived by observers as attempts to allay Arab anger, aroused not only by Bush's refusal to meet with Arafat, but also by criticism of the PA leader by U.S. National Security Adviser Condoleeza Rice. Arafat, Rice said, is not acting with sufficient resolve against terror, and is "embracing Hamas and Hezbollah."

Leading a chorus of Arab criticism against the Bush administration's cool attitude toward Arafat, Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister Prince Saud Al Faisal told The New York Times that Bush's decision not to meet Arafat should cause any reasonable person to "lose his mind." He added his country is "angry and frustrated" with U.S. policy toward the PA and called on the United States to resume its role as an honest broker in the Middle East.

Bush and Powell's verbal support for Palestinian statehood do not reflect a major change in U.S. policy, well-placed U.S. sources said. The Bush administration has not altered its position – the Americans continue to call for a ceasefire based on the Tenet plan, followed by resumed Israeli-Palestinian contacts as outlined by the Mitchell Report.

Top Israeli officials who have recently held talks with senior U.S. counterparts believe the Americans are not formulating a major new initiative. A major foreign policy speech by Powell in two weeks will follow the Tenet-Mitchell guidelines, the Israelis said.

The Americans have promised to brief Israel about messages to be in Powell's speech.

Israeli officials carefully monitored the Bush administration's declarations last weekend, trying to assess whether they signal a shift in U.S. policy.

Responding to Bush's statements, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said a Palestinian declaration of statehood could help the peace process. "It's possible that the best possible means of renewing negotiations would involve a Palestinian statehood declaration," Peres said in Sweden, after meeting the speaker of the Palestinian parliament.

Peres hinted prospects of renewed talks are brighter than many believed. "We seem to have found that we're closer than what we thought," Peres said. "I might have found something which looks like an opportunity."

Officials in Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's office responded to Peres' optimism with unconcealed skepticism.

Sharon met with Peres Sunday and discussed positions Peres is to adopt during his trip to the United States, where he headed after the meeting.

In an interview published Sunday in London by The Times, Jordan's King Abdullah said the Arab world must guarantee Israel's security and integration into the Middle East in return for Palestinian statehood. Such guarantees would involve countries stretching from the Persian Gulf to Morocco, he said.

Sharon postpones visit to GA

professionals and volunteers from 189 Jewish federations across North America affiliated under the umbrella of the United Jewish Communities (UJC). He was standing in for Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Sharon had originally been scheduled to attend the GA as part of a larger diplomatic visit to meet with U.S. President George W. Bush. However, he felt compelled to postpone his visit in light of the security situation in Israel.

In a pre-recorded message, Sharon emphasized the bond between the two countries imparted by his foreign minister. "I applaud the president of the United States," Sharon said. "Israel is the ally of the United States."

But Sharon also appealed to the audience to visit Israel. "We need you now. If you cannot live in Israel, visit Israel," he urged.

On the subject of peace with the Palestinians, Sharon said, "For true peace, I am ready to make powerful compromises. But I will not make compromises on the survival and the security of the people of Israel."

The prime minister also told the audience that his government would endeavour to bring one million Jews to Israel over the next decade.

The evening was suffused with emotion. The atrocities of Sept. 11 were commemorated by a special prayer and candlelighting session, and speaker after speaker referred to the terrorist attacks in their remarks.

Peres recalled the joint efforts over the past half century by the American and Israeli people, from the moment of Israel's creation through the building up of the country and the absorption of more than a million immigrants from the Former Soviet Union.

"The fourth joint challenge," Peres pointed out, "[is] to stand together now against terrorism."

The struggle against terrorism will be in two phases. The first phase, Peres said, is being waged now by the U.S.-led coalition in Afghanistan. "The next phase will entail an even broader world coalition of anti-terrorist, pro-freedom and pro-security nations, including China and India."

Because Arafat seeks legitimacy from the western world, Peres said, the PA leader might now be more amenable to acting against the more violent, radical forces of Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad and Hamas.

On average, more than 30 incidents of violence per day since Sept. 28, 2000, have been committed against Israelis by the various Palestinian forces, Peres said, confirming figures disclosed earlier by Salai Meridor, chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel, who counted 9,885 attacks against Israelis since the beginning of the intifadah.

"The Palestinian people will never attain their independence unless Yasser Arafat brings a stop to terrorism," Peres said.

In an especially poignant moment in the program, the parents of Israeli MiA Zecharia Baumel, and the wife and son of Elchanan Tannenbaum, the Israeli kidnapped by Hezbollah, pleaded with the audience to mobilize on behalf of the captive Israelis.

Delegates said they were moved by the plenary opening.

Larry Hurtig, the immediate past president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and currently president of the Asper Jewish Community Campus, summed up the central emotion by saying it was very important for the Jewish people to show togetherness during this time of adversity.

"The occasion affords us an opportunity to show total commitment to world Jewry and to support of Israel," he said.

David Goldstein, past president of UIA Canada and currently a member of the executive of the UJC, praised the opening plenary session as "incredible. It's more than a GA; it's a world gathering. I'm proud that so many people have come together from all over North America, Israel, other parts of the world, and that there are so many students here."

In fact, the students were the talk among delegates in the crowded hotel hallways and evoked special praise from speakers during the program. When Meridor announced that more than 22,000 of them had visited Israel in the past 18 months under the auspices of Birthright Israel, the audience erupted into long, loud cheers.

The Canadian contingent of some 125 student participants, drew particular accolades for their enthusiasm, spirit, energy and involvement. Michael Jankelowitz, liaison officer to foreign press and media with The Jewish Agency for Israel, told The CJN that "the Canadian students were just fantastic. They really made the [pre-meeting] Shabbaton; it came alive."

Canadian student delegate Daniel Held, a student at York University attending his first GA, described the program as "inspiring. It encourages us, as students, to renew our commitment to Israel on campus."

Nuri Fisher from Victoria, attending his second GA, said the experience has been fantastic. "The GA really gives the students an opportunity to see how Hillel fits in with the rest of the United Jewish Communities."

"While Peres did not address student issues specifically, he did instil hope in the hearts of many of the students," Ari Fudim, from Thornhill, Ont., said. "On the whole, it was very interesting."

"Peres chose his words very wisely, spoke very well," Sasha Kobrossi, also of Thornhill, said. "Concerning the Palestinian issue, he raised the points in a non-confrontational way. People left feeling positive about the way the government of Israel is handling the situation."

Palestinian groups labelled as terrorists

By MATTHEW E. BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — The U.S. State Department has agreed to freeze the assets of a number of groups identified as terrorist organizations, widening the scope of the fight against terror to include organizations that target Israel.

The decision places Hamas, Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine on a par with the Al Qaeda network of Osama bin Laden, the mastermind behind the Sept. 11 terror attacks on New York and Washington.

Now, all 28 groups listed as foreign terrorist organizations are subject to the executive order President George W. Bush signed soon after the Sept. 11 attacks, meaning that the assets of the organizations and individuals associated with them will be frozen.

Until now, only Al Qaeda and five other groups were subject to the executive order.

"We do think it's important that we have these tools, particularly if it's enhanced tools in the new executive order, so that we can go after all terrorism, because that's the goal of the campaign," State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said.

Several government agencies have come out with lists of terrorist groups since the World Trade Center attacks, but the State Department list will have the most effect overseas.

The Justice Department list of terror organizations, announced Oct. 31, is still being finalized. In any case, it would only affect domestic monitoring and deportation. The FBI list, announced earlier this fall, is used only for investigative purposes.

Boucher said he was confident that Middle Eastern countries would work to curtail the actions of anti-Israel terror groups.

Israeli and Jewish leaders hailed the State Department decision, saying it is a sign that the Bush administration is not differentiating between terror against U.S. civilians and attacks against Israelis.

"Terrorism is terrorism," said Mark Regev, spokesman for the Israeli Embassy in Washington. "There can be no distinction between blood and blood."

Sharon vows to retrieve soldiers' bodies

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said last week during a visit to the family of Omar Souad, one of three IDF soldiers kidnapped in October 2000, that Israel had known from the beginning that the three were no longer alive.

The three soldiers, Benny Avraham, Omar Souad and Adi Avitan, were abducted by Hezbollah militants believed to be disguised as UN troops. Hezbollah has rejected Israel's claim that the three are dead.

At a visit to the family of Adi Avitan in Tiberias, Sharon promised Israel would do the utmost to bring the bodies of the soldiers back to Israel.

Sharon added that before Syria joined the United Nations Security Council, Israel had pressed the UN to make its joining conditional on Syria handing over information on the three soldiers. The prime minister said that was the last attempt by Israel to gain information on the soldiers.

Sharon said that Hezbollah's actions had "a portion of cruelty and cynicism, which cannot be understood by our conceptions."

President Moshe Katsav, who paid a condolence call to the Avitan family not long after Sharon's departure, said that the UN's behavior in the matter was embarrassing and irresponsible. According to the president, UN Secretary General Kofi Anan should have shared any information he had with the families of the three.

Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, speaking in an interview with Army Radio last week, said that the information the IDF had received regarding the deaths of three IDF soldiers kidnapped by the Hezbollah in October last year, "left no doubt." When asked what the information was, Ben-Eliezer replied "someone saw."

The defence minister's statements caused alarm and embarrassment in the security establishment. Security sources said they feared Ben-Eliezer's comments would harm the safety of their sources that supplied the information on the fate of the three soldiers. The security establishment has made great efforts to prevent publication of details regarding the source and nature of the information.

After Ben-Eliezer's statements, his office released clarification of his remarks, saying that the defence minister was not commenting on concrete information received by the defence establishment, but rather he was giving an example of the type of information needed to make a decision of such importance.

War criminal dies in Australia

CJN News Services

MELBOURNE — Nazi war criminal Konrads Kalejs died last week in an Australian retirement home. He was 88.

Kalejs had been diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease and was said to be suffering from cancer.

A former officer in the Arajs Kommando, a Latvian nationalist group that collaborated with the Nazis, Kalejs had been deported from the United States and Canada in the 1990s because of his participation in war crimes.

After being found by Nazi hunters in Britain in January 2000, he returned to his home in Australia. There he faced another legal challenge when the government of Latvia requested his extradition to face charges he ordered the shooting of at least six prisoners at the Salaspils concentration camp.

In May, 2001 an Australian court ordered his extradition. Kalejs was fighting the order in Federal Court when he died.

For a few years during the mid-1990s, Kalejs lived in a Toronto condominium tower occupied by many Jews, including Holocaust survivors.

Although he was in Canada only as a visitor, it took a ruling by an Immigration adjudicator, after a lengthy hearing, to remove him. In 1997, the adjudicator found that Kalejs commanded the outside guard at Salaspils, which had the power to shoot inmates.

The adjudicator's decision seemed to surprise Kalejs, but he was even more shocked when he was told by federal authorities he had to leave the country later the same day.

Arab moderates: refreshing

Ever since Yasser Arafat walked away from the generous peace offers at Camp David last year, his defenders have tried to denigrate Ehud Barak's proposals as inadequate, even describing them as a pretext for Israel's continued domination of the Palestinians.

According to Reports

Such assaults on the truth make it all the more imperative for moderate Arab voices to speak up against the distortion surrounding one of those rare historic opportunities that comes about once every fifty years or so, as the Economist described it not so long ago.

That is why it was important to listen carefully to the remarks made recently by Mohammed Wahby, Washington bureau chief of the Egyptian magazine al-Mussawar, on CBC Radio's "This Morning" Sunday edition (Nov. 4).

Given the anti-Israel invective that pervades so much of the Arab state-controlled media, it was both refreshing and revealing to hear an Egyptian journalist who displays moderate, pragmatic attitudes towards Israel and sees prospects for Arab-Israel co-existence.

Wahby discussed U.S. attempts to revive an Israeli-Palestinian peace plan. Program host Michael Enright led the way with the essential question: "What if Arafat... shoots it down the way he did the Barak proposal which gave the Palestinians 95 percent of what they wanted?"

Wahby replied: "Michael, I agree with you, Arafat did shoot [it] down. The situation was a bit different, but he made a mistake, and they learn from this mistake, [though] Palestinians sometimes learn from their mistakes a little bit too late. This is a fact. But from my context now... they have learned from their mistake. All the people around Arafat now say that they have made a mistake and this time they wouldn't."

While Wahby is being far too generous in claiming that "all the people" around Arafat now admit that he made a grave error, certainly many of them, like the prominent Palestinian intellectual Sari Nusseibeh, support this view.

Wahby is candid about the undeniable reality of what Arafat passed up, with such unnecessary dire consequences for his people. As the Lebanese-born Mideast scholar Fouad Ajami writes in the latest issue of Foreign Affairs: "Better the fire of an insurrection than the risks of reconciling his people to a peace he had not prepared them for: this was Arafat's way. This is why he spurned the offer at Camp David in the summer of 2000."

Prepared by Paul Michaels of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Vatican commission role over: Marrus

And he referred them to Rev. Peter Gumpel, a German Jesuit priest who has promoted the beatification of Pope Pius XII.

After the historians suspended their investigation, Gumpel denounced them, claiming they had unleashed a "slanderous campaign" against the church.

In the wake of his colleagues' resignation, Marrus expressed optimism that the Vatican will eventually open its archives.

"The question is when. It should be sooner rather than later."

He added: "Unfortunately, we weren't able to persuade the Vatican that this should be a priority."

Marrus has no regrets.

"Those of us who were on the panel benefited from our work and our encounters with other scholars."

Claiming that the commission served a useful purpose, he observed, "We were able to focus international attention on the need to open the [Vatican] archives and on the Vatican's failure to respond."

Marrus is pleased by the support the panel received from "many, many quarters," including Catholic circles.

"Catholics," he declared, "don't speak with one voice on this subject."

Asked whether the breakup of the panel may affect Jewish-Catholic relations, Marrus said, "It remains to be seen."

He disagrees with a remark, attributed to Wistrich, that these relations are now at their lowest point since the publication of Nostra Aetate in 1965.

That landmark Vatican document ushered in an age of Jewish-Catholic dialogue and broke down religious barriers between Jews and Catholics.

Dutch Jews try to counter stark outlook

By ELISE FRIEDMANN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

AMSTERDAM — Dutch Jewish leaders are working to devise ways to counter a sobering demographic survey of the Jewish community, the first one conducted in 35 years.

On a recent Friday morning, Amsterdam's Jewish Cultural Centre was deserted but for four Jewish community leaders discussing ways to follow up on the survey. Empty formica-topped tables formed a stark backdrop, despite recent efforts to cozy up the hall for coffee mornings for the elderly.

Almost half of Holland's 44,000 Jews live in Amsterdam, but this Orthodox centre is their only community building. Some fear the elderly might soon be the only ones left to cater for.

According to the survey, the majority of Dutch Jews are older than 50, and less than one in 10 are younger than 20. Marriages and births are down, while divorces and mixed marriages are up – and rising.

Just over a quarter of Dutch Jews belong to a synagogue. Only six percent are observant, and 57 percent follow no Jewish practices at all.

Yet according to the survey, a clear majority would be sad to see the Jewish community decline, and 72 percent said being Jewish is fun.

That creates a dilemma for Jewish leaders struggling for ways to counter the decline.

"The Jewish community doesn't exist; this is a collection of individuals," says Chaya Italiaander, 50.

The Passover seders and Purim parties she organizes for Amsterdam's Orthodox community attract 300 participants, including non-members who may not be Jewish according to halachah, or Jewish law.

"They obviously feel a need for tradition, religion. But our religion is almost too complex to pick up again once you've lost it," Italiaander says. "We must offer them a way back."

For Wanya Kruyer, 47, that is not enough, though she claims that Shabbat services in the Reconstructionist synagogue she helped found are the biggest in Amsterdam.

"Religion is only one part of our rich cultural heritage," she says.

Kruyer wants to form an independent Jewish community centre in the city that will be open to all who identify as Jews.

"There is a large group of lonely, unaffiliated singles out there," Kruyer says. "They need a place to meet for meals and cultural activities. When you meet, you marry and may even join a synagogue."

Rabbi Shmuel Spiero, 33, disagrees. "People would go to this club looking for a Jewish partner and might find afterward that the one they met is not what they think," he says, meaning that they may not be Jewish according to Jewish law.

Spiero is the rabbi of a large area surrounding the small town of Haarlem, near Amsterdam. He says the recent survey is overly pessimistic, and sees no reason to change course.

"The number of synagogue members is declining, but we are seeing a growing number of people at our activities, and even weekly services in places that used to have nothing," he says.

Ronny Naftaniel, head of the secular Zionist organization CIDI and a member of the Central Jewish Organization in the Netherlands, says the community should welcome anyone who identifies with it in any way.

Even more worrying than the demographic data, he says, is the fact that most Dutch Jews identify Jewishly only because of World War II and anti-Semitism, both negative factors. The only other binding element is Israel.

"We need to send our teens there to meet other Jews; this is the only way to give them a sense of community," Naftaniel says. "We need subsidized programs like Birthright; if the United States can do it, we can. And we must do it now, before it's too late. If we use the restitution funds for this, at least some good will have come out of World War II."

Naftaniel was one of the main negotiators who reached a restitution agreement with the Dutch government last year.

The agreement included the return of $145 million taken from the account in which the Nazis deposited the financial assets of Holland's 140,0000-member pre-war Jewish community, but was never returned. Financial institutions and insurance companies are also compensating the community for unclaimed assets.

The bulk of the funds are being distributed among survivors, but up to 20 percent is earmarked for communal purposes. The results of the demographic survey may well influence decisions about its distribution.

In the decades since the World War II, Jews have been almost invisible in the Netherlands. Nobody wanted to be reminded of their fate. Many survivors protected their children from the Jewish culture and religion that had proved so dangerous for them.

But the run-up to the restitution fight generated a wave of publicity and interest in things Jewish. A recent survey into the repatriation of Holocaust survivors and other returnees, such as forced laborers, was covered by all the national media, as was the demographic survey.

Ex-Red Cross president backed Magen David Adom

BY SHARON SAMBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Israel's exclusion from the global Red Cross organization appears to have been the pivotal factor in the recent resignation of the head of the American Red Cross.

Dr. Bernadine Healy said last month that she had been forced out of her job over policy differences with her board. In particular, she noted her unpopular decision to withhold American Red Cross dues from the International Committee of the Red Cross to protest the group's refusal to give full membership to Magen David Adom, the Israeli relief group.

Contrary to reports, Healy's ouster had very little to do with the issue of how to use funds collected for the victims of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, according to an official at the American Red Cross.

"It's just not the case," the official said. Healy had taken the lead on what she termed a "controversial but principled stand" supporting Israel's demand for membership in the international organization. Healy advocated withholding American Red Cross dues to the international group until the Israeli branch was included. Magen David Adom currently has only observer status.

The American Red Cross has so far withheld two years of dues – about $10 million to $12 million – as well as voluntary contributions to the international group.

Israel's humanitarian relief movement has been barred from the Red Cross movement, which allows only the red cross and, in Muslim countries, the red crescent. Israel insists on keeping its red Star of David.

Israel's exclusion has been a long-standing point of contention between the American Red Cross and the international body.

The exclusion generally is attributed to intense lobbying against Israel from Arab and Muslim members of the International Red Cross. Officially, the reason given is that allowing the Star of David might encourage other groups to press for inclusion of their emblems as well.

Alluding to her difficulties on this issue with the board of governors, Healy said "reasonable people have differed with me on this and certain other matters, but this is an area of deep principle for me not easily compromised."

Earlier this month the board tried to reverse course and pay its back dues to the international body, even passing a resolution to do so, the American Red Cross said. But Healy refused to back down.

Healy's resignation may help solidify American Red Cross support for Magen David Adom, the official said, but she remains doubtful about the Israeli group's ultimate prospects of joining the world body.

"I'm not terribly optimistic," the official said.

Red Cross officials announced that Harold Decker had been appointed interim CEO. According to the organization, Decker supports full membership for Magen David Adom, and agrees that dues should be withheld from the international group until the Israeli group is admitted.

Last year, representatives from Israel and the American Red Cross held talks in Geneva and discussed proposals to incorporate Magen David Adom's red Star of David into a neutral emblem. Discussions on alternatives are still under way.

The issue of the emblem has blocked Magen David Adom's admission to the International Red Cross since 1949. According to Magen David Adom, it has met all of the other requirements to join the international organization.

Film on mistaken identity focuses on anti-Semitism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Anti-Semitism in the United States reached its apogee in 1944, according to public opinion polls. This is a bitterly ironic commentary. At a time when the Allies were locked in a life-and-death struggle with Nazi Germany, legions of Americans professed profoundly anti-Semitic attitudes.

This kind of grassroots American anti-Semitism is at the heart of Focus, Neal Slavin's stark, stylized feature film, which opened at the Varsity on Nov. 9, the 63rd anniversary of Kristallnacht.

Adapted from a novel by playwright Arthur Miller, Focus is probably the most concentrated and important examination of anti-Semitism in a Hollywood film since Gentleman's Agreement and School Ties.

A fable of mistaken identity, in which an extremely ordinary man is the unwitting object of anti-Jewish bigotry, Focus grapples with a litany of timeless themes: intolerance vs. redemption, love vs. hate, silence vs. courage.

Ultimately, this character-driven movie is a cautionary tale about the dangers of remaining quiet and letting the insidious forces of fear take root.

Focus, set in Brooklyn but shot in Toronto, takes place in the waning years of World War II. Slavin, given to film noir flourishes, sets the mood immediately.

While riding the subway to work, Lawrence Newman (William Macy), a milquetoast personnel manager, leans toward a poster disfigured by inflammatory graffiti – "Kikes started war." Later, listening to the radio at home, he hears a jarring voice posing a deeply provocative question: "Why is Christian America fighting Christian Germany?"

Newman's unremarkable existence is torn asunder by an innocent but fateful decision. His boss urges him to buy eye glasses after he mistakenly hires a Jew. In this Kafkaesque company, where typists are as busy and anonymous as humming bees, Jews are definitely not welcomed.

Let's not forget the film's social context. In 1940s America, discrimination in hiring practices on the basis of race, religion, colour and ethnicity were not only common but acceptable.

Spurred on by his boss's advice, Newman purchases a pair of horn-rimmed spectacles. "You look Jewish," says his mother. "I don't suppose anyone will notice."

In fact, Newman's glasses change the way he is seen, and, eventually, how he regards the world. This conceit is rather superficial, and, besides, Macy does not "look" Jewish, with or without glasses. But in the interests of artistic licence, a viewer should bear patiently with Slavin.

Very soon, Newman discovers that his glasses – a simple but telling metaphor – are a millstone around his neck. Much to his anger, he is transferred into an out-of-the-way office and into a lesser position because he no longer makes the "right impression."

Nothing could be more ironic. Newman, an arch conformist, has just rejected a job application from one Gertrude Hart (Laura Dern) on the assumption that she is Jewish. If anything, Hart, with her golden tresses and athletic figure, is a poster girl for Aryan womanhood.

Newman is also a passive racist who swims with the flow. Fred (Meat Loaf Aday), his prejudiced neighbour, exerts pressure on him to boycott Finkelstein (David Paymer), the local newsstand dealer. He also informs Newman that he and like-minded bigots plan to drive the "hymies" off the block.

For all his conformism, Newman becomes a victim of racism as well. After leaving his firm, he scours the newspaper ads for a new job, only to find out that potential employers mistake him for a Jew. Stymied by the rampant anti-Semitism, he begins crossing out advertisements hiring "Christians only." (As hard as it is to believe today, such ads were once perfectly legal).

Salt is rubbed into his wound when the local branch of the Union Crusaders, an anti-Semitic outfit to which Fred belongs, has inexplicably deemed Newman Jewish.

Perturbed by the Union Crusaders' animus, Hart implores Newman to act decisively: join the racists or move out of the neighbourhood.

Taking the easy way out, he attends a Union Crusader rally. There, Father Crighton (Kenneth Welsh), modelled after the infamous Father Coughlin, rants and raves about "Zionist greed," "international bankers," and "money grubbers."

Being mistaken for a Jew, Newman is physically ejected from the meeting. "I'm not a Hebe," he protests, oblivious to his own bigotry.

Focus works because the script is tight and intelligent, the performances convincing and Slavin's direction all but faultless.

He has a serious story to tell, and he tells it exceedingly well.

Photographer brings homeless to Bathurst JCC exhibition

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — For photographer Nir Bareket, the news coverage of the attacks on the World Trade Center reminded him of a decision he often faces in his own work: when to shoot and when to look away.

"The coverage was horrendously superb," he said. "I faced the same dilemma in taking photos of homeless people in Toronto. I have to decide what should be covered and what should not be covered.

"Some things which are documented are very painful to the people involved. It is a sad dilemma for me as a working professional.

"I turned down an ex-prostitute who has gone straight, because, as I told her, 'You have your whole life ahead of you.' The woman, who is now a community volunteer, was willing to participate, but my paternal instinct must have kicked in."

Nir Bareket (right) with a homeless man on a night patrol in Toronto. [Nir Bareket photography]

An exhibit by Bareket depicting homeless women, men and children in Toronto, entitled Gimme Shelter, will be on display at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, (BJCC), from Nov. 18 to Jan. 6.

The 50 photos (selected out of several thousand) have been shown in several venues by the United Way of Greater Toronto.

Bareket often took the pictures at night with street patrols who scour the city looking for the homeless, as well as at women's shelters, emergency shelters, churches, synagogues, motels and at public housing.

Bareket has had about 20 other exhibits in Toronto, including one five years ago featuring pictures from the March of the Living.

At 62, the Haifa-born artist, who started out as a photographer for an advertising agency in New York in 1964, said he is now taking more photos for his own interest, despite not being paid and working long hours. The homeless pictures took him 18 months to shoot part time.

Some of them were taken at Holy Blossom Synagogue, which sponsors an Out of the Cold program.

"I know there must have been Jews among [the homeless] from my talks to representatives of Jewish organizations which have been helping out," he said.

The photos will be shown on the first floor of the BJCC, along with excerpts from a study by Diane Meaghen, a professor of social studies at Seneca College, entitled About Face: Social Construction of Homeless Women in Toronto the Good. None of the homeless will be identified by name.

Though he is not a household name in the photographic world, Bareket is well-known in theatre circles, where he has been taking promotional pictures and scene stills for years.

"I think theatre is magic," he said. "People are devoted to it. I like plays which deal with social issues and give me something to think about when I leave the theatre; plays, for example, by Ionesco, and by Canadian playwrights Judith Thompson, George Walker or David French."

For Bareket, the picture he has in mind is more important than the kind of camera he uses or the quality of the image. "I don't want it to be necessarily super sharp, because as I age I realize that there are things that are better if they are a bit hazy. I do not have to fill in the details."

Painter brings Jewish background to his High Realism art

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a woman sits on a bench reading a note in the Louvre in Paris, morning breaks around her. For Barry Oretsky, the simplicity of the setting is the beginning of a work of art.

Each of the paintings in Oretsky's solo exhibit of images from Paris, Tuscany and Prague – at Gallery One, 121 Scollard St., until Nov. 22 – demonstrates a command of technique and style clearly influenced by realist masters of the past. However, as a Jewish painter of High Realism, Oretsky brings his own history, background and culture to a genre which has been mainly a bastion of the Christian idiom.

The depth of Oretsky's art lies in its ability to capture the spiritual, paradoxical metaphors which exist in even the most simple images. The power of his work is enhanced by its ability to recreate in paint what one assumes, at first glance, to be a photograph.

"Jews have never really painted fine realism" Oretsky said in an interview. "At one point it was forbidden and Jewish artists found themselves becoming surrealists or impressionists."

Inspired by the works of European masters, Oretsky uses a camera as a starting point. His goal, however, is not to simply recreate the photo. After choosing one image, he attempts to capture the power that caused him to take note of the moment when he shot the photograph.

Oretsky then attempts to internalize the photo in terms of his own experience and interpret the image using his language – paint.

"I hope to put all my skill from 40 years of painting to make my works speak as eloquently as possible about things that are important to my life experience," he said. If the viewer can identify with the story he is trying to create, then Oretsky considers his work a success.

Even though his paintings have appeared in shows with the works of Andy Warhol and Pablo Picasso and are used to support major fund-raisers, Oretsky likes to think of himself as a simple man.

"I'm not the kind of person who hangs out in clubs and art shows. I take my kids to school every morning and then come home to paint," he said.

Born on Palmerston Avenue, Oretsky said his observant parents were not supportive of his decision to pursue a career in art.

"I had to prove it was a mitzvah in order to transfer to Central Technical School's art program from Harbord Collegiate."

Standing first for three years at Central Tech was proof. From there, Oretsky went on to St. Martin's School of Art in London, England.

After moving to Israel in 1968, Oretsky worked as a graphic artist and taught for three years at the University of Haifa. He served in the army during the Yom Kippur War before coming back to Canada in 1976.

At that time, he painted as a way to supplement his income as an art teacher, sketching portraits at the CNE and Ontario Place.

"I did 17,000 portraits in 22 years. I paid my dues technically," he said.

Oretsky credits his wife Paula and her family for encouraging him to leave that life behind to pursue his potential as a real artist.

"They've supported my talent in every way possible."

Oretsky is currently working on a Holocaust series. With two of 10 paintings completed, he feels driven to complete the other eight and hopes to eventually donate them to the Art Gallery of Ontario or the Royal Ontario Museum.

While the Holocaust series is something he feels compelled to eventually complete, he is currently working on less troubling images.

However, Oretsky hopes that each one of his paintings represents a different part of who and where he is as an artist.

"I can't allow my paintings to be any less than what was before."

For further information on Oretsky's exhibit, call 416-929-3103.

DARING TO RESIST AND JASMINE COMPANY FEATURED IN FESTIVAL

The first Female Eye Film Festival is screening a couple of noteworthy films with Jewish themes this weekend at the Bloor Street Cinema, 503 Bloor St. W.

Daring to Resist is a documentary about three teenage girls in wartime Europe who grasped what their parents could not – that the Nazi genocide would engulf them and resistance was not a choice but a necessity.

The film was directed by Barbara Attie and Martha Lubell of Philadelphia, and narrated by Janeane Garofalo. It chronicles the experiences of Faye Schulman of Poland, Barbara Rodbell of Holland and Shulamit Lack of Hungary.

"Barbara, Faye and Shula chose to resist rather than succumb and perish with their families," said Lubell. "They all had incredible courage – forging documents, changing identities, hiding people, smuggling others to safety."

Daring to Resist took first prize in a Jewish video competition of the Judah L. Magnes Museum in Berkeley, Calif. The screening takes place Sunday, Nov. 18, at 5 p.m. with Schulman, now a Toronto resident, in attendance.

Jasmine Company: Women Field Officers School, directed by Yael Katzir, focuses on the "new generation of energetic, beautiful, motivated women, determined to fill professional field positions" within the Israel Defence Forces.

The story revolves around five female cadets and their female commander, who ultimately demonstrate that the "glass ceiling" for women in Israeli society is slowly rising. The screening is Nov. 16, 7 p.m.

Each film is $6 for Bloor members, $8 for non-members, on sale at the box office before showtime. The Web site is www.femaleeyefilmfestival.com.

Yiddish Show Goes On: At the next Yiddishland Café, Montreal singer Bronna Levy and Toronto musicians Eric Stein, Bogdan Djukic and Bret Higgins of Beyond the Pale perform songs by Mordecai Gebirtig, Itsik Manger and others. Workmen's Circle, 471 Lawrence Ave. W. $12. Sunday, Nov. 25, 7:30 p.m. 416-787-2081.

Raging Grannies: As part of its monthly seniors luncheon program, the Cranbrooke Friendship Club presents the Raging Grannies, described as a group of "caring older women" who protest and raise awareness of issues of peace, the environment and social justice through song.

Winchevsky Centre, 595 Cranbrooke Ave. $6 includes lunch. Monday, Nov. 19, 12:30 p.m. 416-789-5502.

Literary Chatter: Congratulations to Harbourfront for another successful instalment of the Authors Festival in October.

Despite the additional stress and difficulty of airline travel recently, the festival suffered only a couple of cancellations from distant writers who weren't quite ready to board a plane. One of the absentees was A.S. Byatt, British author of the admirable novels Possession and Angels and Insects. We hope she makes it next year.

One of the pleasures of attending the festival readings are the surprises and discoveries. Most of the readings are bundled in three, so if you go to hear a known author, you also get two others.

This year, American author Allen Kurzweil was on the same program with the popular Scottish detective novelist Ian Rankin.

Kurzweil gave a charming reading from his second novel, The Grand Complication, which has been freshly published by Hyperion. The story concerns a New York librarian who is hired to research the history of a missing timepiece from an old-fashioned cabinet of wonders. Hearing prose is usually an excellent method of determining how good it is: the ear is often far more discerning than the eye. The sections that Kurzweil read were intriguing and amusing.

Rankin also gave an entertaining read. His latest book, The Fall, is displayed prominently in major bookstores.

More Literary Chatter: A couple of upcoming dates in Harbourfront's year-round reading series are of special interest.

Born in Germany to Holocaust survivors, Lily Brett moved with her parents to Australia in 1948, and now lives with her husband in New York. She is a writer of poetry, novels and short stories that often deal with Holocaust themes. For the Love of a Tenor

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As the newly appointed artistic director of Opera York, Mark DuBois would like to target all the communities in the region.

There is a huge Jewish population in Richmond Hill and Thornhill which his opera company hasn't been addressing, DuBois said in an interview.

DuBois, who has appeared with major orchestras around the world, is hoping that For the Love of a Tenor with Cantor Paul Kowarsky (at Famee Furlane Hall, Nov. 17, 7:30 p.m.) will succeed in reaching out to this community.

Kowarsky, who recently retired from Beth Tzedec Synagogue, will be performing Hebrew songs and duets, as well as other repertoire.

"This is a shift for Paul into more secular work," said DuBois, who will also be performing at the concert. "Paul will still be doing cantorial concerts. However, until now he really hasn't had the time or platform to pursue any other work.

"Paul's voice really should have been singing the greatest Italian operas, and now that he's left Beth Tzedec, he'll be able to pursue other directions in his career."

Kowarsky said that "for many years, my kids used to ask me why I didn't become an opera singer. Growing up in South Africa, I just couldn't afford to go away to study opera."

DuBois has performed at many Jewish fundraisers in the past and has worked with Kowarsky on many occasions.

"I've always felt that my career has been enhanced because I've branched out from my church into more Jewish venues.

"I've learned to sing in many different languages, including Hebrew. It's really opened my mind to the world of music available to all communities," DuBois said.

"In fact, my kids always asked me why I didn't become a cantor," he joked.

Accompanying the two tenors will be Nathan Singer, who has been an accompanist, teacher, composer, arranger and chorister in the Jewish community for the past 40 years.

Kowarsky and DuBois will be appearing with concert pianist Brian Finley, soprano Donna Bennett and mezzo-soprano Gisele Fredette. For more information, call 416-469-0086.

Planting, building, prayer: the keys to childrearing

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Lawrence Kelemen has studied at UCLA, Harvard, and Yeshiva University. He's been a radio anchor, philosophy professor and downhill ski instructor. He's written three books on Jewish thought and translated a third. So which of these topics would he talk about on a Sunday evening in Vaughan before an audience of parents and teachers? Well, actually, none of them; he started with agriculture instead.

Surprising, but then, you wouldn't expect a book on Talmudic parenting to hit Amazon.com's bestseller lists, either. Rabbi Kelemen, it seems, is full of surprises, as a full house at Vaughan's Westmount Collegiate discovered on Oct. 21. Rabbi Kelemen brightened the drab auditorium with lively words and gestures, introducing three basic techniques from To Kindle a Soul, his new childrearing book: planting, building and prayer.

Rabbi Kelemen believes when Judaism compares us to plants, it's not a metaphor. The Talmudic volume about agriculture, usually known as Seder Zeraim ("The Order of Seeds"), has another name: Seder Emunah, ("The Order of Faith"). Think about it, Rabbi Kelemen said. "Farmers plant a seed, watch it rot – believing all along that there will be fruit." Childrearing, too, requires often-irrational faith.

"The Talmud compares humans to a grapevine," he said. "So I went out and bought a grapevine – we named it Harold." Arms waving, Rabbi Kelemen related the story of how Harold grew, winding intricately around the bars of his balcony until finally, one Sukkot, "I sat down and made kiddush over grape juice – from Harold."

In the Torah, Rabbi Kelemen explained, God "plants," gently guiding history. But He also "builds" – diving into history to effect "instant and obvious changes." As with Harold the Grapevine, we plant in children the seeds of values we hope will flourish. Yet without a framework – in Harold's case, the railing – seeds can never bear fruit.

Planting alone isn't enough: we must build, offering structure, correcting children's behaviour. But building's "instantaneous" results can be deceptive. Rabbi Kelemen mimed replacing an invisible brick to fix a broken wall. "But come back in 20 years," he said. "Has that brick sprouted a driveway, a new bedroom out back? Building is terminal, but if you plant, you could come back to find an orchard." Instead, like God, we must plant and build "with everything we've got."

Parents also need a third tool: prayer. Rabbi Kelemen admitted to his diverse audience, "I've got my foot in two camps – I've done graduate work at two universities, but I'm also a rabbi." Yet, taking off his "rabbi hat" and speaking from a secular perspective, he said with all that our kids face, it's too risky not to pray for them.

He admitted this initially troubled him. If praying for children was so important, he asked, why is it omitted from the Amidah, our central daily prayer? He discovered the rabbis had determined that there was no way to compose "a prayer to describe what your child needs right now." But, though formal prayer is impossible, Rabbi Kelemen said, spontaneous requests are essential to ensure planting and building come to fruition. Even small prayers such as "Please God, my daughter needs a friend now" or "Help my son learn his multiplication tables" can work.

Though Rabbi Kelemen's sources are Jewish, his emphasis on encouraging children rather than drugging them has intrigued non-Jewish parents, educators and counsellors. Insisting he's not anti-Ritalin (a drug used to combat hyperactivity, mostly in boys), Rabbi Kelemen bounded across the podium, saying yeshivas have long acknowledged male energy, "not because we have low Ritalin levels, but because we have testosterone!"

With interest fueled by Oprah, Larry King and others, it seems the world is hungry to understand how to reach boys without drugs. But his vision goes far beyond childrearing.

"You can't give a child something you don't have yourself," he said. "We must become the kind of people we want our kids to be. Then, like a flame between candles, we ignite our children."

Rabbi Kelemen's lecture, part of his month-long whirlwind tour, also kicked off Aish HaTorah Toronto's Power of One series, exploring the power of individuals to reach their potential and cultivate satisfying relationships. Rabbi Kelemen also spoke at two other events sponsored by The Village Shul's Jewish Family Institute (JFI), as part of their mandate of helping couples enjoy their marriages and children.

"If warmth and contentment can be created in a family, that will radiate into... society at large," JFI's Susan Zehavi says.

Zehavi says Rabbi Kelemen's approach is ideal for mixed audiences, presenting Torah wisdom "backed up with the latest research." But despite the impressive statistics, Rabbi Kelemen's message is a spiritual one, and he's brought it first to the Jewish community.

"The secular world has begun to affirm our values," he says, but "now is the time to reclaim them, to rekindle the souls of our own children."

Jockey's heritage links him to the Jewish people

By HARLAN ABBEY
Special to The CJN

FORT ERIE — Michael Cohen may not be a practising Jew, but his lineage links him to the Jewish people.

"I consider myself a member of the Jewish people although I am not a Jew by religion," said Cohen, a horse trainer at the Fort Erie Race Track.

"My great-grandfather, who died before I was born, and several of his relatives came to Jamaica from Poland during the Holocaust," he said. "I got the family's history from a great aunt. They founded a chain of clothing stores. They sold it in the late 1950s and then had a bakery specializing in wedding cakes. Polly Cohen, an aunt, operates a nursing home there.

"My grandfather, George Cohen, married a Jamaican woman. My father is Lloyd Cohen, who came to Canada first. When I was in school I'd sometimes skip classes and go to the races. I wanted to be a jockey. Of course, my mother objected.

Michael Cohen

"When we came here, I worked in a company that packaged chemicals, but my doctor told me it was affecting my health. So I thought I'd give racing a try. I started as a 'hot walker,' a person who walks the horses after exercise or races until they cool down. Then I became a groom and worked for Winston Wilkinson, then Audre Capucetti, whose stable earned $2 million last year.

"Late last year, I got a few horses to train for the SGB Stable, and some from trainers Norman De Zouza and Glen Magnusson. This year, my first as a head trainer, we're off to a good start."

In his stable's first 33 starts at Fort Erie, Cohen had saddled six winners, two second-place finishers and three third-place horses. His first starter, Last Pax, was bought cheaply and earned over $20,000.

Despite his early ambition to be a jockey, Cohen confessed, "I ride chairs the best." The hardest thing about being a trainer, he said "is keeping the horses' legs comfortable despite the pounding they take day after day. Some don't like hot weather. They all have their little idiosyncrasies and you have to learn them by observation. My wife Lynda, a police forensic specialist, helps me when she is able."

Although he has had no formal studies in Judaism, Cohen said, "I'm proud of my heritage and proud to be part of the Jewish people. They have overcome so much hate and discrimination, I'm proud to carry my name and to wear a chai pendant and to have the Star of David on my own racing colours."

In addition to hearing stories of his family's history, Cohen said his doctor, whose daughter was killed by Palestinian terrorists in Israel, had also helped him learn about Judaism.

"I think about my roots a lot. My Jewish roots from my father's side from Poland, and my roots from my mother's side from Africa. I love both. You have to be proud of who you are. It's still a fight, there's still a lot of oppression."

Israeli self-defence discipline heading our way

By BRIAN BLOOM
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A new, ruthless form of Israeli self-defence is becoming immensely popular across the Peace Bridge. And it's heading our way.

Called Krav Maga (Hebrew for "contact combat"), it's an effective and absolutely vicious combat method that was developed for the Israeli military in the 1950s. It has been constantly refined throughout Israel's turbulent history and is reputed to be the most battle-proven system of hand-to-hand combat in the world. It is now being taught to thousands of military personnel, law enforcement agents and ordinary people worldwide.

From its beginnings in Israel to its rapidly expanding presence in Europe and the United States, Krav Maga is poised to invade fitness centres and martial arts clubs in Ontario from its base in suburban Buffalo.

Practical aspects of personal safety can be ugly. Students of the system use, without hesitation, every weapon they possess: hands, feet, elbows, knees, teeth and just about any object lying around. According to Krav Maga theory, this versatile way of handling a violent street attack is vitally important for survival.

"Unfortunately," says Rick Fors III, the chief operating officer of the Krav Maga Northeast Regional Training Center in Williamsville, N.Y., "honour has long disappeared from the challenger of fights. The attacks that we see now, particularly through surveillance tapes, are quick, vicious and last no more than 15 to 18 seconds."

He's referring to the violent attacks caught on tape that he and other instructors watch and study to continually improve the system.

He says the most important difference between Krav Maga and traditional martial arts is its distinctive training method.

"Krav Maga is an instinctive response to danger," he says. "We simply take the movement that our body will do anyway, build on that, and then, even under stress and fatigue, under an assault, the technique flies out from us."

A natural response to a choking attack, for instance, would be grabbing the hands around your neck. The defence would start with that movement and progress into a counter-attack. All Krav Maga self-defence techniques are based on our instinctive reactions. That, says Fors, is the difference between Krav Maga and a traditional martial art. He adds that the instinct-based techniques make it suitable for people of all ages.

"The people who fill our classes are anywhere from 16 to 55," he says, "and they can't afford, nor can they dedicate, a great period of time studying to achieve a black belt [in a traditional martial art]. In as little as six months, many of the people who come in, who may have never thrown a punch in their life, get Krav Maga."

But Krav Maga is not a paranoid style of reacting. "It's a reality vision," says Fors. "For people to be safe on the street, we need a street-based system that's battle proven. That's Krav Maga."

Imi Lichtenfeld, a native of Bratislava, Slovakia, founded Krav Maga. A superb athlete, proficient in gymnastics, boxing and wrestling, he began developing the system during the dark days of World War II. His father, a highly regarded defensive tactics instructor, gave Imi insight into the instinctive human responses to danger—really the foundation of what was to become Krav Maga.

Lichtenfeld escaped from Europe to Israel and fought in its war of independence from 1947 to 1949. In the years after the war, Lichtenfeld was asked by the new government to develop a practical self-defence system that could easily be picked up by both men and women. Krav Maga became the standard for hand-to-hand combat in the Israeli army, an army with both men and women in its ranks.

The Krav Maga Northeast Regional Training Center is one of two major facilities that co-ordinate the growth of the system throughout the United States and Canada. The other, in Los Angeles, is the home base of Krav Maga. Both centres train all Krav Maga instructors directly to make sure the system retains its integrity. The Buffalo centre is in charge of all Krav Maga affairs in the northeastern United States and Ontario. The first school in this province opened up very recently in Oshawa.

Both Fors and Stephen Spoth, the chief instructor at the Buffalo centre, hope to raise its profile in Ontario, especially in major cities such as Toronto, where demand is high.

About Food

Dear Norene

Now that I've finally finished my latest cookbook, The Food Processor Bible (coming soon!), I'm back in my kitchen and eager to start cooking again. I was thrilled to receive a review copy of Vegetarian Classics by Jeanne Lemlin (HarperCollins, $44.95). A cooking teacher and food writer, this is Lemlin's fourth cookbook. I highly recommend it!

There are 300 delicious recipes plus a glossary of key ingredients and many helpful tips and techniques. Her recipes combine fresh ingredients with convenience products (i.e., store-bought frozen puff pastry, no-boil lasagna noodles). The recipes are uncomplicated and use basic ingredients – just my style!

You'll find appetizers, soups, salads, sandwiches, side dishes, pizzas, pasta dishes, quiches, casseroles, tasty tofu dishes, stir-fries, plus a large baking section. There are tempting breakfast and brunch dishes such as Grand Marnier French Toast and Perfect Pancakes. I can't wait to try Eggplant Parmesan, Mock Meat Loaf with Mushroom Gravy, Wasabi Mashed Potatoes, Israeli Couscous with Tomato and Scallions… and White Chocolate Raspberry Cheesecake. Oy!

I was delighted to discover this recipe for one of my favourite potato dishes in Lemlin's book. I often order it at a popular Greek restaurant in Toronto. Enjoy!

STUFFED BAKED POTATOES WITH SPINACH AND FETA CHEESE

4 baking (Idaho or russet) potatoes, scrubbed well
2 tbsp. olive oil
2 garlic cloves, pressed or minced
4 scallions, very thinly sliced
1 (10-oz.) pkg. frozen chopped spinach, thawed and squeezed dry
1 tsp. minced fresh dill (or ½ tsp. dried)
2 tbsp. butter
¼ cup finely crumbled feta cheese
1 cup grated mozzarella cheese

Prick potatoes with a fork or knife a few times so they don't explode when baking. Set the oven at 400 and place potatoes on oven rack. Bake until tender when pierced with a knife, about 1 hour.

Heat oil in a medium-sized skillet over medium heat. Add garlic and scallions, and cook 2 minutes, or just until heated through and softened. Mix in spinach and dill; remove from heat.

When potatoes are done, slice in half lengthwise. Scoop flesh into a bowl, leaving about ¼ inch in the shell. Mash potatoes with a fork. Combine with spinach mixture, butter, and feta and mozzarella cheeses. Stuff each shell with mixture and smooth over the tops. (You can wait up to 2 hours before baking again.)

Place stuffed potatoes on a baking sheet and return to oven. Bake 20 minutes, or until hot throughout and golden. Serves 4.

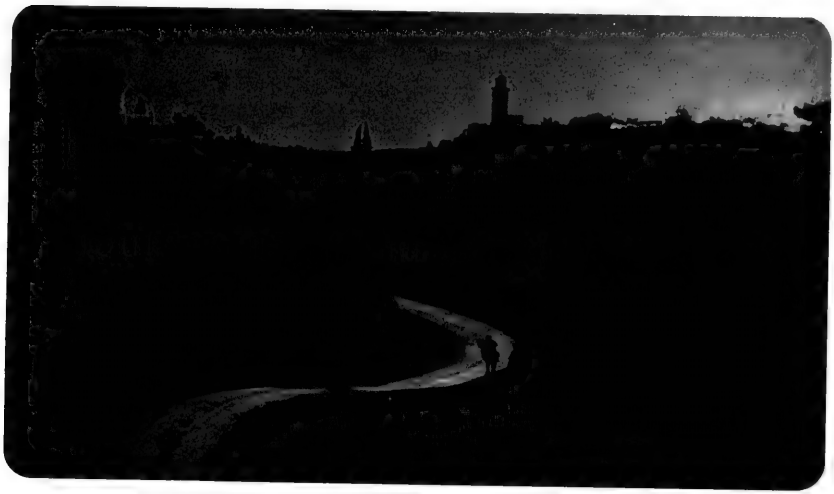
SPECIAL REPORTS

REWINDING 9/11 - Dennis Prager
WE ARE NOT RESIGNED - David Wolpe
CHOOSING SURVIVAL - Benjamin Netanyahu
A U.N. FOR ALL RELIGIONS - Menachem Froman
UNVEILING DURBAN - Michael Melchior



As we were putting the finishing touches to this special issue of OLAM on Jerusalem, the horrors of September 11 shook us to our core. Initially, we had no idea how, or even whether to address this disaster.

But on further reflection, we decided to pour our hearts out and not ignore what is perhaps the biggest issue of our time. So we have dedicated a 6-page special section ("Reactions from 9/11"), where prominent voices like Dennis Prager, David Wolpe and Benjamin Netanyahu speak their peace.

After this soul-searching prologue, we begin our spiritual journey to the heart of the world.

Can a journey to Jerusalem nourish us in these crazy times? We believe so, but we'll let you be the judge.

To get to the bone marrow of Jerusalem – as a city and as an idea – we asked an eclectic group of people with deep connections to the city to tell us their stories. In a few cases, we uncovered some pieces from twenty and thirty years ago that we felt were ominously prophetic.

As you feast or nibble on this commemorative issue, you will discover a city of mirrors. No two people see Jerusalem in quite the same way. While they might agree on some things, the mysterious pull of the city invites individual expression.

You'll discover a Jerusalem that is at turns romantic, chaotic, elusive, unifying, infuriating, divisive, musical, mystical, political, eternal and immediate.

You'll hear from "Mister Jerusalem" himself, former mayor Teddy Kollek; Amos Oz's meditation on a "Strange City"; Elie Wiesel and his ode to memory; Wendy Wasserstein and her theatrical view of the city; Muslim scholar Shaykh Abdul Hadi Palazzi on the Koran's view regarding Jerusalem; Mordechai Gafni and the spiritual youth movement of "Generation J"; Yossi Klein Halevi's search for God with Christians and Muslims in the Holy Land; a Chassidic rabbi's contention that Jerusalem ought to be the capital of the world; Shimon Peres's speech to the Knesset on Jerusalem; Gahl Sasson's challenging view of the "Golden Calf Within"; David Katzin's two-way pilgrimage from L.A.; and Daniel Bouskila's "Sephardic Angel", among many other delights. You'll even get a Magical Mystical Tour of the holy sites from a master tour guide. In other words, you'll get Jerusalem "in living color."

At a time when we're all going through the "middle hour of our grief," learning to cope with a new sense of vulnerability, we invite you to absorb Jerusalem – the city that invented "hanging in there."

When we see our deepest values being challenged, we can take comfort in a city that has survived endless threats for over 3,000 years, and stands today as a bruised but noble monument to the indomitable spirit of survival.

Enjoy the journey.

What Americans most need at this time, following the atrocities committed against us by Muslim terrorists, is clarity. Just as in our own personal lives we can far better deal with adversity when we understand what is happening to us, a nation can better deal with adversity when it is clear about the reasons for its suffering.

Most important is that we understand why America is hated among large segments of the Arab/Muslim world. And let us be honest – it is large parts. The oft-repeated line that Muslim terrorist ideology represents a tiny fringe element in the Muslim world is either wishful thinking or deliberately disingenuous. In that part of the Muslim world which is Arab, New York Times foreign affairs columnist Thomas Friedman has written that in his estimation, it is divided 50-50 between those who support the terrorist attack on New York and Washington and those who do not support it.

Why do so many Muslims hate us? One answer offered by some experts, especially in academia, which has an uncanny ability to either ignore or defend Third World atrocities, is that Arabs and other Muslims have deep-seated resentments against the West because of colonization. The Arab world, in particular, was simply divided into countries at the whim of the Western powers following the collapse of the Ottoman Empire at the end of World War I.

Now, no one can deny for one moment the unfairness to the Arabs at that time – but that does not explain the popularity of fanatical Muslim thinking or the hatred for America.

For one thing, America never colonized an inch of Arab or Muslim territory.

For another, the whole colonization argument is flawed almost to the point of irrelevance. India was colonized, and since its inception in 1948, it has been one of the world's preeminent democracies, with freedom of religion, freedom of assembly, of speech, and all the other personal freedoms not to be found anywhere in the Arab world or almost anywhere in the Muslim world at large. And Saudi Arabia, the country that has supplied the world with Osama bin Laden and most of the terrorists involved in the attack on America, was never colonized!

Another common reason/excuse offered for the Arab and Muslim hatred of America is their poverty. Arabs and Muslims, various experts tell us, are so poor that their lives descend into a hopelessness that breeds suicide bombers.

This excuse is so preposterous that it actually says far more about the lack of wisdom and values in anyone proposing it than it does about fanatical Muslims. Why don't other poor societies produce suicide bombers? Why is equally poor India free of them? Why do so many terrorists come from one of the richest societies in the world – Saudi Arabia? Why is it that most of the terrorists who perpetrated the New York massacres came from middle and upper middle class backgrounds? Why, according to the Wall Street Journal, do wealthier Egyptians disproportionately support Muslim terror?

A third reason/excuse given for Muslim violence and hatred of America is the lack of freedom in the Arab world in non-democratic regimes such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia that are backed by the United States.

This excuse is as indefensible as the violence it purportedly explains. Yes, the United States backs non-democratic regimes in the Arab world. But let us compare those regimes to the Islamic regimes – in Iran, Libya, Sudan, and Afghanistan – that overthrew them. Are they more or less democratic? More or less free? More or less violent? In every single case the Islamists who overthrew the non-democratic pro-Western regime have created some of the most vile societies in the world. Islamist Sudan has massacred about one million non-Muslim blacks. Islamist Iran has created a religious totalitarianism that makes the Shah's Iran look liberal – just ask the women of Iran. Islamist Libya is a moral cesspool compared to what it was under King Idris, whom Muammar Qadafi overthrew.

The colonization reason/excuse, the poverty reason/excuse, and the American backing of non-democratic regimes reason/excuse are all offered in order to avoid acknowledging the real problem – contemporary Islamic theology. It is very painful for all tolerant people, for all of us who believe in religious pluralism, to acknowledge that major segments of Islam promote evil at this time.

The leading scholar at the leading Muslim seminary, Al Azhar in Cairo, has declared that suicide bombing against civilians (even Jewish ones, to his credit) is against Muslim law, but his voice is drowned out by most other leading Muslim scholars and ulema (religious scholars) at Al Azhar and throughout the Arab world and Iran.

A particularly vicious theology of conquest and martyrdom is flourishing in the Islamic world. Essentially, it holds that murdering non-Muslims is God's demand, that dying while doing so gives the mass murderer immediate entrance into paradise, and that among the rewards of paradise are 72 virgins for his pleasure.

Special Report: Reactions from 9/11 (pages 4-9)

If you want to see what contemporary Islamist theology produces, just look at the places this theology governs — Sudan, Afghanistan, Libya, Iran — four of the most brutal and least free places on earth. Indeed, the ideology of these societies is often so primitive that it is fair to say that any woman in seventeenth century Puritan America had far greater value and far more human rights than a woman in any of these Islamist ruled countries.

The greatest evil on earth at this time comes from within Islam. Major segments of a great religion have become the moral successors to Nazism and Communism (with the frightening difference that Nazi and Communist mass murderers at least valued their own lives). And like Communists and Nazis, Islamists deem America a mortal enemy. If one can judge a country, as one can judge an individual, by who its friends and enemies are, America can be very proud of itself. To be hated by the Taliban and Osama bin Laden is a virtue.

Without a civil war within Islam, there is little hope for mankind to avoid massive bloodshed. Perhaps an analogy to American Christianity in the second half of the nineteenth century can help. Christians faced a major decision — would they and their religion support or oppose the enslavement of Africans? There were devout Christians who believed that Christianity supported slavery, and there were devout Christians who opposed slavery (indeed the abolitionist movement was largely Christian). America fought its bloodiest war over that question. The good (and I believe authentic) Christians won, and American Christianity went on to continue to help shape a society that has been a beacon of tolerance and goodness to the world. A beacon whose light has shined particularly brightly upon us American Jews. The Christians' civil war saved the soul of Christianity in America.

Unless good Muslims fight for the soul of Islam at this time, that religion will sink into an abyss from which it may never recover. Already the name of Islam has been deeply sullied in the eyes of a world that sees Muslims engage in deliberate massacres of civilians not seen since Nazism, all in the name of Allah. As the September 11th terrorists slit the throats of defenseless stewardesses and crashed planes into the World Trade Center, they undoubtedly uttered "Allahu Akbar" ("God is the greatest").

It is particularly important that America and we Jews blessed to live here understand why Islamic fanatics so hate America. Though America's support for Israel is neither the only nor the main reason for Arab/Muslim hatred of America, one way to understand this hatred is to understand America's uniqueness in its love of Jews, of Judaism, and of Israel. Indeed, America is the one Judeo-Christian society in the world. There are many Christian countries, and there is one Jewish country. But there is only one Judeo-Christian country, the United States of America.

That is why those parts of America that most affirm its Judeo-Christian roots have been the most pro-Israel; while those parts that least affirm the Judeo-Christian nature of America, including, sadly, more than a few Jews, have been the least supportive of Israel. The former are represented by Christians like George W. Bush who, though he owes nothing to American Jews politically, showed himself strongly committed to Israel well before the attack on America by Israel's enemies.

At the same time, the American institutions and people least supportive of Israel and the most likely to depict Israel and its anti-democratic enemies as morally equivalent are those most alienated from a Judeo-Christian America. The most obvious examples are the left in academia and the media. For those American Jews who are uncomfortable with acknowledging the religious roots of our country and who do not acknowledge the need to nourish those roots, this is so painful as to demand denial.

Yet it is undeniable. During the Arab oil embargo following the 1973 Yom Kippur War, a prominent preacher told his church and a nationwide Christian audience that he would sooner ride a bicycle to work and abandon his car than give in to the Arab oil boycott. His reason? Because, he said, quoting Genesis, God blesses those who bless the Jews and curses those who curse the Jews. Likewise, the one national newspaper that has most clearly understood the moral chasm in the Middle East and consequently supported Israel the most consistently has been the Wall Street Journal, not surprisingly the national newspaper most committed to preserving the Judeo-Christian roots of this country.

On September 11, 2001, the enemies of Christianity and Judaism slaughtered thousands of Americans, citizens of the country that has most affirmed both of these traditions. It is not a coincidence.

i have no answers

As I write this, it's now ten days after September 11, and I've been hearing more than a few spiritual "answers" to Black Tuesday – quickly extracted from the ground zero of evil.

I'm hearing about the Hand of God and that "God is in the rubble"; I'm being asked to understand what all this chaos means, "grow" from the experience, even increase my religious observance, among other lessons.

Our messengers of meaning are well intentioned. A spiritual leader needs to comfort his or her flock in these times of singular vulnerability. We crave answers that will help us cope with our disillusionment: How could this happen? How could God let it happen? What does it mean? What should we do?

Yet this time, something unexpected has happened: It doesn't seem to be working. People are still disillusioned; the "answers" seem to be falling short. At least, they're falling short for me. I hear all the lessons and silver linings, but I can't stop thinking about that couple who held hands as they jumped to their deaths, and about the thousands who are "unaccounted for". My heart refuses to move on.

Maybe I'm just tired of acting strong, of being afraid to show weakness. All these sermons, these projections of clarity and strength, are they not simply responding to our desperate need for control, our need to let nothing overwhelm us, however horrific?

Could it be that the horror of September 11 was of such magnitude, so otherworldly, that it even changed the rules of consolation and preaching?

When I hear that I can gain something positive from 9/11 – a re-learning of meaningful values, or a chance to strengthen my spirituality, for example – I tune out. More than 5,500 people have just perished in an inferno; isn't it too soon to think about personal growth?

Those emotions were on my mind when I heard preachers trying to comfort me with their powerful lessons. I wanted to scream: "Just stop for a moment and tell me what's in your heart! Are you feeling what I'm feeling? Are you feeling the presence of the unexplainable? How will you help me mourn?"

Our Jewish tradition frowns on trying to explain tragedies to mourning family members. Rabbi Nachman of Breslev made the point that when comforting the grieving, the absence of an answer is the answer. When the unspeakable happens, he says, the Godly response is to not speak. Only that silence can answer the tragic.

Perhaps the current "answers" aren't working because we all feel like we're family members to the victims of 9/11, and we're looking for special treatment. And why not?

As we mourn the victims, we might try replacing familiar spiritual soundbites with divine silence; and the search for comforting answers with a deeper search for painful questions.

Maybe during this moment of extraordinary collective grief, more preachers can put the answers on hold, and come down and just pray with us.

Excerpts from a September 18th sermon at Sinai Temple in Los Angeles:

On Sunday I was on a panel on CNN. There was a great deal of talk about love. The Muslim cleric spoke about love. The Priest spoke about love. I too spoke about love. But I also spoke about anger.

Islam, I have been counseled, means submission. Yisrael means wrestling with God.

We are God wrestlers, and must wrestle with this.

I am angry. I am angry at God, and at human beings. I am angry at the manifold idiocies and indifference that has permitted such hatred to flourish.

Don't tell me we should not blame God, since human beings did this, because even though God gave us free will, and we are culpable, I also know that God fashioned our hearts and our world. Must we be angry with those who do evil? Absolutely. We must also be angry at God, for to be angry with God, as Elie Wiesel has taught us, means to be in relationship to God. I feel God in my fury, and love God in my bewilderment.

I am trying to focus on my own sins, but it is hard. I know that the magnitude of others' sins does not wipe out my own, but it is hard.

We have wreaked a good deal of havoc in the world. In this time of repentance, we have much to repent for as a country, as individuals. We are not guiltless. We should not let the horror cut off our self-examination.

We are sinners, but we are not deserving of this cruelty. We are imperfect, but we are not evil. This is the face of radical evil.

And it must be fought.

Yes, it is obscene to see the plane go into the building again and again. America's obsession with the vivid image is not our best feature.

But it reminds us that we are called to mobilize our best efforts.

Why are we here? Le'ovdo ul'shomro. To guard and tend the garden God has given. We have been given this remarkable corner of the cosmos. And the power to destroy it.

We know this enemy. He is the same one who blew up Sbarros in Ben Yehuda street. He is the same one who blew up the Dolphinarium, and ended the lives of scores of teenagers, and bereaved their parents.

The name has changed, but we know him.

We know this ideology-driven fanatic. We have seen his face. Jews are the world's canary in the cave, and though we do not wish to be the first to know, we are.

We must be careful. We have great power. Power means moral choice.

We should feel gratitude that we have such choices. To be powerless is not moral, it is merely powerless. Jews remember too vividly the days when we had no power. The millions who perished in Stalin's camps without a word, whisked away at night. The millions who died in concentration camps while the world turned away, because the Jews were expendable.

Do not lament our power. We know too much history. It is the only bulwark blocking the abyss.

Power requires great guarding of the soul; no doubt of it. But Edmund Burke told us long ago that evil thrives on the apathy of goodness. We dare not slide into apathy; remember Yeats' pointed line that the worst are full of passionate intensity. We too must have that intensity.

You cannot tend the garden without effort. That effort should derive from what we cherish, not what we despise.

G.K. Chesterton wrote: "The true soldier fights not because he hates what is in front of him, but because he loves what is behind him."

In the tape at the Holocaust museum is a survivor who tells of watching another inmate in the camp praying. "Why are you praying?" he asks. The man answers, "I am thanking God."

The first man is stunned. "For what could you be thanking God? What is there to thank God for in this hell?"

And the second man calmly responds, "I am thanking God that he did not make me like them."

We must be careful. It is our job to defend this country, and keep it worth defending. The aim of this war is to fight them without becoming them.

The second point, to put beside our sadness, is our debt. Miraculously, we have been spared. We do not know what tomorrow will bring, but for now we are spared.

If you are sitting beside someone you love, take their hand. You are alive.

Tonight, as your children sleep, kiss them. Because you are alive.

Because we know again that life can be taken in an instant.

Like you, I am overcome with sadness.

As I left my daughter, I thought of all the fathers who are not coming home. I cried for those children, and prayed for us all.

In her Holocaust memoir Etty Hillesum, a Dutch Jew, wrote:

"Give your sorrow all the space and shelter in yourself that is its due, for if everyone bears her grief honestly and courageously, the sorrow that now fills the world will abate. But if you do not clear a decent shelter for your sorrow, and instead reserve most of the space inside you for hatred and thoughts of revenge – from which new sorrows will be born for others – then sorrow will never cease."

We have to fight, but without filling our hearts with hatred. This is a time of memory. Let us remember Brian Sweeney, 38, who left a message for the wife he would never again see in this world, in which he said: "Hey Jules, it's Brian, I'm on a plane and it's hijacked and it doesn't look good. I just wanted you to know that I love you and hope to see you again. If I don't, please have fun in life and live your life the best you can. Know that I love you and no matter what, I'll see you again."

Remember Jeremy Glick, on the plane, who reached his wife. They said I love you over and over again, and he told her he needed her to be happy... and then he was gone. In that moment, no words of revenge, or of hate. Only love endured.

We are together in this synagogue. This is why the synagogue is here. Maybe you come once a year, or twice, but here we stand. Here we have stood for over two thousand years, and here we will continue to stand. To rejoice together, to grieve together, to be willing to fight together.

We are people of broken and yearning hearts. And of love.

I would like to close with a poem of Edna St. Vincent Millay that is both a poem and a prayer. It is called "Dirge Without Music." The first and last stanzas read:

I am not resigned to the shutting away of loving hearts in the hard ground.
So it is, and so it will be, for so it has been, time out of mind.
Into the darkness they go, the wise and the lovely.
Crowned with lilies and laurel they go; but I am not resigned.
Down, down, down into the darkness of the grave.
Gently they go, the beautiful, the tender, the kind;
Quietly they go, the intelligent, the witty, the brave.
I know. But I do not approve. And I am not resigned.

We do not approve. We are not resigned. But we are people of hope, and children of God. So we pray.

Briefing given by former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on 9/24/01 to the US House of Representatives' Government Reform Committee.

"Distinguished representatives, I want to thank you for inviting me to appear before you today. I feel a profound responsibility addressing you in this hour of peril in the capital of liberty.

What is at stake today is nothing less than the survival of our civilization. There may be some who would have thought a week ago that to talk in these apocalyptic terms about the battle against international terrorism was to engage in reckless exaggeration. No longer.

Each one of us today understands that we are all targets, that our cities are vulnerable, and that our values are hated with an unmatched fanaticism that seeks to destroy our societies and our way of life.

I am certain that I speak on behalf of my entire nation when I say: Today, we are all Americans. In grief, as in defiance. In grief, because my people have faced the agonizing horrors of terror for many decades, and we feel an instant kinship with both the victims of this tragedy and the great nation that mourns its fallen brothers and sisters. In defiance, because just as my country continues to fight terrorism in our battle for survival, I know that America will not cower before this challenge.

I have absolute confidence that if we, the citizens of the free world, led by President Bush, marshall the enormous reserves of power at our disposal, harness the steely resolve of a free people, and mobilize our collective will, we shall eradicate this evil from the face of the earth.

But to achieve this goal, we must first answer several questions: Who is responsible for this terrorist onslaught? Why, what is the motive behind these attacks? And most importantly, what must be done to defeat these evil forces?

The first and most crucial thing to understand is this: There is no international terrorism without the support of sovereign states.

International terrorism simply cannot be sustained for long without the regimes that aid and abet it. Terrorists are not suspended in mid-air. They train, arm and indoctrinate their killers from within safe havens on territory provided by terrorist states. Often these regimes provide the terrorists with intelligence, money, and operational assistance, dispatching them to serve as deadly proxies to wage a hidden war against more powerful enemies.

These regimes mount a worldwide propaganda campaign to legitimize terror, besmirching its victims and exculpating its practitioners – as we witnessed in the farcical spectacle in the UN conference on racism in Durban last month. Iran, Libya, and Syria call the U.S. and Israel racist countries that abuse human rights? Even Orwell could not have imagined such a world.

Take away all this state support and the entire scaffolding of international terrorism will collapse into the dust.

The international terrorist network is thus based on regimes – Iran, Iraq, Syria, Taliban/ Afghanistan, Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority, and several other Arab regimes, such as the Sudan. These regimes are the ones that harbor the terrorist groups: Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan, Hizbullah and others in Syrian-controlled Lebanon, Hamas, Islamic Jihad, and the recently mobilized Fatah and Tanzim factions in the Palestinian territories, and sundry other terror organizations based in such capitals as Damascus, Baghdad, and Khartoum.

These terrorist states and terror organizations together form a terror network, whose constituent parts support each other operationally as well as politically. For example, the Palestinian groups cooperate closely with Hizbullah, which in turn links them to Syria, Iran and bin Laden. These offshoots of terror have affiliates in other states that have not yet uprooted their presence, such as Egypt, Yemen, and Saudi Arabia.

The growth of this terror network is the result of several developments in the last two decades: Chief among them is the Khomeini revolution and the establishment of a clerical Islamic state in Iran. This created a sovereign spiritual base for fomenting a strident Islamic militancy worldwide, a militancy that was often backed by terror.

Equally important was the victory in the Afghan war of the International Mujahadeen Brotherhood. This international band of zealots, whose ranks include Osama bin Laden, saw their victory over the Soviet Union as providential proof of the innate supremacy of faithful Muslims over the weak infidel powers. They believed that even the superior weapons of a superpower could not withstand their superior will.

To this should also be added Saddam Hussein's escape from destruction at the end of the Gulf War, his dismissal of UN monitors, and his growing confidence that he can soon develop unconventional weapons to match those of the West.

Finally, the creation of Yasser Arafat's terror enclave gave a safe haven to militant Islamic terrorist groups, such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Like their mujahadin cousins, they drew inspiration from Israel's hasty withdrawal from Lebanon, glorified as a great Muslim victory by the Syrian-backed Hizbullah. Under Arafat's rule, these Palestinian Islamic terrorist groups made repeated use of the technique of suicide bombing, going so far as to run summer camps in Gaza that teach Palestinian children how to become suicide martyrs.

Here is what Arafat's government-controlled newspaper, Al Hayat al Jadida, said on the very day of the suicide bombing of the World Trade Center and the Pentagon: "The suicide bombers of today are the noble successors of the Lebanese suicide bombers, who taught the U.S. Marines a tough lesson. These suicide bombers are the salt of the earth, the engines of history. They are the most honorable people among us."

A simple rule prevails here: The success of terrorists in one part of the terror network emboldens terrorists throughout the network. This then is the who. Now for the why.

Though its separate parts may have local objectives and take part in local conflicts, the main motivation driving the terror network is an anti-Western hostility that seeks to achieve nothing less than a reversal of history. It seeks to roll back the West and install an extremist form of Islam as the dominant power in the world. And it seeks to do this not by means of its own advancement and progress but by destroying the enemy. This hatred is the product of a seething resentment that has simmered for centuries in certain parts of the Arab and Islamic world.

Most Muslims in the world, including the vast majority of the growing Muslim communities in the West, are not guided by this interpretation of history, nor are they moved by its call for a holy war against the West. But some are. And though their numbers are small compared to the peaceable majority, they nevertheless constitute a growing hinterland for this militancy.

Militant Islamists resented the West for pushing back the triumphant march of Islam into the heart of Europe many centuries ago. Its adherents, believing in the innate supremacy of Islam, then suffered a series of shocks when in the last two centuries that same hated, supposedly inferior West penetrated Islamic realms in North Africa, the Middle East, and the Persian Gulf.

For them the mission was clear: The West had to be first pushed out of these areas. Pro-western Middle Eastern regimes were toppled in rapid succession, including in Iran. And Israel, the Middle East's only democracy and its purest manifestation of Western progress and freedom, must be wiped off the face of the earth.

Thus, the soldiers of militant Islam do not hate the West because of Israel, they hate Israel because of the West – because they see it is an island of Western democratic values in a Muslim-Arab sea of despotism. That is why they call Israel the Little Satan, to distinguish it clearly from the country that has always been and will always be the Great Satan – the United States of America.

Nothing better illustrates this than Osama bin Laden's call for jihad against the United States in 1998. He gave as his primary reason not Israel, not the Palestinians, not the "peace process," but rather the very presence of the United States "occupying the land of Islam in the holiest of places." And where is that? "The Arabian peninsula," says bin Laden, where America is "plundering its riches, dictating to its rulers, and humiliating its people." Israel, by the way, comes a distant third, after "the continuing aggression against the Iraqi people" (Al Quds al Arabi, February 23, 1998). For the bin Ladens of the world, Israel is merely a sideshow.

America is the target.

But reestablishing a resurgent Islam requires not just rolling back the West; it requires destroying its main engine, the United States. And if the U.S. cannot be destroyed just now, it can be first humiliated – as in the Tehran hostage crisis two decades ago – and then ferociously attacked again and again, until it is brought to its knees. But the ultimate goal remains the same: Destroy America and win eternity.

Some of you may find it hard to believe that Islamic militants truly cling to the mad fantasy of destroying America. Make no mistake about it. They do.

And unless they are stopped now, their attacks will continue, and become even more lethal in the future.

To understand the true dangers of Islamic militancy, we can compare it to another ideology that sought world domination – communism. Both movements pursued irrational goals, but the communists at least pursued theirs in a rational way. Anytime they had to choose between ideology and their own survival, as in Cuba or Berlin, they backed off and chose survival. Not so for the Islamic militants. They pursue an irrational ideology irrationally – with no apparent regard for human life, neither their own nor the lives of their enemies. The communists seldom, if ever, produced suicide bombers, while Islamic militancy produces hordes of them, glorifying them and promising them that their dastardly deeds will earn them a glorious afterlife. This highly pathological aspect of Islamic militancy is what makes it so deadly for mankind.

When in 1996 I wrote a book about fighting terrorism, I warned about the militant Islamic groups operating in the West with the support of foreign powers – serving as a new breed of "domestic-international" terrorists, basing themselves in America to wage jihad against America: "Such groups," I wrote then, "nullify in large measure the need to have air power or intercontinental missiles as delivery systems for an Islamic nuclear payload. They will be the delivery system. In the worst of such scenarios, the consequences could be not a car bomb but a nuclear bomb in the basement of the World Trade Center."

Well, they did not use a nuclear bomb. They used two 150-ton fully fueled jetliners to wipe out the Twin Towers. But does anyone doubt that given the chance, they will throw atom bombs at America and its allies? And perhaps long before that, chemical and biological weapons?

This is the greatest danger facing our common future. Some states of the terror network already possess chemical and biological capabilities, and some are feverishly developing nuclear weapons. Can one rule out the possibility that they will be tempted to use such weapons, openly or through terror proxies, or that their weapons might fall into the hands of the terrorist groups they harbor?

We have received a wake up call from hell. Now the question is simple: Do we rally to defeat this evil, while there is still time, or do we press a collective snooze button and go back to business as usual?

The time for action is now.

Today the terrorists have the will to destroy us, but they do not have the power. There is no doubt that we have the power to crush them. Now we must also show that we have the will. Once any part of the terror network acquires nuclear weapons, this equation will fundamentally change and with it the course of human affairs. This is the historical imperative that now confronts all of us.

And now the third point: What do we do about it? First, as President Bush said, we must make no distinction between the terrorists and the states that support them. It is not enough to root out the terrorists who committed this horrific act of war. We must dismantle the entire terrorist network.

If any part of it remains intact, it will rebuild itself, and the specter of terrorism will reemerge and strike again. Bin Laden, for example, has shuttled over the last decade from Saudi Arabia to Afghanistan to the Sudan and back again. So we must not leave any base intact.

To achieve this goal we must first have moral clarity. We must fight terror wherever and whenever it appears. We must make all states play by the same rules. We must declare terrorism a crime against humanity, and we must consider the terrorists enemies of mankind, to be given no quarter and no consideration for their purported grievances. If we begin to distinguish between acts of terror, justifying some and repudiating others based on sympathy with this or that cause, we will lose the moral clarity that is so essential for victory.

This clarity is what enabled America and Britain to root out piracy in the 19th century. This is how the Allies rooted out Nazism in the 20th century.

They did not look for the "root cause" of piracy or the "root cause" of Nazism – because they knew that some acts are evil in and of themselves and do not deserve any consideration or "understanding." They did not ask if Hitler was right about the alleged wrong done to Germany at Versailles; that they left to the historians. The leaders of the Western Alliance said something else: Nothing justifies Nazism. Nothing! We must be equally clear cut today: Nothing justifies terrorism. Nothing! Terrorism is defined not by the identity of its perpetrators nor by the cause they espouse. Rather, it is defined by the nature of the act.

Terrorism is the deliberate attack on innocent civilians. In this it must be distinguished from legitimate acts of war that target combatants and may unintentionally harm civilians.

When the British bombed the Copenhagen Gestapo headquarters in 1944, and one of their bombs unintentionally struck a children's hospital, that was a tragedy, but it was not terrorism. When a few weeks ago Israel fired a missile that killed two Hamas arch-terrorists, and two Palestinian children who were playing nearby were accidentally struck down, that was a tragedy, but it was not terrorism.

Terrorists do not unintentionally harm civilians. They deliberately murder, maim, and menace civilians – as many as possible.

No cause, no grievance, no apology can ever justify terrorism. Terrorism against Americans, Israelis, Spaniards, Britons, Russians, or anyone else is all part of the same evil and must be treated as such. It is time to establish a fixed principle for the international community: Any cause that uses terrorism to advance its aims will not be rewarded. On the contrary, it will be punished and placed beyond the pale.

Armed with this moral clarity in defining terrorism, we must possess an equal moral clarity in fighting it. If we include Iran, Syria, and the Palestinian Authority in the coalition to fight terror – even though they currently harbor, sponsor, and dispatch terrorists – then the alliance against terror will be defeated from within.

Perhaps we might achieve a short-term objective of destroying one terrorist fiefdom, but it will preclude the possibility of overall victory. Such a coalition will melt down because of its own internal contradictions. We might win a battle. We will certainly lose the war.

These regimes, like all terrorist states, must be given a forthright demand: Stop terrorism, permanently, or you will face the wrath of the free world – through harsh and sustained political, economic, and military sanctions.

Obviously, some of these regimes will scramble in fear and issue platitudes about their opposition to terror, just as Arafat, Iran, and Syria did, while they keep their terror apparatus intact. We should not be fooled. These regimes are already on the US list of states supporting terrorism – and if they are not, they should be.

The price of admission for any state into the coalition against terror must be to first completely dismantle the terrorist infrastructures within their realm. Iran will have to dismantle a worldwide network of terrorism and incitement based in Teheran. Syria will have to shut down Hizbullah and the dozen terrorist organizations that operate freely in Damascus and in Lebanon. Arafat will have to crush Hamas and Islamic Jihad, close down their suicide factories and training grounds, rein in his own Fatah and Tanzim terrorists, and cease the endless incitement to violence.

To win this war, we must fight on many fronts. The most obvious is direct military action against the terrorists themselves. Israel's policy of preemptively striking at those who seek to murder its people is, I believe, better understood today and requires no further elaboration.

But there is no substitute for the key action that we must take: imposing the most punishing diplomatic, economic and military sanctions on all terrorist states. To this must be added these measures: Freeze financial assets in the West of terrorist regimes and organizations; revise legislation, subject to periodic renewal, to enable better surveillance against organizations inciting violence; keep convicted terrorists behind bars; do not negotiate with terrorists; train special forces to fight terror; and not least important, impose sanctions on suppliers of nuclear technology to terrorist states.

I have had some experience in pursuing all these courses of action in Israel's battle against terrorism, and I will be glad to elaborate on any one of them if you wish, including the sensitive questions surrounding intelligence.

But I have to be clear: Victory over terrorism is not, at its most fundamental level, a matter of law enforcement or intelligence. However important these functions may be, they can only reduce the dangers, not eliminate them. The immediate objective is to end all state support for and complicity with terror. If vigorously and continuously challenged, most of these regimes can be deterred from sponsoring terrorism.

But there is a real possibility that some will not be deterred – and those may be regimes that possess weapons of mass destruction. Again, we cannot dismiss the possibility that a militant terrorist state will use its proxies to threaten or launch a nuclear attack with apparent impunity. Nor can we completely dismiss the possibility that a militant regime, like its terrorist proxies, will commit collective suicide for the sake of its fanatical ideology.

In this case, we might face not thousands of dead, but hundreds of thousands and possibly millions. This is why the U.S. must do everything in its power to prevent regimes like Iran and Iraq from developing nuclear weapons, and disarm them of their weapons of mass destruction.

This is the great mission that now stands before the free world. That mission must not be watered down to allow certain states to participate in the coalition that is now being organized. Rather, the coalition must be built around this mission.

It may be that some will shy away from adopting such an uncompromising stance against terrorism. If some free states choose to remain on the sidelines, America must be prepared to march forward without them – for there is no substitute for moral and strategic clarity. I believe that if the United States stands on principle, all the democracies will eventually join the war on terrorism. The easy route may be tempting, but it will not win the day.

On September 11, I, like everyone else, was glued to a television set watching the savagery that struck America. Yet amid the smoking ruins of the Twin Towers one could make out the Statue of Liberty holding high the torch of freedom. It is freedom's flame that the terrorists sought to extinguish. But it is that same torch, so proudly held by the United States, that can lead the free world to crush the forces of terror and secure our tomorrow.

It is within our power. Let us now make sure that it is within our will.

How has Jerusalem, devoid of commercial, industrial or strategic significance, crept to the heart of contention between Israel and the Palestinians? Why does Jerusalem matter? The beginning of understanding is to grasp the importance of memory.

© LAM

By defining the past, memory creates the present. Repression of memory creates mental disease. Health comes from memory's recovery. Stalin airbrushed Trotsky from photographs. Revisionists deny the Holocaust. Why does it matter?

Man is his memory. Those who suffer memory loss don't just misplace their keys. They lose themselves. They become lost and adrift in time, because without memory the current moment has no context and no meaning.

When the Jews were exiled, the prophet Jeremiah said, "If I forget Jerusalem let my right hand lose its strength." Somehow the memory of Jerusalem is linked to our vigor as a people. But why? What is the memory of Jerusalem, and what does it give us?

London comes from a Celtic word for "a wild and wooded town." Cairo is an anglicized version of the Arab name for Mars, the Roman god of war. Paris is named for the Paris of Greek myth, asked by the gods to choose between love, wisdom, and power. He chose love – the love of Helen of Troy.

The Talmud says Jerusalem was named by G-d. The name can be interpreted as having two parts: Yira, which means to see, and shalem, which means peace.

Jerusalem was the place of Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac, and Abraham said of Jerusalem, "This is the place where G-d is seen."

Elsewhere, G-d is a theory, but in Jerusalem G-d is seen and felt as a tangible presence. In Jerusalem we reach beyond the frailty and vulnerability of our lives, and we sense and strive for transcendence. Elsewhere we grope for insight. In Jerusalem we anticipate clarity. Paris may be for lovers, but Jerusalem is for visionaries.

Jerusalem is a metaphor for a perfected world, and it gives us perspective on our lives. When Aldous Huxley said, "We have each of us our Jerusalem," he meant much more than a temporal city of taxi-cabs and traffic jams. He meant a vision of what life might be.

The vision of life's promise is one we surrender at our peril because it gives us the will to live. In exile for two thousand years Jews said "Next year in Jerusalem," and amidst poverty and oppression they preserved the dream of a world in which love and justice, not power and self-interest, would be the currency people live by.

The other part of Jerusalem's name is peace, but the peace Jerusalem offers is not absence of strife. The peace of Jerusalem is the peace at the center of the spokes of a wheel, opposing forces delicately balanced and reconciled.

The Talmud says creation began in Jerusalem, and from there radiated outward. Medieval maps show Jerusalem at the intersection of Asia, Europe and Africa. The world flows into this spot and all life's forces resonate here. From this place the world is cast into perspective.

> "Elsewhere we grope for insight. In Jerusalem we anticipate clarity. Paris may be for lovers, but Jerusalem is for visionaries."

Men have long understood that he who controls Jerusalem controls the world's memory. He controls the way G-d is seen. He controls the way life's forces are cast into perspective. He controls how we collectively see our future.

The Temple Mount was once the highest point in Jerusalem, but in 135 CE Roman slaves carried away the mountaintop, turning it into the valley we now look down on from the Old City. The Romans expelled the Jews from Jerusalem and barred their re-entry on pain of death. "Jewish life," they proclaimed, "has ended."

The Crusaders rewrote Jerusalem's importance, center no longer of the Jewish national drama, but site of the crucifixion of Jesus. Like the Romans they expelled Jews and destroyed synagogues. Next the Moslems rewrote Jerusalem's memory, expelling Jews and Christians. Systematically they built mosques on Jewish holy sites, and airbrushed out the past.

But Jews preserved Jerusalem as a memory. We left a square unplastered when we built our homes and broke a glass at weddings in memory of Jerusalem. We turned in prayer toward Jerusalem, and the nurturing of memory kept the Jewish people alive.

When Jerusalem was liberated, time was conflated. The past became present. What we had dreamed of became real, and soldiers wept because an adolescent Mediterranean country was suddenly, incredibly, and transcendentally transformed.

Suddenly we were not despised and impoverished itinerants, surviving on the fickle goodwill of other nations, nor even farmers or warriors, but a nation of priests and prophets, a light unto mankind. We knew ourselves once again as the descendants of those who taught the world "to beat their swords into plowshares," "to love your neighbor as yourself," equality before justice, and that admiration belongs not to the rich and powerful but to the good, the wise and the kind. Hitler said, "The Jews have inflicted two wounds on humanity: Circumcision on the body and conscience on the soul." How right he was and how much more we have to do.

Divided by language, by geography, and even by religion, our people are bound together by exquisitely fragile threads of memory and of hope. If they sever we will fragment.

To this threat, Jerusalem provides counterpoint, for Jerusalem embodies our memories and hopes. Jerusalem is a living memory, a vision of G-d in our lives, an image of a perfected world. Jerusalem gives us the strength to achieve what we as a people must do to unite ourselves and to sanctify this world. This is why we remember.

THE SOUND COMING from the mountains, a melancholy song, a joyous prayer, a dream, a memory: this miraculous place reaching into heaven, I remember it clearly and with as much intensity as I remember the child who cherished it.

I think I pronounced its name before my own. A melodious name, a lullaby, evocative of a distant, familiar yet unknown past, a name that soothed even as it inspired awe, especially at dusk when children and wanderers are afraid to stay alone.

Seventeen times conquered and destroyed, and as many times rebuilt, this timeless capital of Jewish history has, if we are to believe ancient legends, two faces, two destinies. Earthly Jerusalem and heavenly Jerusalem; the one, visible filled with memories of lamentation and mourning; the other, intangible, promising peace and harmony. The two meet in those who place their faith and fervor in memory.

An image in the Talmud:

When the Roman legions, under the command of the wicked general Titus, prepared to ransack and burn the Temple, four angels descended from heaven and set fire to it, as though to demonstrate the impotence of the enemy when attacking God's city. Then, some young priests emerged from the burning sanctuary, climbed to the roof and addressed the Master of the Universe: "We have been unable to safeguard your dwelling, and so we return its keys to You." Whereupon they threw the keys toward heaven. And a hand of fire appeared, seized the keys and carried them away.

There was a time when I blamed those young priests: why give back those precious, sanctified keys? I would have preferred a more provocative language: "God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, You are free to renounce Your sanctuary, sacrifice Your servants and do without Your people. But the keys are ours, they are our memories, and we are determined to keep them."

I remember: it was night. Hungarian Jews in the hundreds and thousands had just disembarked in a weird and accursed kingdom dominated by barbed wire, barking dogs, short commands, demented cries. Men, women and children torn from every land, bearers of every name in Jewish history, representing every facet of the Diaspora – I saw them converge on this place, and suddenly, in what I thought was a dream, a shattering idea crossed my mind: This is a moment of redemption and Kibbutz Galuyot, the Ingathering of Exiles. Gone, the time of torment: gone, the era of darkness. The Third Temple, built in flames, was about to receive those who believed in its power to resist destruction. In a crazy way, for a fleeting instant, I wanted to laugh. Now I can die, I thought in my dream, we can all die, happy and at peace. In Jerusalem.

"Never shall I forget that image, that scene, that day. What would my work and my life be without them?"

Then we all awoke to reality. We found ourselves in a place that will forever represent whatever Jerusalem is not: the unholy side of humanity, the destructive urge of man, the ugly hatred of those who replaced God with their own idols.

Another image, an exulted memory: Moscow, Simchat Torah 1965.

That evening I thought I was delirious, so overwhelmed was my imagination by the unexpectedness, by the dynamic impact of what I was witnessing.

The event began at dusk. Suddenly the center of the capital shifted from Red Square to dusty Arkhipova street to the alley next to the synagogue. For thousands and thousands of Jewish youngsters that hour, every road led to the same place.

College students and laborers, soldiers and musicians, they arrived alone or in small groups, at first hesitant then elated, hair tousled by the wind, balalaikas swung over their shoulders. They came not only from Russia but also from Saragossa in Spain and York in England and Fez in Morocco. Wary but proud as they mingled with the crowd, they were greeted with shouts: "Long live this day, hurrah! Long live the Jewish people, hurrah!" Caught in the frenzy of the dance, they seemed to float on air, transfigured, torn from their shadows, rising above the present, as though climbing Jacob's ladder, the one that reaches into the seventh heaven and perhaps higher still.

I had not felt so strong in a long time, nor so proud. Before the courageous and valiant political dissidents, these youngsters dared to brave the brutality of the Kremlin and its secret police by claiming their kinship with the Jewish people everywhere. Watching them, I let myself drift into the past, into the future, into the clouds; luminous waves carried me to a unique place where words became songs: Jerusalem.

Then, still a third memory: Jerusalem 1967.

The fighting was still going on at various fronts. Snipers were everywhere. But this did not prevent people in mystical ecstasy from running toward the Old City which had been inaccessible to all Jews while it was still under Jordanian rule.

Warriors and Talmudic scholars, hassidim and grocers, schoolchildren and old dreamers, survivors of every hell, faces of every destiny – I saw them breathlessly running, almost flying, toward the winding alleys, the barricaded buildings, running to meet the Wall. And there, incredulous and awed, like children afraid to wake up, they all came to an abrupt halt. Then somebody began to weep, others to pray, still others to dance. The entire country danced. Jewish history danced.

Bursting with joy and gratitude for the privilege of witnessing that moment, I thought: That is Jerusalem, the place that pulls all Jews together, the true city of eternal longing and promise.

Never shall I forget that image, that scene, that day. What would my work and my life be without them?

"Thousands of years passed, and the memory of David's harp became only a distant dream from a long-ago time. Only the legends, the stories and the words of the psalms remained."

"AT MIDNIGHT, I WILL RISE TO GIVE THANKS TO THEE" (PSALM 119:62). "A HARP was hung above David's bed. When midnight arrived, the north wind blew upon the harp, and the harp began to play alone.

"And David arose to sing praises to G-d..." (Midrash).

Arising at midnight while the earth was silent and still, King David would place his small wooden harp over his heart and gently put his ear to the wood. As he began to pluck the strings with his fingers, the vibrations echoed through the harp and into his heart, shaking loose the klippa of distance between himself and G-d.

Closing his eyes, he would begin to play whatever music came to him, thoughts and words moving through his mind in harmony with the melodies. This music came in waves from within his soul and overflowed onto the strings of the harp, and from there out into the universe. He became one with the music, and one with G-d.

King David's personal prayer became Shir – Song, the sweetest form of devotion and joy.

As a shepherd long before he became Israel's king, David had been known as "the sweet singer of Israel." His psalms were personal songs of faith and love in the darkest times of his life as well as the grandest. They were composed from the depths of his heart, and fortunately their words were written into the Bible, where we can read them every day.

But what about the music? Can you imagine what it would be like to hear a recording of King David himself playing his harp and singing the psalms?

The music, too, survived – for a while. King David's special melodies and words went on to be taught to the Levites who played in the orchestra of the Holy Temple. They were sung and played faithfully for hundreds of years, at least twice every day.

In the Temple courtyard, small groups of Levite children learned to play on their harps and lyres and sing the Shira of David's psalms. No Temple services could happen without this music. Prayer, prophesy, healing, meditation and joy were its attributes. Almost every family had a harp at home, to be played on such joyful occasions as weddings, homecomings, festivals and holidays. The technique was simple; anyone could play it beautifully and easily.

The gentle, heavenly sounds of the harp were as much a part of life as life itself, floating through the Jerusalem air like fluffy clouds on a summer's day.

And then came the dark night of exile.

"By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down and wept, when we remembered Zion. We hung up our harps on the willow trees...." (Psalm 137)

The harps were so intrinsically connected to Israel, to Jerusalem and to the Temple that when we went into Babylonian exile they had to be left behind. They were only instruments of joy, not to be played in times of sorrow.

When the Babylonian King Nebuchadnezar ordered the harp players to play their harps and entertain him, they refused, crying, "How can we sing the Lord's Song in a strange land?" And they actually broke their fingers so as not to be able to do such a thing.

Instead they hung their harps on the willow trees and turned off the light of this special kind of music in the Holy Land.

The sweet sound of the harp of David became silent.

Thousands of years passed, and the memory of David's harp became only a distant dream from a long-ago time. Only the legends, the stories and the words of the psalms remained.

As sometimes happens after long periods of time, the instruments changed form. The kinnor (lyre) gradually changed into a violin, and the nevel (harp) evolved into the large orchestra harp we have today, complete with gold leaf overlay and pedals.

These are both very beautiful instruments with amazing sounds, but they are connected no longer to the intention and purpose of the original harps of Jerusalem, which were tools for prayer and transformation.

As the remnant of the Jewish people wandered from place to place, we did not have our soul instruments to play when special occasions arose. So we borrowed instruments, the way people borrow clothes when they have none of their own. And the more talented among us learned to make music on them, and it was good music.

But though the new instruments made lovely sounds, they were not the same. The original pure song had been distorted by time and distance, and most of the original melodies were long forgotten or changed.

So we adapted. We adjusted to a new reality, as our memory of the ancestral music of King David, the Temple and the prophets became a faint echo from the past.

"Give thanks to Hashem for He is good, for His kindness endures forever...." (Psalm 107)

But sometimes even a long-forgotten memory can pierce the darkness of distance and time.

By chance more than design, the harp of David has been taken off the willow trees and is being built again in Jerusalem, preparing the way for its future and its original intention, once more an instrument of personal prayer and transformation.

Already the sweet sound of the harp can again be heard through the streets of Jerusalem, and beyond. Perhaps some of the melodies of King David are also returning to our weddings and festivals, unbeknownst even to ourselves, through the new songs that are emerging from our hearts.

If we really listen, we can almost hear it ... the footsteps of the Mashiach, and his songs of joy ...

...and King David arose at midnight to sing praises to G-d.

A Shoreless Sea

26 years ago, Saul Bellow set off on a journey to Jerusalem. Does anyone remember what he saw?

by Saul Bellow

BEFORE I LEFT CHICAGO, THE ART critic Harold Rosenberg said to me, "Going to Jerusalem? And wondering whether people will talk freely? You've got to be kidding, they'll talk your head off." He spoke as a Jew to a Jew about Jewish powers of speech. In flight, if the door of your plane comes open you are sucked into space. Here in Jerusalem, when you shut your apartment door behind you you fall into a gale of conversation – exposition, argument, harangue, analysis, theory, expostulation, threat, and prophecy. From diplomats you hear cagey explanations; from responsible persons, cautious and grudging statements rephrasing and amending your own questions; from parents and children, deadly divisions; from friends who let themselves go, passionate speeches, raging denunciation of Western Europe, of Russia, of America. I listen carefully, closely, more closely than I've ever listened in my life, utterly attentive, but I often feel that I have dropped into a shoreless sea.

The subject of all this talk is, ultimately, survival – the survival of the decent society created in Israel within a few decades. At first this is hard to grasp because the setting is so civilized. You are in a city like many another – well, not quite, for Jerusalem is the only ancient city I've ever seen whose antiquities are not on display as relics but are in daily use. Still, the city is a modern city with modern utilities. You shop in supermarkets, you say good morning to friends on the telephone, you hear symphony orchestras on the radio. But suddenly the music stops and a terrorist bomb is reported. A new explosion outside a coffee shop on the Jaffa Road; six young people killed and thirty-eight more wounded. Pained, you put down your civilized drink. Uneasy, you go out to your civilized dinner. Bombs are exploding everywhere. Dynamite has just been thrown in London; the difference is that when a bomb goes off in a West End restaurant the fundamental right of England to exist is not in dispute.

Yet here you sit at dinner with charming people in a dining room like any other. You know that your hostess has lost a son; that her sister lost children in the 1973 war; that in this Jerusalem street, coolly sweet with night flowers and dark green under the lamps, many other families have lost children. And on the Jaffa Road, because of another bomb, six adolescents – two on a break from night school – stopping at a coffee shop to eat buns, have just died. But in the domestic ceremony of passed dishes and filled glasses thoughts of a destructive enemy are hard to grasp. What you do know is that there is one fact of Jewish life unchanged by the creation of a Jewish state: you cannot take your right to live for granted. Others can; you cannot. This is not to say that everyone else is living pleasantly and well under a decent regime. No, it means only that the Jews, because they are Jews, have never been able to take the right to live as a natural right.

To be sure, many Israelis refuse to admit that this historic uneasiness has not been eliminated. They seem to think of themselves as a fixed power, immovable. Their point has been made. They are a nation among nations and will always remain so. You must tear your mind away from this conviction, as you must tear it from "civilized" appearances, in order to reach reality. The search for relief from the uneasiness is what is real in Israel. Nationalism has no comparable reality. To say, as George Steiner says, that Zionism was created by Jewish nationalists who drew their inspiration from Bismarck and followed a Prussian model can't be right. The Jews did not become nationalistic because they drew strength from their worship of anything resembling Germanic Blut und Eisen but because they alone, amongst the people of the earth, had not established a natural right to exist unquestioned in the lands of their birth. This right is still clearly not granted them, not even in the liberal West.

At the same time Jews are called upon (by Mr. Steiner in The Listener) and call upon themselves to be more just and more moral than others.

"Six young people killed and thirty-eight more wounded. Pained, you put down your civilized drink. Uneasy, you go out to your civilized dinner."

CITY OF WHAT?

BY SHLOMO RISKIN

G - D -

Even an arch rationalist like the premier legalist-philosopher Maimonides defines the sanctity of Jerusalem as emanating from the sanctity of the Divine presence, viewing the City – and the Temple Mount which is its apex – as the central home of the Divine. Hence for Maimonides the sanctity of Jerusalem is eternal, because despite military conquests by marauding nations, the Divine Presence can never be banished or destroyed (Hilkhot bet Habehirah, Chapter 6).

MEMORY -

The Bible records that Terah, father of Abraham, took his family, left Ur of the Caldees, and set out on the long journey to Jerusalem, capital of the land of Canaan. He never reached his destination, but only managed to get to Haran, where he died. The Almighty then commanded his son, the first Jew, to continue on the path initiated by his father, to leave his present land, birthplace and father's home, and to live in – and take possession of – Jerusalem, Canaan, Israel (Genesis 11:31, 32; 12:1-3). Apparently, the only city in the ancient world that still remembered the Divine creation of the world, the Divine formation of the human being in His image, and the Divine command that "he who sheds blood shall have his blood shed by others," was Jerusalem in the land of Canaan; and so Terah wanted to bring his family there, and G-d wanted Abraham and his descendants to live there.

RECOGNITION OF THE MIRACULOUS-

for miracles reside, after all, in the eyes of the beholder. After Abraham emerges victorious from a battle waged in order to rescue his nephew Lot, who had been taken captive by the four evil nations that were terrorizing the entire Fertile Crescent, he is greeted by his ally the King of Sodom as well as by Malki Zedek (King of Righteousness), the King of Jerusalem. The former is only interested in his share of the spoils of victory: "Give me the captured soldiers, you take the booty." The latter, however, sees the miraculous hand of G-d in helping Abraham secure victory over tyranny, supplant might with right: "Blessed be Abraham to the G-d on High, Acquirer of heaven and earth; and blessed be the G-d on High who has delivered your enemies into your hand."

COMMITMENT,

the place where the first Jew was willing to sacrifice his beloved son – his entire future – to the will of the Lord of the world who demands justice and righteousness (Genesis 14:14-24).

L I F E ,

for the ultimate message of the Akedah (sacrifice) is the Divine desire for us to live by His words and not to die by them (Genesis 22:1-19). Indeed, Isaac the son is forever after called the whole burnt offering, because his entire life – spent in Israel – is dedicated to the ideals of his G-d and the forging of his nation.

JEWISH NATIONAL SOVEREIGNTY,

where King David, shepherd-psalmist-warrior of Ancient Israel, forged a united nation out of twelve fractious tribes. David established Jerusalem as the permanent seat of the Jewish commonwealth, and – equally primary in importance – as the ultimate home of the Temple of the Divine. Hence Jerusalem became the object of Jewish prayers and dreams, especially during the close to 2000 years of Jewish exile and persecution: we conclude every Yom Kippur fast and Passover Seder feast with the entreaty of "Next Year in Jerusalem", and we pledge on every happy occasion: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, may my right hand forget her cunning."

P E A C E ,

the culmination of history, the vision of our faith. Our G-d is, after all, the Lord of the world, and so His Temple must be "called a House of Prayer for all nations." It is from Jerusalem that our prophets envision a Temple beckoning to all peoples to turn their backs on "evil-doing and destruction ... so that the Knowledge of the Lord will fill the world as the waters cover the seas."

MESSIAH,

the bridge between the many worlds of warring nations and the one world under G-d. Israel is the guardian nation entrusted with the delicate but exalted task of teaching the ethical monotheism of the one G-d Who – at the same time – permits "each nation to walk, each person in the name of his G-d, and we to walk in the name of the Lord our G-d forever (Micah 4:5)." It is this vision which inspired us – in stark contrast to every conquering nation before us – to have insisted on the sanctity of all the religious shrines and on the right of all religions to pray in their holy places, when we liberated Jerusalem in 1967.

OUR FUTURE.

The future of Jerusalem remains the greatest challenge to the nations of the world as well as to us, the House of Israel.

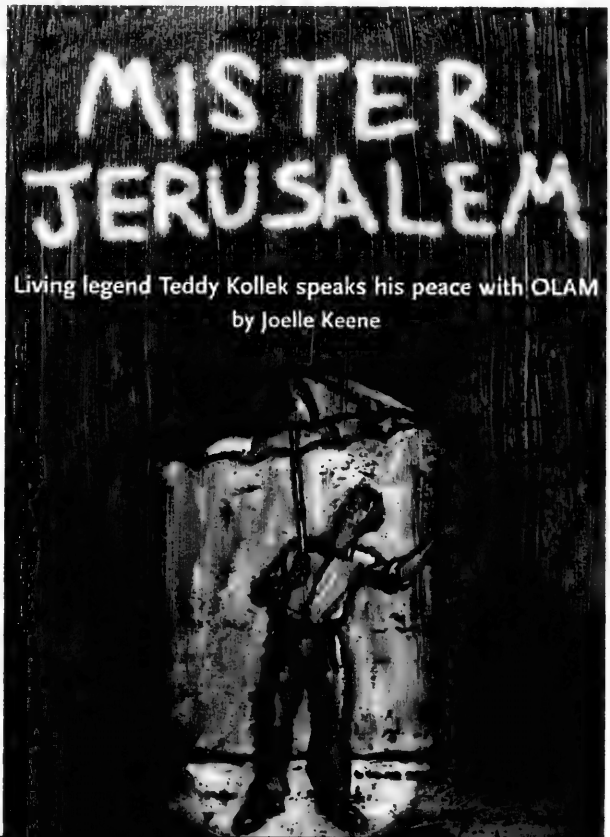
MISTER JERUSALEM

Living legend Teddy Kollek speaks his peace with OLAM

by Joelle Keene



TEDDY KOLLEK, WHO SERVED AS MAYOR IN A LAND WITHOUT TERM LIMITS, takes the long view. Peace will come to Jerusalem for sure, he says – in about five or six generations.

"The Jews are in a hurry because they're used to blending in with other populations where they have lived," said Kollek, who in 28 years as mayor of Jerusalem became so identified with the city that it sometimes seems he's mayor still. "All the other groups are impatient also, but less so, because they're used to living separately, in their own districts and enclaves."

True peace will come, he said, when people have friends and acquaintances of different groups, and when the myriad peoples who call Jerusalem home are no longer strangers to one another on the street as they are today.

"We are a very mixed city, with Jews from 104 different backgrounds, and about 40 different Christian denominations, and Arabs and Kurds," Kollek said in an exclusive interview with OLAM.

"Today the groups are still in their own districts. But this is slowly starting to change, because even on a day when bad things happen, you go to the zoo or a playground and you find them all mixing. If they do this now with the children, they will do it later on a bigger scale."

"...even on a day when bad things happen, you go to the zoo or a playground and you find them all mixing. If they do this now with the children, they will do it later on a bigger scale."

Teddy Kollek has seen such a complete transformation of Jerusalem in his lifetime that perhaps he really can predict what for most of us is hard to see. When he moved to Jerusalem from Vienna in 1935, it was a dusty, impoverished town with few schools, sidewalks or roads.

In the early 1930s Jerusalem had 93,000 inhabitants, of whom 54,000 were Jews. Today it is a bustling, international city of museums, concert halls and universities, of schools and shopping malls, parks and tree-lined streets. The current population is 633,000, about two-thirds Jewish.

Kollek, who was born in Hungary in 1911 and today lives in Jerusalem on Guatemala Street, saw it all and participated in everything that would affect the city from the time he arrived until his last term as mayor ended in 1993. He is still involved in overseeing the expenditure of outside money that comes into the city for its development.

In 1934, even before emigrating, he helped smuggle a child and a family's fortune out of Germany; in 1939 he convinced Adolph Eichman to let 3,000 Jews leave Vienna. He worked for the Jewish Agency and was the first representative of the fledgling state of Israel to Washington, D.C., laying the groundwork for ties that would form the new state's most important alliance.

He returned to Jerusalem in 1952 to head the prime minister's office for his longtime friend, David Ben Gurion, holding that post until 1964. In 1965, he was elected mayor.

"At that time it was a very neglected city," Kollek said. "People had very little income and certainly no feeling that they had to do anything for their city."

His two goals were to make Jerusalem a fully developed, modern and beautiful city worthy of its place in history, and to bring peace to its inhabitants. In the first he succeeded by any measure. Through the Jerusalem Foundation, founded in 1966 to fund projects the city could otherwise not afford, he himself raised most of the money for 1,400 different projects, from the Jerusalem Music Center to Teddy Stadium, from the Israel Museum to the City of David excavations. Israeli writer Barbara Sofer has called Kollek's effect on the city's landscape greater than any one person's since Herod.

The mayor also has a passion for trees, and he takes personal credit for their proliferation by having required it as a condition of building permits. "Gradually Jerusalem is becoming a green city," Kollek said.

Peace, too, was for Mayor Kollek a municipal project, something to take into account in everything from the building of schools, parks and monuments to listing his home phone number, year after year, in the Jerusalem phone book. "A mayor has to be available to all of his citizens," Kollek explained.

He built 120 parks and countless schools. When it came to schools, he said, each group wanted its own, and so he built schools of all kinds. There were Jewish secular and religious schools, Catholic and Protestant and Greek Orthodox Schools, and Arab schools where everyone spoke Arabic.

"Children wanted to speak their own language and teachers wanted to teach their own languages," he explained.

But building peace, it seems, would take longer than building a city. "I am still waiting for people to live peacefully together," he said wistfully. "The fact that in playgrounds or such they do so is very well, but the various districts are still very much divided and not always very friendly."

Perhaps that's why Kollek is particularly fond of the zoo, where parents are led by their children – who are, not coincidentally, Jerusalem's future.

"We built the zoo with a view that all kinds of people would want to come, that the children will want to come and their parents will come with them," said Kollek, whose 90th birthday party was held there earlier this year. "So gradually over a couple of generations, people will learn how to mix."

If that seems hard to imagine, Kollek can think back 66 years to dusty poverty, no zoo, no museums or trees – and for that matter, no Israel. Did he foresee the amount of change Jerusalem would undergo in his lifetime?

"I didn't foresee it," Mister Jerusalem replied, "I tried to make it."

Joelle Keene is Associate Editor of OLAM.

I HEARD RECENTLY ABOUT AN ISRAELI Knesset member, visiting in Africa, who dialed the hotel operator and asked for instructions on calling Jerusalem. After a moment of silence, the operator responded that Jerusalem was a spiritual place that existed in heaven and in our prayers; one could not call there because it was not an actual physical location here on earth.

Unknowingly, the African telephone operator perfectly captured the tension that exists in Jewish tradition between "the heavenly Jerusalem" and "the earthly Jerusalem." While Jerusalem is part of the religious narrative of both Christianity and Islam, and holy to both, each of these great monotheistic faiths sees other cities as more central and sacred. For Jews, Jerusalem alone is the heart of the Jewish religious tradition, Israel's eternal capital and the religious and political center of the Jewish people. Indeed, so powerful is the role of Jerusalem in the historical and spiritual history of Judaism that from the earliest times the rabbis recognized that Jerusalem existed on two planes in the consciousness of the Jews. "The earthly Jerusalem" is the actual Jerusalem, as we find her in the reality of everyday life. But, at the same time, there is a "heavenly Jerusalem." Building on Hosea 11:9, the rabbinic sages talked also of the Jerusalem that exists above – the "companion" Jerusalem to be found in heaven, the city of perfection and the prophetic vision; Jerusalem as she should be and not as she is.

It should not be surprising that at times we Jews confuse the one Jerusalem with the other. After all, we love Jerusalem with an abiding love, and those whom we love we sometimes see in idealized terms. The actual Jerusalem is, in some ways, a city like any other. It has a weak tax base, its share of corruption and poverty, and more than its share of ethnic and religious tension. Secular Israelis, and young people in particular, concerned about the influence of the very religious, have been fleeing Jerusalem for Tel Aviv, confident that they will find there a tolerance and liberal openness that Jerusalem lacks.

Nonetheless, even the most aggressively modern and cynical Israelis and the most marginal of Diaspora Jews retain a special place for Jerusalem in their hearts. If there is anything at all that ties a Jew to his people, that Jew is likely to know, or to sense on some level, that Jewish life will not be sustained without Jerusalem at its core. This is because "earthly Jerusalem," warts and all, remains a city of unsurpassed beauty and palpable holiness – a somewhat perplexing and absolutely unique synthesis of the ancient and the modern. The most assimilated Jew will acknowledge, even if grudgingly, that a Jerusalem Shabbat is like no other.

But that is not all. The "heavenly Jerusalem" remains, for every Israeli and every Jew, part of God's promise and a link to the mystery of Jewish existence. It is Jerusalem that reminds us that humanity, though corrupt, is redeemable, and that our destination is the messianic age. It is Jerusalem that assures us that a fragment of Shekhinah, the Divine Presence, dwells in the heart of every Jew.

What does this mean in political terms? I don't pretend to know. But I have always believed that if our Palestinian neighbors put aside terror and foreswear violence, Israel's representatives will offer a political arrangement for Jerusalem that will meet the needs of all concerned. Such arrangements have been offered in the past, and I am confident that the people of Israel, desperate for peace, will find a solution when their desire for peace is reciprocated.

At the same time, one can only be discouraged by recent events and their implications for Palestinian intentions on Jerusalem. It is surely not an accident that Palestinian terrorists have so often targeted Jerusalem, or that Palestinian gunmen fire almost daily into Jerusalem's Gilo neighborhood. And it is surely not an accident that not only has Mr. Arafat attempted, understandably enough, to assert a Palestinian connection to the Old City, he has also worked to deny a Jewish connection. Among his many outrageous and inexcusable statements, the most outrageous and inexcusable of all may be his claim that Jews have never had any historical connection to the Western Wall and the Temple Mount.

These statements and actions constitute a terrible misreading of Jewish intentions. Mr. Arafat apparently feels that by turning Jerusalem into Beirut and by striking at Jewish ties to Jerusalem, he will discourage Israelis and Jews everywhere and advance the Palestinian cause. But he will succeed only in unifying the Jewish people, fortifying their determination, and delaying the peace that Israelis and Palestinians so desperately need. The ties that bind the Jewish people to Jerusalem form the touchstone of Jewish civilization. In the absence of Jerusalem, there is no Jewish faith and no Jewish future. There will be no peace between Israelis and Palestinians without an understanding of the power of this bond.

"In the absence of Jerusalem, there is no Jewish faith and no Jewish future."

A Muslim Scholar Speaks

For a Jew or a Muslim, religious or secular, thinking of Jerusalem means to feel reason and sentiment mingled together. So, as a Muslim scholar and a man of religion, it is today worthwhile for me to try to determine whether, from an Islamic point of view, there is some well-grounded theological reason that makes recognizing Jerusalem both as an Islamic holy place and as the capital of the State of Israel impossible.

The idea of Islam as a factor that prevents Arabs from recognizing any sovereign right of Jews over the Land of Israel or Jerusalem is quite recent and can by no means be found in Islamic classical sources. Both Qur'an and Torah indicate quite clearly that the link between the Jews and the Land of Israel does not depend on any kind of colonization project but directly on the will of God Almighty. In particular, both Jewish and Islamic Scriptures state specifically that God through His chosen servant Moses decided to free the offspring of Jacob from slavery in Egypt and to make them the inheritors of the Promised Land.

The Qur'an cites the exact words with which Moses ordered the Israelites to conquer the Land:

"And (remember) when Moses said to his people: 'O my people, call in remembrance the favour of God unto you, when he produced prophets among you, made you kings, and gave to you what He had not given to any other among the people. O my people, enter the Holy Land which God has assigned unto you, and turn not back ignominiously, for then will ye be overthrown, to your own ruin'". (Qur'an, Sura 5:22-23, "The Table")

The Holy Qur'an also quite openly refers to the reinstatement of the Children of Israel in the Land before the Last Judgment, where it says "And thereafter We said to the Children of Israel: 'Dwell securely in the Promised Land.' And when the last warning will come to pass, We will gather you together in a mingled crowd." (Qur'an, Sura 17:104, "The Night Journey")

As concerns Jerusalem, the most common argument against Islamic acceptance of Israeli sovereignty over the Holy City is that, since it is a holy place for Muslims, its being ruled by non-Muslims would be a betrayal of Islam.

The designation of Jerusalem as an Islamic holy place depends on al-Mi'raj, the Ascension of the Prophet Muhammad to heaven, which began from the Foundation Stone on the Temple Mount. But while remembering this, we must admit that there is no real link between al-Mi'raj and sovereign rights over Jerusalem, since when al-Mi'raj took place the city was not under Islamic but under alternate Byzantine or Sassanid administration.

Moreover, the Qur'an expressly recognizes that Jerusalem plays the same role for Jews that Mecca has for Muslims. We read: "They would not follow thy direction of prayer (qibla), nor art thou to follow their direction of prayer; nor indeed will they follow each other's direction of prayer...." (Qur'an, Sura 2:145, "The Cow") All Qur'anic commentators explain that "thy qibla" is obviously the Kaba of Mecca, while "their qibla" refers to the Temple Mount Area in Jerusalem. Some Muslim exegetes also quote the Book of Daniel as proof of this (Daniel 6:10).

Thus, as no one wishes to deny Muslims complete sovereignty over Mecca, from an Islamic point of view there is no sound theological reason to deny the Jews the same right over Jerusalem.

As to Jewish-Muslim relationships, if we reflect on the level of inter-religious dialogue in past centuries, we must frankly admit that in this respect we have been moving backwards. From a theological point of view, dialogue between Jews and Muslims is easier than, say, dialogue between Jews and Chrisitians. Indeed, dialogue between Jews and Muslims was much more extensive in the past. Ibn Gabirol (Avicembro), Maimonides, Ibn Sina (Avicenna) and Ibn Rushd (Averroes) were not isolated intellectuals but part of an ongoing intercommunication and shared well of knowledge.

One can blame the current separation on the political situation, but that does not free intellectuals and men of religion of their responsibility. Today, looking toward the future, we must again create the same kind of intellectual atmosphere, until it is common for Islamic theologians to read Buber and Levinas, and for Jewish scholars to study the works of Sha'rawi and Ashmawi. We can understand the common features in the development of Kabbalah and Tasawwuf, or study the mutual influence of Jewish Halakhah and Islamic Sharia.

Jewish intellectuals, for their part, must be ready to understand that a new attitude is emerging among some Islamic thinkers. Many of us are now ready to admit that hostility for Israel has been a great mistake, perhaps the worst mistake Muslims have made in the last 50 years.

For those Muslim leaders who live in democratic countries, this declaration is not so dangerous. Even in the more oppressed countries, there is a certain part of the educated population that does not blindly accept the local view. It is very important for us to verify that we are not alone in this activity; we must know that there is someone else who appreciates and shares our goals.

The times are ready for Jews and Muslims to recognize each other once again as a branch of the tree of monotheism, as brothers descended from the same father – Abraham, the forerunner of faith in the Living God. The more we discover our common roots, the more we can hope for a common future of peace and prosperity.

Strange City

by Amos Oz

I WAS BORN IN JERUSALEM and lived there throughout my childhood. When I was nine I lived through the days when Jerusalem was besieged and shelled. It was then that I first saw a dead man: a shell fired from the Arab Legion's gun batteries on Nebi Samuel hit a pious Jew and tore his stomach apart. I saw him lying in the street. He was a small man whose chin sprouted a meager beard. His face, as he lay there dead, was white and amazed.

It was July 1948. For many days afterwards I hated that man because he kept appearing in my dreams and frightening me. I knew that Jerusalem was surrounded by forces whose only desire was the city's death and mine, too.

Later I moved away from Jerusalem. I still loved her with a stubborn love as one might love a woman who holds herself aloof. Sometimes on my free days I would go to Jerusalem to pay court to her. Her alleyways knew me well though they affected not to.

I loved Jerusalem because she was the journey's end, a city one arrived at but could never pass beyond, and also because she was never really a true part of the State of Israel – with the exception of a few roads, Jerusalem has always held herself aloof, as if she had consciously chosen to turn her back on all the flat white commercial cities: Tel Aviv, Holon, Herzlia and Natanya.

Jerusalem was different. She was the absolute negation of towns made up of cube-like blocks of flats, all painted white. She was different from the flat stretches of citrus groves, the gardens surrounded by hedges, the red roofs and irrigation pipes shining in the sun. Even the blue of her summer skies was different. Not for her the dusty white heavens of the coastal plain and the Sharon valley. An enclosed city. Wintry. Even in the summer it was always a wintry city. Rusty iron railings. Grey stone, sometimes imperceptibly shading into pale blue, sometimes into a reddish hue. Tumbledown fences. Rocky hillsides. Walled courtyards, closed in as if in anger.

And its citizens: a resilient people, bitter as if forever overcoming some inner fear. Observant Jews, Ashkenazi Jews in their fur streimels and old Sephardim in their striped robes. Soft-stepping scholars wandering through the streets, as if at a loss. Dreamy-eyed girls. Blind beggars, dumb or cursing. Madmen abroad with the divine spark in their eyes.

For twenty years Jerusalem turned her stubborn back on the stream of modern life. A slow-moving town in a country of feverish activity. An old, neglected, mountainous suburb whose few flat stretches, crammed with buildings, burst at the seams with overflowing energy. The sad capital city of an exultant state. And the stranglehold.

There were mutilated streets descending to blocked alleys Barricades of concrete and rusty barbed wire.

A city which is all border. A city not of gold but of tin sheeting, bent and full of holes. A city surrounded at night by the sound of foreign bells, foreign odors, distant views. A ring of hostile villages surrounded the city on three sides: Sha'afat, Wadi Jos, Issawia, Silwan, Azaria, Tsur Bachr, Bet Tsafafa. It seemed as if they had only to clench their hand and Jerusalem would be crushed within their fist. On a winter night you could sense the evil intent that flowed from them toward the city.

There was fear too in Jerusalem. An inner fear that must never be expressed in words, never called by name. It grew, solidified and crystallized in the twisting alleyways and the desolate lanes.

The city fathers, the heads of government, the housing estates, the newly planted trees, the traffic lights, all tried to tempt Jerusalem into a union with the State of Israel; and she, with the exception of some few streets, refused that union. Twenty years. Jerusalem continued to preserve a faded, obstinate, mandatory character. She remained sad.

Not within the State of Israel, but alongside it; Jerusalem as opposed to Israel.

I loved this town, because I was born there and because people who stand aloof tend to love towns that hold aloof.

This was a love that was received without mercy: Jerusalem was often the background for nightmares and dreams of terror. I no longer live in Jerusalem, but in my dreams I am hers and she does not relinquish her hold on me. I would see us both surrounded by enemies. The enemy in my dreams not only came from east, north and south, but completely surrounded us. I saw Jerusalem falling into the hands of her enemies. Destroyed, pillaged and burned, as in the stories of my childhood, as in the Bible, as in the tales of the destruction of the Temple. And I too, with no way of escape, with no place to hide, was trapped in the Jerusalem of my dreams.

Many were the stories I was told as a child of Jerusalem under siege. Jewish children always died in these stories. They died heroically, or were slaughtered, but the stories always ended with the town burning and the children dying. Sennaccherib, Titus, the Crusaders. Riots, terrorists. Military rule. The High Commissioner, searched curfew. Abdullah, the desert king. The guns of the Arab Legion. The convoy to Mount Scopus. The convoy to the Etzion bloc. An incited rabble. Inflamed mobs. Blood-thirsty ruffians. Brutal armed irregulars. All forever aimed at me. I always belonged to the minority, to the besieged, to those whose fate was sealed, who lived a life hovering on the brink of disaster.

So this time too, the city will be attacked. We shall die there like that little pious Jew who lay in the street, his face pale and amazed, as if he had suffered some grave insult. And more.

After the siege was lifted, a border was drawn through the heart of the city. All my childhood was passed in dead-end alleyways, facing streets one was forbidden to enter. The scar of destruction, no man's land, mine fields, wasteland, ruined, blackened buildings. Twisted, despairing iron girders rising starkly out of the ruined houses. And ever opposite: the other Jerusalem. The city surrounding my city. Foreign sounds and smells emanated from it, pale lights flickered there by night, and the cry of the muezzin at dawn. Atlantis. The lost continent. A city that was forever the focus of one's most insubstantial visions. I had blurred memories dating from my earliest childhood, the memory of colorful alleyways in the Old City, the narrow arched street leading to the Wall, mandatory Arab policemen, street-vendors' stalls, tamarind, a riot of color, an ever present sense of lurking danger.

From over there, from beyond the border, an angry threat has been directed at me throughout most of my life. I remember wandering down the streets of Musrara at dusk, to the edge of no-man's-land. A glimpse of Shneller woods from afar. Forbidden views seen from the observation point at Abu Tor. The shattered square of Notre Dame. The towers of Bethlehem opposite the woods of Ramat Rachel. Desert hillsides falling away from the suburb of Talpiyot. The Dead Sea glittering in the distance like a mirage. Rocky valleys at dawn.

On Sunday, June 11, 1967, I went to see the Jerusalem that lay beyond the border. I came to places that with dreams and the years had become petrified symbols within my heart, and lo and behold – people lived here – houses, shops, stalls, signposts.

And I was thunderstruck, as if my whole inner world had collapsed. The dreams were a deception. The world of terrible tales became a mockery. The perpetual threat was nothing but a cruel twisted joke. Everything was burst asunder. Laid wide open. My Jerusalem, beloved and feared, was dead.

Now the town was different. Long-forgotten, neglected corners had come to life again. Bulldozers pushed new roads through heaps of rubble that I had imagined would be there for all eternity. Districts that had been utterly forgotten were filled with feverish activity. Hosts of pious Jews, soldiers in battle dress, amazed tourists, smartly dressed women from Tel Aviv and Haifa, all streamed eastward. The tide flowed strongly to Jerusalem. The rest of the country poured into the open city. Everything within her orbit took on an air of festivity. And I along with it.

These things cannot be expressed in words. Again I say that I loved Jerusalem in its entirety, but what does this mean? It is like a love affair, a contradictory, tortuous force: she is mine and yet strange to me, conquered but hostile, devoted yet inaccessible.

I could disregard all this. The skies are the same skies and the Jerusalem stone is the same throughout. Shaykh Jarrah is almost like Katamon.

But the city is inhabited. People live within her streets, and they are strangers, I do not understand their language, they are there – in their homes – and I am the stranger who comes from without. Courteous people, courteous to the point of offense, as if they have reached the very peak of happiness in having merited the honor of selling me postcards or Jordanian stamps. Welcome, we are brothers, it is just for you alone that we have waited all these years, just so that we could embrace you. And their eyes hate me, wish me dead. The accursed stranger. It grieves me, but I cannot order my words in a rational way.

I was in East Jerusalem three days after the conquest of the city. I arrived there straight from El Arish, in Sinai, wearing uniform and carrying a submachine gun. I was not born to sound the trumpet or liberate lands from foreign yokes. The lament of an enslaved people finds an echo in my ears, but I am deaf to the lament of "enslaved territory."

In my childhood dreams it was the Arabs who wore uniforms and carried machine guns, Arabs who came to my street in Jerusalem to kill me. Twenty-two years ago, a slogan painted in red appeared on a courtyard wall not far from our house: "Judah fell in blood and fire; by blood and fire will Judah rise again." One of the underground had written these words at night in burning red. I don't know how to write about blood and fire. If I ever write anything about this war, it will be about pus, sweat and vomit and not about blood and fire. With all my soul, I desired to feel in Jerusalem as a man who has dispossessed his enemies and returned to the patrimony of his ancestors. The Bible came to life for me: the Prophets, the Kings, Temple Mount, Absolom's Pillar, the Mount of Olives. The Jerusalem of Abraham Mapu and Angon. I wanted to be part of it all, I wanted to belong.

Were it not for the people. I saw enmity and rebelliousness, sycophancy, amazement, fear, insult and trickery. I passed through the streets of East Jerusalem like a man breaking into some forbidden place. Depression filled my soul. City of my birth. City of my dreams. City of my ancestors' and my people's yearnings. And I was condemned to walk through its streets armed with a sub-machine gun like one of the characters from my childhood nightmares. To be a stranger in a very strange city.

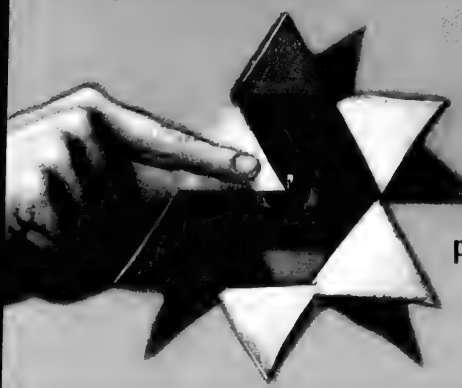
WHAT'S IN A NAME?

by Levi Meier



"The very name of Jerusalem teaches us that the highest form of Divine service involves proactive acts of lovingkindness towards one another."

WHERE ARE WE REALLY GOING WHEN we travel to the heart of Jerusalem? What mission are we fulfilling and what lesson are we internalizing? I suggest that one answer can be found in the very name of this holy city – Yerushalayim. This name – and this city – are intimately connected with our history, particularly with the story of our Father Abraham, who rediscovered monotheism and spread its message to the world.

In the Torah, we first encounter the second half of Jerusalem's name – Shalem. Genesis recounts the story of Abraham's (then known as Abram) rescue of his nephew Lot after a fierce battle. After this victory, Malkizedek, the king of Shalem, brought bread and wine to Abraham and blessed him.

Malkizedek, meaning "the king of justice," recognized that even the victors in battle are tired, hungry and thirsty. Even they need sustenance and blessing. So he went out of his way to perform a spontaneous, proactive act of kindness, lovingkindness. He recognized that every human being is in need of such intervention. By his actions, Malkizedek demonstrated that he was not only king of a place called Shalem; he also acted in a manner that was shalem. He was moving towards his own personal completion, developing his Higher Self by taking note of the needs of others and responding appropriately without being asked.

The other half of Yerushalayim's name derives from a second episode involving Abraham. In one of the most famous stories in the Torah, Abraham bound Isaac and placed him atop an altar on Mount Moriah, later to become the site of the Temple in Jerusalem. But at the last moment God revealed Himself to Abraham, explaining that He did not desire human sacrifice. Human life is to be valued absolutely. And Abraham gave a new name to that place, indicating that this holy mountain was where the Lord had appeared to him and would appear again to others in the future – HaShem yir-eh.

When God revealed Himself to save Isaac from the knife, Abraham experienced this intervention as an act of Divine kindness. Abraham was thus granted a vision of a loving, caring God who intercedes daily on behalf of humanity. And in Abraham's prophetic vision, he recognized that Jerusalem would become a place of eternal kindness.

On another level, Abraham's renaming of this holy site teaches us something fundamental about the nature of the world. All of the power and all of the energy in the world can be directed in one of two ways – it can be either demonic or benevolent. And there is an ongoing struggle in heaven and on earth between these two forces.

An earthly example is Malkizedek, who manifested both of these contradictory and opposing forces. On the one hand, he was a king and a warrior. On the other, he was a doer of kind deeds. On a heavenly level, the story of Divine intervention to save Isaac illustrates the same phenomenon. When Abraham was first told to sacrifice his son Isaac, he experienced a power of destruction. Later, however, when an angel of God instructed Abraham to spare his son, the angel did so in the Name of the Lord of Mercy and benevolence.

And Abraham chose the power of that significant Name to describe Jerusalem for all time to come. He thus signified for all future generations that the ultimate vision of the universe involves a vital force that is not demonic. It does not call for adult or child sacrifice. The ultimate power that will prevail is one of benevolence.

When we harness our own benevolent energy, we become creative in positive ways. We create acts of benevolence and kindness.

Thus, Abraham's vision encompassed more than a view of Jerusalem. It was a vision of the nature of the world. It was the realization that the best way to serve God is through performing acts of lovingkindness and never inflicting harm on others. And when we act in this way, we experience Divinity.

Abraham's vision – Yir-eh – together with shalem formed the name of the holy city of Yerushalayim, the site of the holy Temple, which served as an earthly place for the manifestation of the Divine Presence or Shekhinah. The very name of Jerusalem teaches us that the highest form of Divine service involves proactive acts of lovingkindness towards one another. And that love of kindness will be a precursor of the Messianic era, a time of universal peace. Jerusalem's mission is to expand the potential for goodness and kindness in the world.

The Vilna Gaon beautifully relates Abraham's naming of Jerusalem to the Divine Presence. He writes that Abraham, through his complete surrender to God's will at Moriah/Jerusalem and through his prayer, brought the Shekhinah further down to the human realm. Similarly, each of us has the potential – through our individual acts of kindness – to continue bringing the Shekhinah closer and closer.

For the power of Jerusalem is infinite. It stretches all the way to heaven. When we actualize the mission of earthly Jerusalem, we bring heavenly Jerusalem that much nearer to us. A passage in Psalms may even allude to these two Jerusalems: "O Yerushalayim, built as a city that is joined together." The earthly and the heavenly Jerusalems are forever linked, and we have the power to determine the strength of that relationship through our actions.

Tourists who experience Jerusalem only as a series of holy sites may never discover the true nature of the city or its inhabitants. So long as they focus only on the antiquities, they will not discern the reality of the place. This idea was beautifully described in a poem, "Tourists," by Yehuda Amichai:

"Once I sat on the steps by a gate at David's Tower. I placed my two heavy baskets at my side. A group of tourists was standing around their guide and I became their target marker.

'You see that man with the baskets? Just right of his head there's an arch from the Roman period. Just right of his head. But he's moving, he's moving!'

I said to myself: Redemption will come only if their guide tells them, 'You see that arch from the Roman period? It's not important: but next to it, left and down a bit, there sits a man who's brought fruit and vegetables for his family.'"

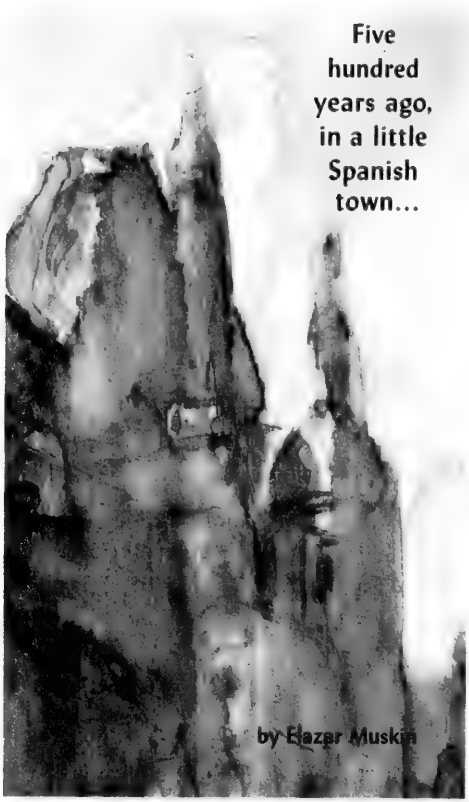
JERUSALEM IN GRANADA



"...RESOLVE TO ORDER ALL SAID Jews and Jewesses out of our kingdom and that they never return nor come back to any of them." In the Hall of Ambassadors in the magnificent medieval Alhambra Palace in Granada on May 1, 1492, King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella signed these words into law, creating the Edict of Expulsion. More than 700 years of glorious Jewish history in Spain abruptly ended.

With only three months to choose between conversion to Christianity or expulsion, Spanish Jewry faced its most trying time. An eyewitness, the great Torah commentator and Queen Isabella's personal financial representative, Don Isaac Abravanel, wrote, "When the dreadful news reached the people, they mourned their fate; and wherever the report of the decree spread, Jews wept bitterly. The terror and lamentation were greater than at any time since the expulsion of our forefathers from their own soil in Judah to foreign strands" (Abravanel, Introduction to commentary on Book of Kings).

Although Abravanel recorded for posterity, "...old and young, women and children, a multitude of 300,000 from every province, went forth on one day, unarmed and afoot. I was among them," just as many if not more stayed behind and converted to Christianity. Even the Chief Rabbi, Abraham Senior, and his powerful tax collector son-in-law, Meir Melamed, succumbed to the pressure to convert.

With such historic images in mind, I led a Jewish history tour to Spain this past summer. I had heard over the years and even read reports about Spanish citizens, Christians, who performed unusual rites like lighting Friday night candles in a closet. Such people were obviously descendants of conversos, hidden Jews, but 500 years later I was certain that no conversos could be left.

That certainty was shaken on Monday, July 16, 2001. We had just toured the Alhambra Palace where we stood in the Hall of Ambassadors, visiting the exact spot where the Edict of Expulsion was signed. After our tour we walked down to the center of the city to see a statue of Queen Isabella with Christopher Columbus as well as a smaller statue of the great 12th century Jewish scholar, Yehuda Ibn-Tibbon. As we approached the statue of Yehuda Ibn-Tibbon, two young Spanish ladies in their mid-twenties, with a little boy in tow, were leaving the statue. When they saw the Kippa on my head they stopped us, and with great emotion one of the women asked, "Are you Jewish?" She was wearing a Star of David necklace and she was overwhelmed with excitement. It was her first encounter with Jews in Granada, a city that has no practicing Jews today, and she wanted to talk to us as long as she could.

She told us that her name was Carmen, she was a lawyer by profession, and ran her family's successful olive oil company. Her interest in Judaism dates back to her childhood when her grandmother taught her that every Friday night she must light candles, and that every day she should come to Ibn Tibbon's statue and place a peseta, a Spanish penny, at its base. She didn't understand why she did these acts until she learned that she was descended from Jews. She was raised a Catholic, but her fascination with Judaism evolved as she grew older. Now she reads every book she can obtain on Judaism and wants to go to Israel and study for conversion. Her family thinks she is nuts, but she believes that she must return to her roots.

"I had heard over the years and even read reports about Spanish citizens, Christians, who performed unusual rites like lighting Friday night candles in a closet."

As we parted she told us that she knows only two Hebrew sentences that her grandmother had taught her. The first was "MeMoshe ad Moshe lo kam k'Moshe" – "From Moses to Moses there was no other one like Moses." This sentence was the famous comment made about Moses Maimonides, the great 12th century Spanish-born Jewish philosopher and scholar. So great was Maimonides that the Jewish people declared that he alone could be compared to Moses of old.

Carmen obviously learned this adage with pride because Maimonides was the greatest Jew ever to live in Spain. Although in 1148, when he was only 13 years old, Maimonides and his family had to flee from their home in the city of Cordoba, the present Spanish government has erected a monument to his memory in the center of Cordoba, and has proudly identified him as a Spanish-born philosopher.

But it was the second Hebrew sentence that Carmen knew which really excited us. It proved to all of us that Judaism always will endure no matter how hard our enemies try to annihilate us. In perfect Hebrew she said, "L'Shana Haba B'Yerushlayim" – "Next Year in Jerusalem." There in the streets of Granada a young lady, a great, great, great, etc., granddaughter of conversos, expressed what Jews have always prayed for. Indeed, Carmen expressed that Jerusalem is the heartbeat of the Jewish soul, and she knew, maybe even better than the rest of us, that Jerusalem will unite us again.

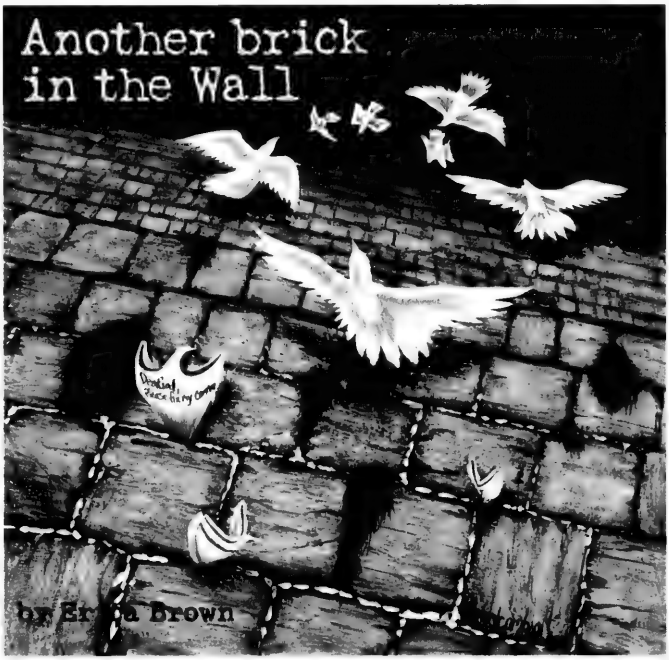
I HAVE BEEN TO THE WAILING WALL OF JERUSALEM hundreds of times in my life. Some call it the Western Wall, designating its location as an outer wall of the ancient Jewish Temple. Some call it the Wailing Wall, because of all of the tears that are shed there. Israelis simply call it the kotel, which means wall. It needs no adjective; it is the Wall. I have seen it in all seasons and at all times of the day. I have a beautiful photograph of the Wall covered in snow. The black coats of chassidim contrast sharply with the white of the flakes. Nothing is more silent than prayer in snow.

I have been there on the ninth day of the Hebrew month of Av, when Jews from all over the world mark the destruction of the First and Second Temples. It was after midnight and lamentations had already been recited; tears had already escaped the eyes of the pious. It is a custom on this day to adopt the Jewish laws of mourning and to sit on the floor. After midnight I saw an old woman dressed in sackcloth, the biblical dress of the penitent, pulling the chairs away from those who were seated above ground. "Sit on the floor!" she shouted in Hebrew. Like the prophet Jeremiah, she exhorted the lazy to take heed of the loss of the Temple.

Sunrise at the wall is equally striking, not for its beauty but for its dignity. On Shavuot, some have the custom of studying all night and walking to the Wall for early morning prayers at dawn. Thousands of people sing sacred songs as they crowd the streets. Joining them, I reached the corner of the Old City as throngs sang the words of Maimonides: "I believe with perfect faith in the coming of the Messiah and though he may tarry, I will wait nevertheless." The combination of this personal declaration and the beauty of the white stone was a religious experience on par with anything William James could muster. And as I saw the Wall I thought the Messiah would truly be there, in answer to our heartfelt song.

But the Wall is also a stoic place; it makes no such promises. It is virtually colorless, tall and unfeeling. It has to be because it absorbs all the local color and the international emotions of the desperate and in need. In addition, it has within its cracks thousands upon thousands of notes from the broken, and those waiting in its shadow for some spiritual awakening. Notes tumble from the cracks and get swept away several times a day; those that survive must have some spiritual staying power.

The Wall can be a disappointment too. The Messiah did not show up at the Wall at that sunrise of my adolescent years, and so I learned that the Wall itself will not bring redemption; it can only offer hope to the faithful and a quiet ear that does not talk back. The tour groups in their funny hats and windbreakers come with the false hope that something magical will happen there. They expect to be transported to some religious domain, to be carried on a biblical cloud. They do not understand that the Wall can only reflect the worshiper; if you come with no faith, with no tears, the Wall itself cannot provide them. You watch the faithful pray and leave their notes, and you feel angst that you are not pious, too.



"It is an unforgivable breach of Wall etiquette to read a note that someone else has left in a crevice, a spiritual violation of the highest order."

It is an unforgivable breach of Wall etiquette to read a note that someone else has left in a crevice, a spiritual violation of the highest order. But you can't help your curiosity: If people really think that they can talk to God in this place, then what do they want to say? And, naturally, you can't help wondering how so much religious desire can fit on a piece of paper that takes up a quarter of an inch of a crack in a stone.

One day while reciting the afternoon service at the Wall and offering a psalm or two for good measure, I saw a note at my feet. It was flat and unraveled. I averted my gaze but slowly turned back; the temptation was too great. And there I saw the heavenly powers of the Wall in full force: Dear God, Please fix my camera.

It was unsigned. God, being omniscient, would no doubt know whose Nikon was on the blink. God would have known how important those tourists' photos were, how the memories linked to their images would be critical to someone's life. There are several camera shops on Jaffa Street, less than a mile away, but evidently the Divine Being was cheaper and more convenient.

After I laughed and the spiritual solemnity of my prayers had been broken, I pondered the simplicity of this message, and I learned from it one of the most profound spiritual lessons of my life. A broken camera is no less significant to the faithful than a broken heart. To the truly faithful, the most simple request becomes a chance to soar in heaven. If God can cure the sick and feed the hungry, surely He can fix a camera. All of us students of religion, readers of the esoteric works of Maimonides and St. Augustine, Alfarabi and the Buddha, laugh, not out of disdain but out of envy.

I am far away from the Wall right now; I have no opportunity to deposit any notes. But after reading that anonymous one, I no longer think I can. I do not have that simple faith. I ask instead that the Wall absorb my doubts, which cannot be contained on a small scrap of paper. My faith is not in the note but in the crack.

Still, if I could ask of God something in a private moment on a small piece of paper, it would be this:

Dear God, Did you fix her camera?

In Jerusalem, the occasional but universal human sensation of dreaming without being able to interpret the dream is stronger than it is elsewhere, and all the more so since the city actually does exist.
But that is how it feels to be in exile.
For exile is a type of dream. When the Psalm says that, in returning, "we will be like unto them that dream" (Psalms 126:1), it means it will be as if we were awaking from a nightmare.

The feeling that we are wandering in an unexplained dream becomes increasingly strong the more frequently we dream it. Jewish Law addresses this perfectly. It says that when we see Jerusalem for the first time, out of mourning we should tear our clothes, and when we see the ruins of the Temple, we should tear them again.

For the Jerusalem of today is not the real Jerusalem of our hopes and our yearnings. We speak so often of "return" in our liturgy and our poetry because a profound crisis occurred with our exile from Jerusalem. Not only were we expelled from our home, but the shechina, the presence of God, became exiled from us. One might think that this affects only Jews; after all, it was the Jewish Temple and capital that were destroyed, first in 586 BCE and then in 70 CE. But in reality, with this exile the entire world is in crisis, because the presence of God affects everyone, as does its absence.

The absence of God – the hiddenness of God, according to Kabbalah – has profoundly destabilized the world. When God returns to Jerusalem, the entire world will regain its stability. And so our thrice-daily prayer for God to rebuild Jerusalem really means "Put the world back in place."

A simple example expresses this concept well. We all use electronic devices. If we remove the batteries, nothing works; when we reinstall them, everything works perfectly once again. When we say, "May Jerusalem be rebuilt!" we are asking God to renew our connection – put in the batteries! – so that everything will start to work again. Returning to Zion is not a problem of geography but of connection. Reestablishing this connection will put the world back in place.

So we see that the resurrection of Jerusalem must occur on two planes – spiritual and material. With respect to streets and houses, it is easy to rebuild Jerusalem. But rebuilding it properly means body and soul – its buildings, streets, water and trees, and internally. As King Solomon said, "I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth" (Ecclesiastes 10:7). Internal disarray is one of the definitions of the exile, and when the correct order is not respected, nothing is truly built. As real as the city may appear, it is but an imaginary construction. Hence our feelings that we are living in a dream, even when we are there.

So how can Jerusalem be truly rebuilt? Our liturgy gives us clues. First of all, we cannot speak of Jerusalem without speaking of love, in Israel's feelings for the Holy City but also in the manner in which the return must occur. When we say in our daily prayer, "To Jerusalem, Your city, with compassion return," we express our desire for the return to be gentle. For as Ezekiel reminds us, it could also be catastrophic – "I will rule over you with a mighty hand ... and with outpoured wrath, as a storm may create a mountain." (Ezekiel 20:33)

This is why Jerusalem is always a love story, as we see in so much of our liturgy and poetry as well. The great Spanish poet Judah Halevy calls Jerusalem "fullness of beauty" and affirms that all perfections are united in her. In another love song, his L'cha Dodi – "Come, My Beloved" – which we sing to welcome the Sabbath, Jerusalem is compared to a fiancee adorned with ornaments, awaiting our return.

Our return to Jerusalem must also be a true reunion, and not just an encounter. Jerusalem is a very sensitive city – a city of peace, but also a place seething with anger, hence the constant risk of squabbling, which unfortunately lives on to this day! This irritability stems from the city's hypersensitivity. Jerusalem is like the place where all the nerves come together. When you touch it, everything starts trembling.

Handling any sensitive spot requires particular solicitousness. We must be careful there, with the city and with one another. Hence the Talmudic maxim: "Those who are born in Jerusalem will receive a special reward, but those who love Jerusalem will likewise receive it," and the verse from Isaiah (66:10), "Rejoice with Jerusalem ... all you who love her."

Third, the true reconstruction of Jerusalem implies reconstruction of the Temple. There is a progression. First, God will again inhabit Jerusalem; then, we will build His house and serve Him there. Perhaps that is why Isaiah compares Jerusalem and Israel to a sad woman, abandoned by her husband: first of all, come back home! After that, we'll see.

Then again, the abandoned woman can be us: When the abandoned wife goes out for a walk, when she is somewhere else, she feels her husband's absence less. She feels it most strongly when she returns home. And so our yearning is greatest perhaps when we are physically in the city but the Shechinah still is not. The golden city arrayed in its incomparable light makes us yearn all the more for the light's holy Source.

From Jacob's dream through the present, Jerusalem has always been between Heaven and Earth, a place where the sublime is in constant contact with the mundane. On the one hand, people spit on the ground; on the other hand, they live there as if in a perpetual dream. Both aspects are real; neither tells the whole story. For now, we live in exile and pray, still and again, for return.

"Jerusalem is like the place where all the nerves come together. When you touch it, everything starts trembling."

SEPHARDIC ANGEL

by Daniel Bouskila

EVERYONE NEEDS A GUARDIAN ANGEL. EVEN the City of Jerusalem. Ever since the Roman Empire destroyed the Holy Temple in the year 70 CE, Jerusalem patiently waited for an angel to come and restore her glory. In the 19th century, Jerusalem's guardian angel finally arrived – a tall, stately British/Sephardic Jew named Sir Moses Montefiore.

A successful businessman who was knighted by Queen Victoria, Sir Moses Montefiore had a deep love for the Land of Israel, and particularly for the City of Jerusalem. For close to two thousand years, Jews all over the world recited their daily prayers facing Jerusalem, expressing with great fervor and hope that "Jerusalem should be rebuilt speedily during their lifetime."

Sir Moses Montefiore took these spiritual lyrics as a call for action and, like all angels, became a partner with God in fulfilling a divine mission, which in this case was to begin the process of re-building the City of Jerusalem.

Montefiore's vision for Jerusalem combined the physical and spiritual elements of the city. Through economic development and building plans, Jerusalem would gain economic prosperity, and thus become once again a flourishing spiritual center.

The economic plans included the introduction of a printing press, a textile factory, and the establishment of several agricultural settlements. Montefiore would also become involved in helping to establish schools, synagogues, visitor's centers, and a hospital – all in Jerusalem.

But Montefiore's true "Jerusalem legacy" would ultimately be the establishment of the first Jewish residential neighborhood outside the Old City's walls in nearly two thousand years.

In 1857, Montefiore built a windmill right outside the walls of Jerusalem's Old City. The purpose of the windmill was to grind flour and bring down its cost, yet another step in helping Jerusalem's economy. But the windmill had an even greater purpose. It would become the vehicle that spearheaded the building of the "New Jerusalem," the modern city established beyond the ancient walls of the Old City. Montefiore initiated the building of Jerusalem's first new neighborhood, and he went on a global fundraising campaign to help ensure its completion. The most significant source of funding came from another Sephardic Jew, Mr. Judah Touro, an American Jewish philanthropist. In 1860, Montefiore's dream had been realized, and the brand new Mishkenot Sha'ananim neighborhood was opened. It consisted of twenty residential units, two synagogues, lavatories and a communal oven. The Mishkenot Sha'ananim neighborhood expanded and flourished after Montefiore's death, and in today's modern State of Israel, the original buildings house a music center and a guesthouse for visiting artists, writers and musicians. Known today as Yemin Moshe, or "The Right Hand of Moses," this historic neighborhood is considered one of Jerusalem's most exclusive residential neighborhoods. Its architectural landmark is Montefiore's windmill. In his memoirs, Montefiore expressed his personal satisfaction at seeing this building project coming to fruition: "Great was my delight when I considered that but a few years had passed since the time when not one Jewish family was living outside the gates of Jerusalem [the Old City] – not a single house to be seen. Now I beheld almost a new Jerusalem springing up, with buildings as fine as any in Europe." Montefiore felt that the "New Jerusalem" was the realization of the prophecy that proclaimed, "I will make Jerusalem an eternal excellency, a joy for many generations."

Montefiore lived until the ripe old age of 101, yet even in his old age, tradition has it that he continued to work on behalf of Jerusalem. The modern Israeli/Sephardic singer Yehoram Gaon sings an old folk song about Sir Moses Montefiore. In the third stanza, the folk song tells that when Montefiore was 100 years old, the angels from heaven summoned him and said that before joining them in heaven, his final task was to help rebuild the spiritual centerpiece of Jerusalem, the Kotel (the Western Wall that remains from the Roman destruction of the Temple). Israeli tour guides today will show you the various levels of stones on the Kotel, the most recent being the stones that were placed by the elderly Montefiore.

When Sir Moses Montefiore finally joined the heavenly angels, the City of Jerusalem witnessed the ascension to heaven of its very own guardian angel, whose sacred mission on earth was to physically and spiritually elevate Jerusalem back to its soaring heights.

Yes, everyone needs a guardian angel. Just ask the City of Jerusalem.

IF YOU WANT TO CATCH A GLIMPSE OF JERUSALEM'S religious future, you might – you might – want to join, say, 25,000 other Israelis at a Shantipi festival in the Galilee, or visit a festival-inspired learning community – pointedly not a yeshiva – in Jerusalem's Baka or Katamon neighborhoods.

In a country that has been so painfully divided between religious and secular, these might just be the first signs of a crossover, and they are not small: more than 25,000 at a festival in September called Bereshit, 15,000 at Bumbamela over Passover, and 25,000 at Shantipi in June. If you were to translate 25,000 Israelis to a similar percentage of Americans, the crowd would match the population of New Hampshire.

The spiritual trends are too numerous to mention – from the popular Leader Minyan where Orthodox practice is wedded to Carlebach music and women lead the Torah service, to the burgeoning religious neighborhood of Ge'ulah on Jerusalem's northern edge, where a festival-like atmosphere pervades pre-Shabbos shopping until 2 am on Thursday nights.

But what is loosely called "the festival scene" is attracting huge numbers of Jews "for whom organized Judaism isn't even on the radar screen," said Rabbi Mordechai Gafni, whose weekly television show "Under His Vine" is Israel's first religious program to succeed in prime time. These events, heavily steeped in Eastern practice and philosophy, along with dancing, dress and song, meet the yearnings of youth with a wide array of spiritual choices – not to mention environmental activism, homemade ceramics and time to just hang out.

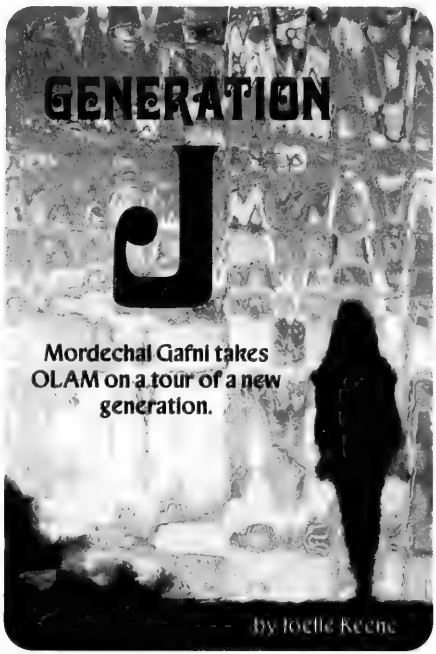
"They were started primarily by Eastern seekers, by Jewishly disaffected Israelis, and the festivals have become now probably the most exciting spiritual events in the country," Rabbi Gafni told OLAM.

Many young Israelis take a year off after their army service to study in India, China or Nepal; they come home and want to continue with it. The festivals also meet a certain very practical need: with schools, stores and even buses closed for the major Jewish holidays, if you're not religious, what is there to do? Bereshit, Bumbamela and Shantipi coincide with Rosh Hashanah, Passover and Shavuot, respectively, offering two or three days of concerts, consciousness-raising, and booths ranging from capuiera, the Brazilian dancing sport that is all the rage, and mandala, a Tibetan meditation practice of making a drawing in the sand, then erasing it the moment it's done.

Yet the attendees, though generally secular in orientation, are not anti-Judaism or even anti-religious.

"In the old secular Israel which remains, there's this deep anti-religious sentiment," Gafni explained. "But here, there's no anti-religious sentiment. Rather it's a sense of, 'The way the religious community has presented itself to us in Israel is not for me, but we wish them well,' and then reaching for spiritual and Godly connections that allow them to grow on their own path."

Some of these same people are beginning to study in a new wave of smaller, crossover yeshivas, though none has "yeshiva" in its name. Located just a few blocks apart in Baka and Katamon, Kolot ("Voices"), Bayit Chadash ("New Home") and Gesher ("Bridge"), for example, are explicitly open to the secular community, which comprises about half their enrollments. These, Gafni says, are perhaps the intellectual arm of the festival movement.



"The festival scene is attracting huge numbers of Jews for whom organized Judaism isn't even on the radar screen."

What they and the festivals are not, he says, is part of an "outreach" system. "Outreach says, 'You're the primitive natives and we're going to bring you the truth,'" he explained. "For these people, that doesn't work; it's condescending. This is about being together, about an exchange that happens, and we model different things for each other that elevate all our lives."

An Orthodox rabbi himself, Gafni says he has learned much from the festivals. From a Tai Chi teacher who had studied a bit of kabbalah, he learned a set of movements and chants reflecting the parts of the body as they correspond to the Ten Sefirot, the mystical understanding of various aspects of the Divine. The movements, he believes, are closer to the original meaning of the Sefirot as described by the Kabbalists than the more cerebral understanding he had of them before.

When people want to find a bridge to Judaism, he said, it is there. That means that the increasing number of young religious Jews who are going to the festivals – partly just to be part of what's happening with their generation, partly for the music – will have something to give as well as to receive. Gafni was thrilled to be invited to lead the opening ceremonies at Bereshit this year in Megiddoh.

The festival opened with 360 drummers standing in a circle and beating Indian-style drums. Around them were concentric circles of thousands of people, all standing in a huge dirt clearing. When the drumming stopped, Gafni offered a few words about the Jewish new year, then led a Chassidic exercise. "Turn to the person next to you," he told the crowd. "Give them a hug, and say, 'I'm not willing to be written into the Book of Life without you.' Take a risk. When we do that, God can't choose this one or that one, and God smiles."

The place, he said, went wild. Then 100 shofars were blown. Later, he held a Rosh Hashanah service in a white tent, attended by about 100 people – small by festival standards, but an important first nonetheless.

"These people aren't Buddhists, they're not Hindus," said Gafni, who often dresses in Indian garb himself. "They're looking for tools. What I'm saying to them is that there are many instruments, and Buddhism is an instrument, but there's also an instrument called Judaism. And wouldn't it be tragic if the instrument that's our identity fell into disuse, disrepair, and went out of tune, because we just forgot how to play it?"

Time will tell how many follow his cue. But if the status quo of hard categories and separate worlds in Israeli life is going to break down, perhaps drums, dancing and meditation will be part of the grist.

"We're reaching for an entirely different way of touching the sacred," Gafni said. "We want to reclaim a sense of ceremony, a sense of tribe, the sense of a powerful rhythm of a community that's merged into one."

Sounds like unity. Maybe it's the coming thing.

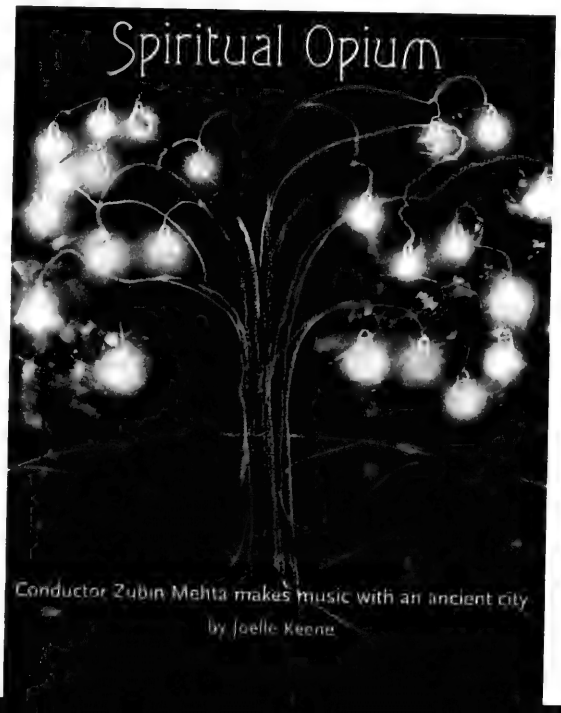
Spiritual Opium

Conductor Zubin Mehta makes music with an ancient city

by Joelle Keene



WHERE DO JERUSALEMITES TURN for solace when the world is raining down around their heads?

When they've finished praying, returned home from reserve duty or just finished the dinner dishes, many of them, it seems, fill the Henry Crown Symphony Hall at the Jerusalem Theatre and immerse themselves in Beethoven, Mozart and Tchaikovsky. Every seat is filled, and at the end, the room errupts.

"They are very enthusiastic, and very vociferous in their applause," reports maestro Zubin Mehta, who is conductor-for-life of the Israel Philharmonic and has been its music director since 1969. "They love this music, and they love their orchestra, really with their whole hearts."

They also turn to it for solace when they're suffering through a war. Beginning with the Six Day War in 1967, Mehta has flown to Jerusalem to conduct special concerts each time Israel has been under attack. During the Yom Kippur war in 1973, he led a memorial concert to raise money for the soldiers' fund, and then led a victory concert a few days later when the war was won.

"Israelis don't stay away during the wars; they jam the concert halls," said Mehta in an interview with OLAM. "It's their spiritual opium. They live with it all the time and they can't do without it, even during a war."

This, it turns out, may be partly a legacy from the founding of the orchestra in 1936 by Bronislaw Huberman, who had rescued Jewish musicians from Vienna, Warsaw, Budapest, Berlin and other cities in countries that were hostile to Jews. Many of these musicians were first-stand players, and their first concert was conducted – without pay – by Arturo Toscanini. Undeterred by the growing storm in Europe, the group performed throughout the Middle East, giving concerts in Egypt and Lebanon, and later in Allied military camps.

No stranger to history himself, Mehta – whose first public concert ever was a free program for victims of the communist invasion of Hungary in 1956 – led performances in Israel throughout the Gulf War, when tourists stayed away and Israelis were donning gas masks every time a scud missile was launched from Iraq. And after conducting full seasons in both Jerusalem and Tel Aviv this past year as the country suffered through Intifada II, he traveled with the orchestra to performances in Buenos Aires, Rio de Janeiro and elsewhere in South America.

Mehta grew up in Bombay, India, studied music in Vienna, and then became the youngest director ever of the Los Angeles Philharmonic in 1962. In 1978, he left LA to take the reins of the New York Philharmonic, a post he held for 13 years, and today he directs the Bavarian State Opera Orchestra in Munich, one of the most venerated orchestras in Europe.

Meanwhile, his debut with the Israel Philharmonic was in 1961 and the chemistry was immediate. By 1969 he'd been made music director, and in 1981 the orchestra named him music director for life.

"It's more an honor than a contract," said the maestro, who has now led the orchestra for more than 40 years. Together they have made dozens of recordings and toured much of the globe. In addition to the standard symphonic repertoire, Mehta makes a point of highlighting the music of Israeli composers, such as Josef Tal, Ami Maayani and Noam Sheriff.

"So what is it that binds this globe-trotting maestro so firmly to Jerusalem, an arguably beleaguered city none of whose three great religions is his?"

So what is it that binds this globe-trotting maestro so firmly to Jerusalem, an arguably beleaguered city none of whose three great religions is his? Like most things about Jerusalem, Mehta's attachment has many parts.

From the beginning, there was a cultural affinity.

"It wasn't only with the orchestra that I felt so at home," Mehta explained. "The very first time I was in Israel it reminded me a lot of Bombay, in its hustle and bustle and sort of organized disorganization. Bombay is both an Eastern and a Western city and our personalities mixed immediately.

"Israel is a mixture of Europe and Asia," he added. "And that's exactly what I am."

Surprisingly, Mehta also feels a religious connection to Jerusalem, although not one you'd expect. Mehta is a Zoroastrian, whose adherents came from what is now Iran and who were exiled en masse, most to India, some 1,400 years ago. "From his seat in ancient Persia," the maestro explained, "Zaros the Great helped finance the building of the Second Temple – not a small matter."

Now, there's also history. After 40 years, 35 of them as music director, "I've engaged 99 percent of the musicians myself." This is an extraordinarily high percentage in the high turnover field of orchestral conducting.

And then, perhaps, there's a certain accident of fate. Mehta was born in 1936, the same year Bronislaw Huberman founded the orchestra. When Mehta turned 60, the Israel Philharmonic did too – and the maestro marked the occasion by bringing it to Los Angeles for a combined performance with the Los Angeles Philharmonic. Special guests were Daniel Barenboim, Pinchas Zuckerman and Itzhak Perlman, all Israeli-born musicians who, like Mehta, have achieved international stature.

"Jerusalem is going through one of its most difficult periods now," Mehta said. "Almost as difficult as the Crusades. Jerusalem today is almost in a state of war, and the different peoples there are not mixing, not rubbing shoulders on the street, but for many years they did."

But these troubles, he believes, will be temporary.

"Long after I stop making music and the Israel Philharmonic will have other conductors, Jerusalem will still go on," he said. "It is an eternal city, really in the true sense of the word, and – inshallah – its problems will all be resolved, I'm sure.

"Jerusalem is not for today's or yesterday's problems," he said. "Jerusalem has been special for 3,000 years. Jerusalem is forever."

"Jerusalem contains within its history and identity a challenge to remember not only our defeats but also our self-defeats."

EXODUS 32:1-6 "...'MAKE US A GOD WHO SHALL go before us'... and he fashioned it with a graving tool, and made it a molten calf; and they said: 'This is thy god, O Israel....'"

That history repeats itself is one of the oldest axioms in the world, and one of the oldest continuously observed holidays in the world, the 17th of Tammuz, dramatically proves this point. On the 17th of Tammuz – which we observe with mourning, fasting and contemplation – a series of calamities befell the Jewish people, all on precisely the same day though centuries apart.

On the 17th of Tammuz in 586 BCE, the walls of Jerusalem were breached by Nebuchadnezzar, who went on to conquer the city and exile its inhabitants. On the 17th of Tammuz in 70 CE, the walls of Jerusalem were breached once again, this time by Titus the Roman. Then, in both cases, two weeks later on the Ninth of Av the first and second Temples respectively were destroyed completely. That same date – the Ninth of Av, or Tisha b'Av – in 1492 was the date on which King Ferdinand decreed that the last Jew must leave Spain. It is also the date on which World War I began in 1914.

So history repeats itself. Sometimes even on the same day.

But, as we shall see, myth repeats itself, too. And Jerusalem contains within its history and identity a challenge to remember not only our defeats but also our self-defeats. And perhaps a challenge not to repeat them.

The summer of 2000 saw peace talks between Israelis and Palestinians. They did not lead to peace. For two weeks the two sides negotiated, but to no avail. The most immediate reason had to do with Jerusalem: a City of Gold, a holy place for the three religions derived of Abraham, and the city that was crowned the capital of Israel for the first time in 1004 BCE by none other than King David himself. So what happened to this City of Gold?

Well, the fact that Jerusalem has seen much history and been sacred to three faiths certainly complicates matters. But the key to the present impasse may lie even deeper in the past, before either temple was built. Long before Jerusalem was even conceived, there was another incident on the 17th of Tammuz. This one we read about in Exodus, Chapter 32: the day when Moses discovered and destroyed the golden calf.

The recently freed slaves had been left alone for some time while Moses was up on Mount Sinai. Tired of imagining a God who had no physical appearance, they asked their high priest Aaron to build them a golden bull-calf so they could worship, and in no time one was prepared. Everybody was happy, having at last an object to adore, to love, to fight for, kill for and touch. A golden manifestation of their belief.

Moses arrived down from the mountain on the 17th of Tammuz, saw the calf, and smashed the Ten Commandments, supposedly written by the hand of God, and destroyed the golden calf.

Camp David: talks on the future of Jerusalem, the City of David. Talks of peace that ended midway between the 17th of Tammuz and the 9th of Av, summer 2000, stuck on the status of Jerusalem.

Gematria, which assigns numbers to letters and adds them up into words, gives zahav, "gold" in English, the value of 14 – the exact number of days the peace talks of 2000 lasted. Jerusalem is called the City of Gold; the walls of the city were breached twice on the same day of the Hebrew year that the golden calf was destroyed.

The parallels are too many to overlook. Neither Jews nor Muslims should consider Jerusalem something to kill or die for, because no object in this world holds God in it – the very thought is idol worship. We must not turn Jerusalem into a new kind of golden calf.

The city of Jerusalem today contains 600,000 inhabitants – the same number of people who were at Mount Sinai when the golden calf was made. Again today as then, the golden calf must be destroyed as a concept, for if not, it will have to be destroyed physically once more.

Can Jews and Muslims, who both revere Moses as perhaps their greatest teacher, learn the lessons of their own primal stories? Muhammad said: "There is no God but God." Moses said God's true name is "I Am that I Am." God is everywhere, not only in Jerusalem.

Moses ordered the golden calf to be burned, melted and ground into dust. He then diluted the gold dust with water and all who had worshipped it had to drink. You can say he shoved the golden calf down their throats – but it is more than that. Actually gold is a mineral that is needed in the human body. Taken in the right quantity (that is why it must be diluted with water), it is important to the immune system. So perhaps Moses was the first homeopath.

But he certainly knew how to deal with false icons. When a physical object becomes the subject of such hate and controversy between people, it must be ground and transformed into a healing remedy. The City of Gold can no longer serve as an excuse for war.

We need not grind up Jerusalem and dilute it with water; the Torah is a book of symbols. But we must grind up our concept of Jerusalem as Gold. Jerusalem is a most beautiful place, a holy place, a symbol of union with God for millions of people. But we must not make a fetish of this holy connection. Many Kabbalists believe that after the second temple was destroyed, the center of Jewish consciousness moved from Jerusalem into the heart of each person. The temple is now in us. It's interesting to note that in alchemy the symbol of the heart is gold.

It is time for all of us to change our perception of Jerusalem. Jews and Muslims alike need to dissolve the way they revere this place, to dissolve their violence or tenacity with compassion. Moses dissolved the gold of the calf with water, and water in Kabbalah is a symbol for feeling, compassion and forgiveness.

Try to look for the golden calf in your life. To what physical object do you assign too much value? Where is your idol worship? Is it your car, your house, your financial statements? Is it your diamond earring, or golden ring – or perhaps, a golden city?

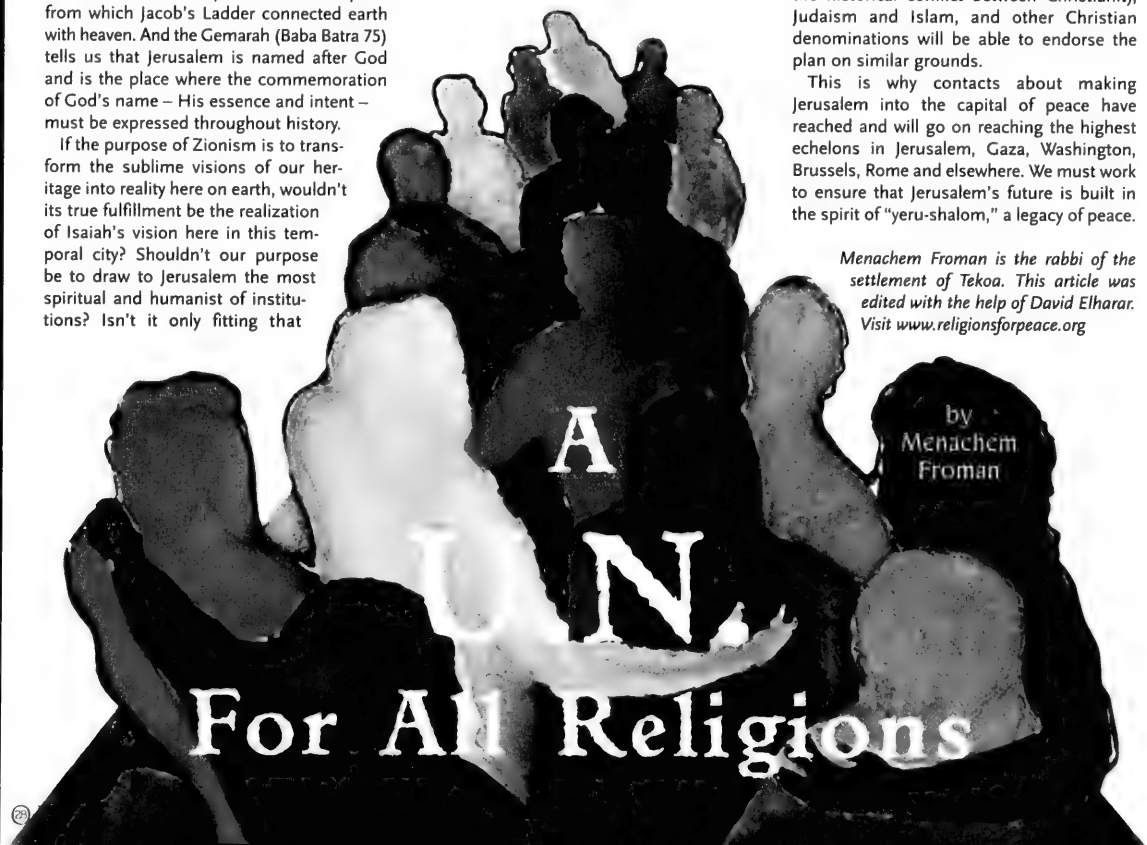
A U.N. For All Religions

by Menachem Froman



In framing a view of Jerusalem's future, we would do well to draw upon our divine heritage. Isaiah's famed vision of Jerusalem at the End of Days, for example, was that "instruction shall come forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem ... nation shall not take up sword against nation; they shall never again know war."

Why not bring that prophecy to fruition by turning Jerusalem into a place worthy of her name: a city of peace? Wouldn't it be wise to launch an offensive aimed at transforming Jerusalem into the capital of the world? Surely this would be a way of showing our city far greater respect and showering it with far more love.

The key must be to raise Jerusalem above the arena of national power games and squabbles over the symbols and tools of sovereignty. Wars for control of territory are commonplace in our world. But Israel's victories in the War of Independence and the Six-Day War have accorded it a power and opportunity that are unique: to declare a place on earth – the Old City of Jerusalem – ex-territorial.

Jewish tradition contains many expressions of the idea that Jerusalem is not confined by the bounds of common territoriality. The Midrash, for example, cites it as the place from which Jacob's Ladder connected earth with heaven. And the Gemarah (Baba Batra 75) tells us that Jerusalem is named after God and is the place where the commemoration of God's name – His essence and intent – must be expressed throughout history.

If the purpose of Zionism is to transform the sublime visions of our heritage into reality here on earth, wouldn't its true fulfillment be the realization of Isaiah's vision here in this temporal city? Shouldn't our purpose be to draw to Jerusalem the most spiritual and humanist of institutions? Isn't it only fitting that Jerusalem be the seat of the U.N.'s cultural bodies, human rights organizations, scholarly forums and workshops of intellectual endeavor? And finally, isn't it only proper that Jerusalem be the place where members of all faiths convene to renounce their breeding of prejudice, hostility and war, and work to fashion world peace? We do Jerusalem no honor if we insist that it be to us what Belgrade is to Yugoslavia. Jerusalem deserves to be more: a realization of our potential to rise above the narrow sense of nationalism.

"Wouldn't it be wise to launch an offensive aimed at transforming Jerusalem into the capital of the world? Isn't it only proper that Jerusalem be the place where members of all faiths convene to renounce their breeding of prejudice, hostility and war, and work to fashion world peace?"

This is not a utopian vision appropriate only to the End of Days. Meetings and discussions are already in progress among Jews, Muslims and Christians with the aim of making Jerusalem into the capital of peace and home of a U.N. for all religions. They are drawn together by the hope of converting a problem on which no side can afford to concede – following the traditional model of negotiations as give-and-take, as in "land for peace" – into a solution that leaves all sides feeling they have gained: a win-win outcome.

For Israel this proposal will mean elevating Jerusalem from the capital of a small country in the Levant to the capital of the world. No less important in this idea would be Jerusalem's role as a bridge between the Muslim world and the West to help defuse tensions that spread well beyond the Middle East. Both the United States and Europe can make meaningful contributions in this sphere. The Pope has repeatedly expressed his desire to have the start of the new millennium mark the end of the historical conflict between Christianity, Judaism and Islam, and other Christian denominations will be able to endorse the plan on similar grounds.

This is why contacts about making Jerusalem into the capital of peace have reached and will go on reaching the highest echelons in Jerusalem, Gaza, Washington, Brussels, Rome and elsewhere. We must work to ensure that Jerusalem's future is built in the spirit of "yeru-shalom," a legacy of peace.

Through my daughter's eyes

by Laura Geller

We arrived in Jerusalem just after Tisha B'Av, the holy day that commemorates the destruction of the Temples. Wherever we walked – through the corridors of the Israel Museum, along Ben Yehuda Street, in the Old City – it felt deserted. The words of Lamentations, the book we read on Tisha B'av, echoed in my ears: "Aicha: How this city sits solitary that was once full of people! How she has become like a widow...."

This was my daughter Elana's first trip to Israel. We planned it months ago, as a kind of pre-bat mitzvah mother-daughter experience. I had visions of introducing her to all the places and people who had transformed my life when I first went to Israel more than 30 years ago. I wanted her to love it the way I love it, to feel that this place, too, was her home.

We stayed in an apartment in the center of Jerusalem. Elana got to know the children of my Israeli friends, kids exactly her age named Raffa and Dafi. From our balcony, you could see Gilo in the distance. Many nights we heard shelling, and one night we could even smell the smoke from the guns. That particular night Elana asked me to lock the balcony door.

On Thursday, we hired a private guide for a tour of the Southern Excavation at the Wall. Our guide, an American who had moved to Israel 20 years ago, had worked only one week out of the past nine months because all of her bookings had cancelled their trips. The tour was terrific; I began to imagine what the Temple might have looked like and to comprehend the extraordinary undertaking of King Herod in building it. Elana, not a great fan of antiquities, perked up as our guide read to us from Josephus' The Jewish Wars about how Herod killed his wife in a jealous rage. It was a story she hadn't learned in Religious School!

We invited our guide to lunch, and decided to meet at a restaurant just off Ben Yehuda Street. As we ate, we heard sirens. Ten minutes later, we learned there had been a suicide bombing at the intersection of Ben Yehuda and Jaffa Road, just a few blocks from where we were.

In my daughter's first trip to Israel, she learned about the randomness of terrorism and she learned about retaliation. She learned that innocent people on both sides of this conflict are being slaughtered. She watched details of the terror on CNN, in the middle of Jerusalem and in the West Bank. She saw the faces of devastated Palestinians and devastated Israelis whose children had been killed.

She heard Raffa and Dafi's parents talk about how hard life was for them, and how much they needed their American friends to come to Israel to visit. And she asked a lot of questions: Why didn't the other Arab nations solve the Palestinian refugee crisis? Is Israel making the situation even more difficult by closing roads and making it impossible for Palestinians to work? Why didn't Arafat accept Barak's peace plan? Can Arafat really control the terrorists?

And then there was the question she didn't ask out loud, but I could see it in her eyes: Will the new friends she met, kids like Raffa and Dafi – will they get to grow up?

I don't have the answer to her question. No one does. Most of my Israeli friends still believe, in spite of the terror, that the only solution will come through negotiations, not escalation of violence and the cycle of retaliation.

"And then there was the question she didn't ask out loud, but I could see it in her eyes: Will the new friends she met, kids like Raffa and Dafi – will they get to grow up?"

Though it is easy to become an extremist, to discount the humanity of the Palestinians, that is not the way these friends have responded. They continue to support the peace movement, continue to work with Rabbis for Human Rights, continue to go to demonstrations calling for dismantling many of the settlements and urging the involvement of international monitors. They continue to send their children to the army. They continue to go out for pizza. They continue to pray for peace. And the parents of Raffa and Dafi – they need us to be there for them and to pray with them.

Elana's first trip was very different from mine. I hope one day she'll love Jerusalem as I do. I do know that as she grows up, the words from Psalm 122 she heard in our Jerusalem synagogue will always evoke strong feelings for her: "Our feet are standing at your gates, Jerusalem, built as a city bound firmly together where tribes once went up to give thanks to the Eternal, where thrones of justice were once set, thrones of the house of David. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem, may they prosper who love her."

May God bless us from Zion and let us see the good of Jerusalem. Let us see our children's children and peace upon Israel. May it be true for us, and for all of God's children.

DAR EL-HARB?

(House of War?)

THE INTIFADA BEGAN IN LATE 1987. ON THE OPPOSITE HILL, WITHIN EASY VIEW FROM MY PORCH, TEENAGERS GATHERED around the mosque, throwing stones at soldiers. Often the minaret was obscured by the white smoke of tear gas and the black smoke of burning tires. On the mosque's loudspeakers, voices hoarse with shouting would be heard outside of prayer time. Even the muezzin's call lost its delicacy, becoming shrill and coarse. It was the voice of jihad, holy war, and it was aimed against the occupation not only of his hill but of mine.

For one month each year I served as a reservist soldier, chasing stone throwers in Gaza and the West Bank. But watching them as a civilian from my porch, I couldn't help admiring their courage, and I knew that, in their place, I would do the same. Still, I refused to understand the muezzin. Unlike the rock-throwers, he seemed an unworthy opponent, manipulating faith for hatred. Even when the rioting began to ease, his voice continued to leap with hate. Like most of my Israeli neighbors, I came to fear his call as a reminder of the chaos of the Middle East. I stopped imagining us praying together, and gradually his voice receded into background noise, like the cars on the road that separated French Hill from Anata. I'd deceived myself with romanticism. The Arab world couldn't live with itself, let alone with a non-Muslim state in its midst. My poetic longings only undermined my political savvy, essential for survival in the Middle East.

Stones turned to knives. Muslim terrorists went on stabbing sprees in Israeli streets, shouting Allahu akbar! "God is great!" as they slashed. For Israelis, those wonderful words became the murderers' cry. When I heard them in the muezzin's call, it seemed he was trying to destroy me with prayer.

The Oslo peace process that began in 1993 intensified the holy war. Inspired in equal measure by hatred of Jews and longing for paradise, young men strapped explosives to their bodies and blew themselves up in Israeli crowds. The ultimate logic of fundamentalism: You entered heaven by sending heretics to hell. Only Islam had the power to turn the Arab world into a storm uprooting us from the Middle East. Islam now threatened me in the most personal way possible: It endangered the lives of my children. And so, like other Israelis, I too tried to ignore the Muslim devotion around me, because admitting that we lived in the heart of Islam meant conceding the impossibility of a normal life.

I knew there must be another Islam, cringing from the fanatics who desecrated its name. More in desperation than hope, I attended an interfaith gathering of Muslims and Jews, held in a kibbutz guest house overlooking the wooded Judean hills. The Muslims were all Israeli Arabs; we spoke in Hebrew. A scholar in Muslim law who lectured at a local Islamic college spoke of the long history of friendship between Muslims and Jews: Maimonides had been influenced by Islamic philosophers; Muslim and Jewish mystics in medieval Egypt had learned from each other's devotions. Afterward I asked him whether Islam could reconcile theologically with Jewish sovereignty in any part of the Holy Land. "Forget about it!" he said. "It will never happen! Islam commands me to destroy the Jewish state." He explained that Islam divided the world into Dar el-Islam, the House of Islam, and Dar el-harb, the house of War, or the territory controlled by non-Muslims. Any land, especially the Holy Land, that had once been controlled by Dar el-Islam and had passed into the hands of Dar el-harb must revert to Muslim rule. Muslims, he continued, were obliged to treat Jews and Christians – the "peoples of the Book," as Islam called them – with kindness and respect; still, they had to be brought under Islamic rule.

"But" – and he smiled like a man about to reveal a secret – "Islam doesn't obligate me to try to destroy the Jewish state immediately. There is time. Right now Israel is strong. We can wait fifty years, a hundred. What's the hurry? Meanwhile, you and I can live in peace."

Was he hinting at a pragmatic Islam, able indefinitely to defer to reality? Or was he warning me? Any territorial concessions will only weaken you and hasten that time when we feel strong enough to destroy you.

Sometimes, across the barrier of fear, Islam revealed to me glimpses of its beauty. Walking around Jerusalem, I would see a lone Muslim street sweeper or gardener fall to his knees, responding to an invisible call to prayer. I would watch from a respectful distance, trying not to pry, envying his lack of self-consciousness, the Muslim ability to ignore human judgement in the presence of God. Once I saw a Muslim atop a crane at a construction site prostrate himself in prayer, as if blessing the city below. But those were rare moments, reminders of a lost link. As Muslim terrorism intensified, Islam slipped away, untouchable in its separatism and rage.

(SECOND EXCERPT)

And then, just as I was about to despair of experiencing Ramadan, Sheykh Ishak Idriss Sakouta appeared in Jerusalem on a one-man mission of religious peace. Not even his sponsors seemed to know much about him. He was believed to be a member of a Sufi order, but no one knew which. It was said that he divided his time between Cairo, where he owned a substantial amount of land, and Mecca, where he helped organize provisions for pilgrims. He was said to be close to the Saudi royal family, which had awarded him the title of "religious counselor" to the World Muslim League, the royal family's charitable foundation. That title, however mysterious, had been impressive enough to win him audiences with the Israeli president and chief rabbi. A spiritual leader from the heartland of Islam – the forbidden city of Mecca, no less – was actually willing to talk to us; it was best not to examine his credentials too closely. That way, we could imagine that a major religious figure had broken the Muslim boycott on contact with Israel and that peace with Islam was possible after all.

I went to hear the sheykh address a small gathering of Jerusalem's interfaith activists at Yakar, a center for liberal Orthodox Judaism that taught kabbalah and Jewish spirituality while reaching out to other traditions. In this room, with its easy mingling of faiths, was a vision of the possible Jerusalem. We were so engaged in conversation that few noticed the sheykh enter. "Salaam aleikum," ("peace to you") he said, and he raised his hands in greeting. It didn't seem to matter to him whether or not he was acknowledged; he was welcoming us. He took a seat at the table in front and smiled with joy, as if to say: How wonderful to be together with my fellow believers in the holy city of Jerusalem. Suddenly, the room became focused on his extraordinary presence.

Speaking through a translator, the sheykh began, "Some say I am a courageous man. But when faith in God is great, there is no room for fear. Courage comes from faith. I asked God to let me come to Jerusalem before I died, and He has answered my prayers. I am a Sudanese from Khartoum, but my roots are in the Prophet's family. My ancestors were men of faith and property. For twenty years I lived among the great sheykhs of Khartoum. And then I moved to Mecca. For forty years I'm in the Great Mosque. From the Kaaba to the Mosque, from the Mosque to the Kaaba." In establishing his credentials, he was asserting his right to speak for Islam.

As a boy, he continued, he'd studied with a Sufi sheykh. Once, the Jews of Khartoum complained to his sheykh that they'd been mistreated by Muslims. "The Jews," announced the sheykh to his followers, "are my children," and he forbade anyone to harass them.

Still, Sheykh Ishak admitted, he himself had grown up with anti-Jewish misconceptions. But then, ten years ago, he met Jews for the first time at an interfaith conference in Rome. "I was surprised to meet such cultured and refined people. It broke all my stereotypes."

He told us that Moses had appeared to him recently in a dream. He'd asked the prophet for a knife; instead, Moses gave him his staff. The sheykh didn't interpret the dream for us, but I thought he meant: I come bearing the staff of the prophet whom both Jews and Muslims revere, the staff that performed miracles of redemption.

He concluded with the usual affirmations of religious brotherhood, backed by quotes from the Koran. There was nothing startling or profound in his comments, but he conveyed a combination of strength and calm that made me want to remain in his presence. He didn't just speak about peace, he seemed to embody it.

Someone asked the sheykh to sing a Sufi song, and he happily complied. "When Muhammad came to Mecca," he sang, "the moon rose in fullness." His song had the same deep and steady quality as his speech, as if the two were interchangeable.

He blessed us all that our "truest prayers" should be fulfilled, and our encounter with the Islam of peace was over.

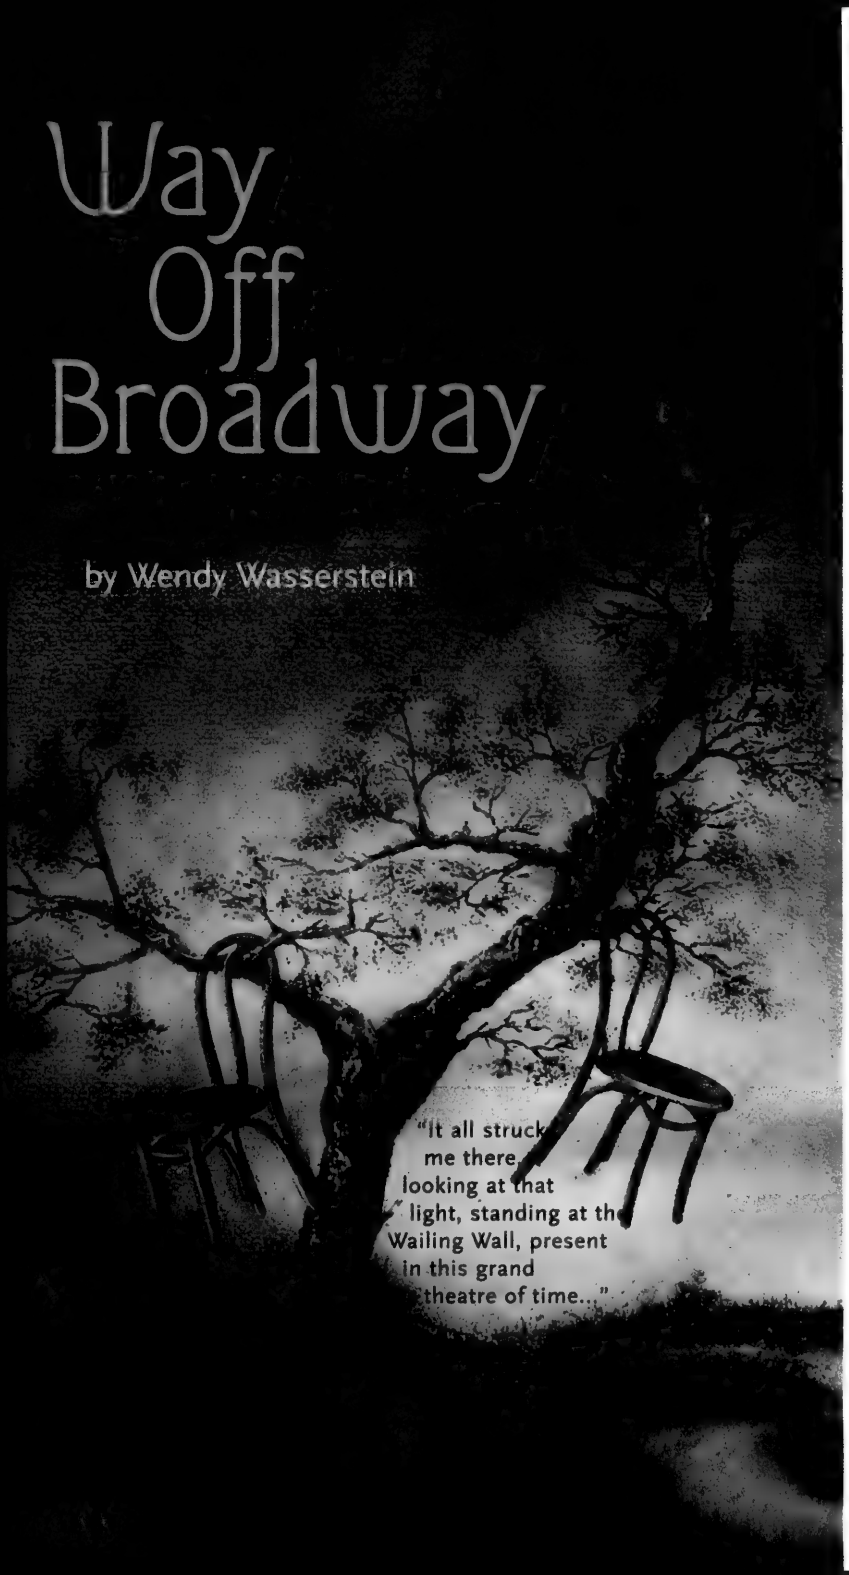
Way Off Broadway

by Wendy Wasserstein



JERUSALEM IS A CONSUMMATE PLAY; THE ultimate theatre. When I visit Jerusalem I experience the most beautiful city I have ever been in, and I am moved. I am dazzled by the theatricality of Jerusalem; by its profound light that is so extraordinary. I am awed by its history and beauty, present in the backdrop and props of its buildings, which provide the kind of catharsis that is present in truly great theatre.

But mostly, I am moved by the eternal triangle of Jerusalem's nature. The Wailing Wall is shadowed by the Dome of the Rock, the Dome of the Rock is frocked by the Christian quarter. Three is an important number in theatre – it is a number that transforms a dualistic conflict into a complex set of alliances, and Jerusalem has its complexities in spades. On each side, it is the apex of an ancient religion, the home of a primordial people, a city that is so steeped in history and religion that in it, the past becomes the present, and the foreign becomes the familiar. On the streets of Jerusalem one feels connected to the Israel of Solomon and David; stories of the Temple and the Babylonian captivity suddenly seem accessible. And at the same time, one is aware of the deep spirituality that simultaneously unites and divides the Orthodox Jews and the fervent Moslems.

It all struck me there, looking at that light, standing at the Wailing Wall, present in this grand theatre of time, place and action, that I was immersed in my own personal play – my own examination of gender, spirituality and religion. It was a private assessment of my being a Jewish woman, but at the same time, a public one that connected me to the Jewish people as a whole.

And this is why, perhaps, I am so deeply saddened by the current events, because they indicate that Jerusalem as a city has lost its balance. When children are blown up in a pizzeria, there is a greater problem at hand, one that I have no solution for. So, because I am not a statesman, or a historian, I pray. Please God, just solve this. Please God, allow this city to be the place where people can bring up their families in peace. Please God, give balance to this eternal triangle. And make sure that the curtain does not fall on this ancient theatre.

Excerpts from a speech given to the Israeli Knesset on Jerusalem Day, June 4, 1997

City without Walls

by Shimon Peres

IN NO OTHER PLACE IN THE WORLD HAS SPIRITUAL history, followed by political history, gathered in such density as in Jerusalem.

All three major religions were born in Jerusalem, became associated with Jerusalem or were drawn to Jerusalem, as if to a spiritual vortex. King David built the first Jewish Kingdom in Jerusalem; Jesus – according to Christian faith – spent the final hours of his life there; Muhammad – according to Islam – dreamt that he ascended from Jerusalem to the heavens.

Why Jerusalem? It has no seaport, no river runs through it, it does not sit on a busy crossroads, and its strategic value is a result more of its holiness than of any military consideration.

So why have so many become so passionate about it, yet so quick to despair of it? Had such powerful faith in it and fought so fiercely for it? Found such widespread agreement and, still, suffered such prevalent conflict within its walls?

Why was it the rising place, simultaneously, of the greatest of optimistic Prophets, Isaiah, and the greatest of pessimistic Prophets, Jeremiah? Why were Jerusalem's mountains the sounding boards for the noblest declaration of peace and the most painful prophecy of destruction in our history?

There is no simple answer. It seems that God himself has given Jerusalem such "personal charm" that most dreams, devotions and wars were drawn to it, generation after generation, faith after faith and faith against faith.

We of course were captivated, and remain spellbound, by the Jerusalem that produced such profound faith. But this faith not only surrounds Jerusalem, it pulses deep within it. We the Jewish people have never ceased to pray for it and bow before it. When we are inside the city, it is the capital of our lives; when we have been removed from it, it has been the prayer for our future.

Judaism is both a religious faith and a national identity. Jerusalem clearly symbolizes this connection: It is a political capital and a spiritual center, and this is an organic and permanent synthesis, not a passing mixture.

We have known some of our lives' greatest highlights in Jerusalem – in the days of the Prophets, of the Priests, of the Kings, of the Judges, and in our times, as well. And the city has known times of religious, economic, military and architectural prosperity. But it has also known devastation. Twice, and almost three times, the city was destroyed and we were exiled from it, and always on Tisha Be'Av its walls fell and the city was destroyed. And every time, in the very midst of siege, division among the warriors and among those under siege reached record levels. No other place in history has had a greater unifying effect on our people, and no place has divided us more. Historically speaking, then, Jerusalem's scenery is one of tall cliffs and deep abysses: the cliff of Israel, and the Israeli abyss.

It seems then, that Jerusalem is a spiritual legacy on the one hand and a political test on the other. Spiritually it has been the origin of the most noble calls for the elevation of the human soul – the call for peace, the call for justice, the call for fraternity, the call for universalism; and politically the city has known conquests, murders, burnings, irrational condescension and cruelty towards others that contradicts all holy scripts and faiths. "We are all the sons of Abraham", claim the Muslims. If we are all indeed the sons of one father, why can't we be brothers in one family? Perhaps this is the secret of Jerusalem. When man wants to elevate himself within it he can reach "as high as the stars," and when man wants to turn his back on the city and all it represents, he can crash against its rocks.

Jerusalem's lights symbolize its experiences: a seductive light blue in the morning, passionate red at noon, soft gold at sunset. The encounter of colors, like the meeting of faiths, is the constant struggle between light and shadow. There is no other city that has known so much light and so many shadows. We are drawn to them, dazzled by the city's light, or sightless to begin with, reaching for her shadows.

Jerusalem has been conquered dozens of times in its three thousand years of existence. But conquest could overpower it; its surrenders were never permanent. In the archeological layers that make up the city's mysterious edifice lies the fall of all conquerors. And above them from its surface rise synagogues, churches and mosques – some of which are still filled with historic rage, and others that are nurturing a new maturity, as if to say, Jerusalem has given us faith, let us give it tranquility.

Jerusalem must remain open to all believers. Every believer needs to have free access to his or her holy sites, that he may pray with his prayer book, in her language, with no censorship and no interference. But the believers – all believers – must come to pray, not to hate. Jerusalem is a book of prayers, not a catalogue of hatreds.

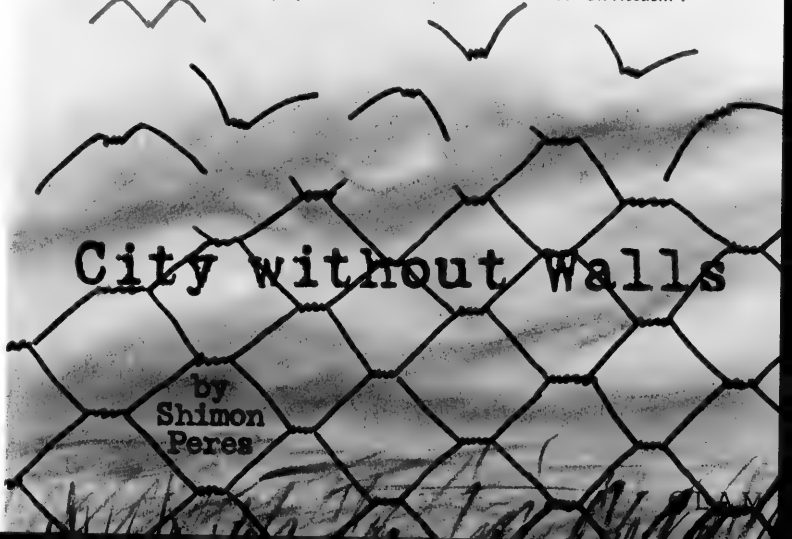
Ultimately Yeshayahu was right: Al yisa goy el goy herev – One people to another should not carry a sword. One people to another must carry solace. We believe that eventually Jerusalem will be that great home of peace, not only the birthplace of the prophecy of peace.

But in order for Jerusalem to be open to all believers, it must be acknowledged as the capital of Israel. Much land was taken from Israel, many exiles were forced upon the people of Israel, and the Israeli people have paid dearly for being the first to choose Jerusalem as the capital of their hearts and their state. Jerusalem was never an Arab or a Muslim or a Christian capital, and the Jewish people have never had a capital other than Jerusalem.

Today, there is no place nor rationale for divided capitals. Division invites the terrible shadow of renewed conflict. And Jerusalem has been destroyed more often that it has been built. Now, it has been reunited and rebuilt. The physical reunification should also symbolize human reunification – each community and its rights as an urban community will be respected. Every person has the right to be different and equal. Not only do the buildings need to hold up; relations need solid foundations, too.

Jerusalem is the most important city in history in its role as provider of inspiration. Sometimes too much of it and sometimes not enough. People have always been enraptured by it. Now is its great time of liberation: to let every wind and every spirit flow through it along its own path. To let the nation who built it and was built by it hold tight to its unity, that it may carry the hope of eternal peace.

Shimon Peres is Foreign Minister of Israel, and was Prime Minister of Israel (1977, 84-86, 95-96). He co-founded the Israeli Labour Party in 1968. In 1994, he received the Nobel Peace Prize. His last article in OLAM was "On Freedom".



ALMOST ALONE AMONG cities, Jerusalem transcends its physical essence to reach exalted spiritual and metaphorical levels. The many faces of Jerusalem are reflected in the rich and complex personality of King David, who established his sovereignty there. As Rabbi David Silber, the great teacher of Bible notes, there is the David of the Book of Samuel, the David of the Book of Psalms and the David of our liturgy. Corresponding to these three aspects of this monumental king, there is the political Jerusalem, the loving Jerusalem, and the Jerusalem of eternal spiritual transcendence.

In the Book of Samuel, David is portrayed as a strong and pragmatic political figure who, to protect his kingship, does everything in his power to keep the people of Israel together. He fends off the rebellion of his son Absalom, prevents Sheva ben Bichri from separating the ten tribes from the realm, and in his later years quashes the revolt of his son Adoniyah.

Not coincidentally, the Jerusalem that David establishes as the capital of Israel is described in the prophets as situated between the tribes of Benjamin in the north and Judah in the south, bridging, in effect, the enmity between the House of Saul and the House of David. In the Book of Genesis, Judah, in his most sublime moment, rises to tell his father Jacob that he would guarantee the safety of his brother Benjamin, his de-facto rival for the birthright and sovereignty, with Joseph out of the picture. "And if I fail," Judah concludes with extraordinary nobility, "I will have sinned to you all of my days."

In a similar fashion, Jerusalem turns adversaries into friends, sending the message that unity is the way to survival. Its very name – Yeru, the city of shalem, unity – proclaims that notwithstanding our differences, we must acknowledge our oneness and learn to love one another. Like a dove that can fly only with both wings on an even plane reaching out in opposite directions, so too, only through the cooperative efforts of opposing forces – religious and nonreligious, right and left – can Jerusalem soar.

Beyond its practical, earthly manifestation, Jerusalem is endowed with powerful lyrical, romantic, loving qualities like those reflected in the Book of Psalms. In poem after poem, King David expresses his yearning for God's embrace. "Though I walk in the valley of the shadow of death I fear no evil, for You, oh God, are with me," he declares.

"Though my father and mother have left me, the Lord will gather me in" he sings, articulating his limitless love for God, equaled only by God's limitless love for him.

Jerusalem, similarly, is described in tender, protective terms – in the words of King David, "Jerusalem, hills surround it." Like the bride who circles the groom and the groom who places a ring on his bride's finger, the hills encircle Jerusalem like a ring that reflects God's love and protection of the city in which He resides. Circular imagery suggests protectiveness and embrace, the intimacy of figures who cannot live without each other – an intimacy in which one loves deeply and feels deeply loved in return.

And so, under the wedding canopy we declare, "May there soon be heard in the streets of Jerusalem the sounds of joy and gladness, the voice of the groom and the voice of the bride." Jerusalem is evoked as the city of love – of God's love as well as of the most intimate human love. The name of its first king, David, means beloved. And while commentaries compare David to Joseph, the latter, as Rabbi Silber points out, was despised by many, whereas David, even in times of woe and vexation, seems always to have been beloved.

Like David, Jerusalem remains the emotional center, the beloved heart of our people even in the most troubled times. Today we desperately feel the need for God's embrace. The situation is so perilous that we are not even sure what to pray for. All we can do is stand before the Merciful One and allow Him to guide us to pray for what we need. We lean on the Lord. In the words of the Psalmist, we "trust in His kindness," words that Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach interpreted to mean that even before we are helped, even when it is still dark, we have faith that God will pull us through.

Jerusalem, much like the beloved, always remains in some measure beyond our grasp, always a metaphor to aspire to. It is a city that eternally awaits completion; it is forever in a state of becoming, of process, of spiritual transformation and transcendence, like the David of the liturgy. "And to Jerusalem, Your city return in mercy," we pray. Jerusalem represents dreams seeking fulfillment, process eternally seeking completion. Though it was not David who built the Temple but his son Solomon, its dedication is linked to the father as he was the one who introduced the idea, he was the one with the original vision even if he never saw it to fruition.

Eternally elusive, like a vision or dream longing for fulfillment, Jerusalem is today in great danger. The dagger of the enemy hovers over it as Abraham's knife hovered over his son Isaac's neck on Mount Moriah in the heart of the city, and as the angel of death's knife threatened the city as is recounted in the closing chapter of Samuel 2, only at the last moment did God have it lifted. Today suicide bombers target the holy city. On a recent solidarity mission to Israel, we too experienced the proximity of terror when a member of our group was injured at Sbarro's restaurant, and his niece whom he had invited to lunch was critically wounded and today lies close to death. Jerusalem in all of its faces is under siege.

Yet even with the knife dangling over Jerusalem and our people, we have faith that ultimately it will be lifted and disaster will be averted. More than ever, Jerusalem reflects God's promise to remain with us. God's covenant with Abraham and with Jerusalem, no matter the obstacles, forever endures. The multifaceted richness of the city, its political, emotional, and spiritual faces reflecting the human complexity of its founder, the majestic King David, reminds us to never despair, never give up. In the words of the Psalmist incorporated into the liturgy, the ultimate restoration of Jerusalem in all of its tangible, tender and transcendent forms is assured: "The Lord builds Jerusalem. He gathers in the dispersed of Israel. He heals the brokenhearted, and mends their wounds."

AT THE BEGINNING OF THE COMMON ERA, A NEW GROUP AROSE AMONG THE Jews: the Zealots (in Hebrew, Ka-na-im). These anti-Roman rebels were active for more than six decades, and later instigated the Great Revolt. Their most basic belief was that all means were justified to attain political and religious liberty.

The Jews' anti-Roman feelings were seriously exacerbated during the reign of the half-crazed emperor Caligula who, in the year 39, declared himself to be a deity and ordered his statue to be set up at every temple in the Roman Empire. The Jews, alone in the empire, refused the command; they would not defile God's Temple with a statue of pagan Rome's newest deity.

Caligula threatened to destroy the Temple, so a delegation of Jews was sent to pacify him. To no avail. Caligula raged at them, "So you are the enemies of the gods, the only people who refuse to recognize my divinity." Only the emperor's sudden, and violent death saved the Jews from wholesale massacre.

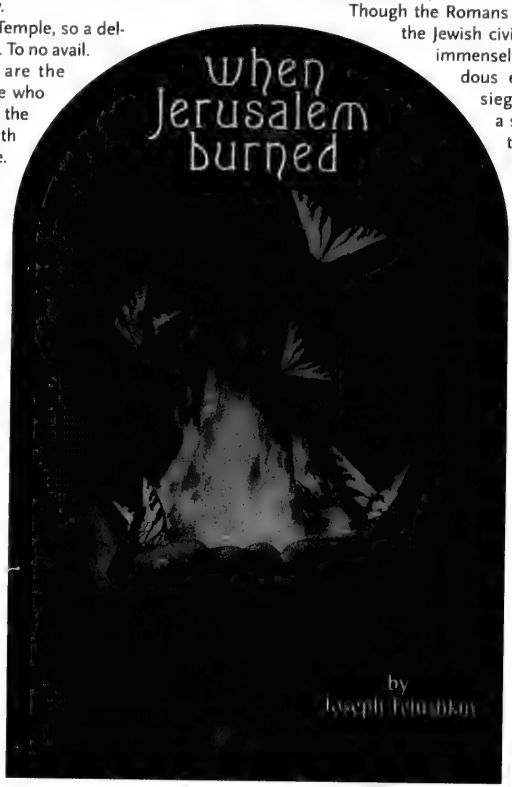
Caligula's action radicalized even the more moderate Jews. What assurance did they have, after all, that another Roman ruler would not arise and try to defile the Temple or destroy Judaism altogether? In addition, Caligula's sudden demise might have been interpreted as confirming the Zealots' belief that God would fight alongside the Jews if only they would have the courage to confront Rome.

In the decades after Caligula's death, Jews found their religion subject to periodic gross indignities, Roman soldiers exposing themselves in the Temple on one occasion and burning a Torah scroll on another.

Ultimately, the combination of financial exploitation, Rome's unbridled contempt for Judaism, and the unabashed favoritism that the Romans extended to gentiles living in Israel brought about the revolt.

In the year 66, Florus, the last Roman procurator, stole vast quantities of silver from the Temple. The outraged Jewish masses rioted and wiped out the small Roman garrison stationed in Jerusalem. Cestius Gallus, the Roman ruler in neighboring Syria, sent in a larger force of soldiers. But the Jewish insurgents routed them as well.

This was a heartening victory that had a terrible consequence: Many Jews suddenly became convinced that they could defeat Rome, and the Zealots' ranks grew geometrically. Never again, however, did the Jews achieve so decisive a victory.



When the Romans returned, they had 60,000 heavily armed and highly professional troops. They launched their first attack against the Jewish state's most radicalized area, the Galilee in the north. The Romans vanquished the Galilee, and an estimated 100,000 Jews were killed or sold into slavery.

Throughout the Roman conquest of this territory, the Jewish leadership in Jerusalem did almost nothing to help their beleaguered brothers. They apparently had concluded – too late, unfortunately – that the revolt could not be won, and wanted to hold down Jewish deaths as much as possible.

The highly embittered refugees who succeeded in escaping the Galilean massacres fled to the last major Jewish stronghold – Jerusalem. There, they killed anyone in the Jewish leadership who was not as radical as they. Thus, all the more moderate Jewish leaders who headed the Jewish government at the revolt's beginning in 66 were dead by 68 – and not one died at the hands of a Roman; all were killed by fellow Jews.

The scene was now set for the revolt's final catastrophe. Outside Jerusalem, Roman troops prepared to besiege the city; inside the city, the Jews were engaged in a suicidal civil war. In later generations, the rabbis hyperbolically declared that the revolt's failure and the Temple's destruction were due not to Roman military superiority but to causeless hatred (sinat khinam) among the Jews (Talmud, Yoma 9b).

Though the Romans would have won the war in any case, the Jewish civil war both hastened their victory and immensely increased the casualties. One horrendous example: In expectation of a Roman siege, Jerusalem's Jews had stockpiled a supply of dry food that could have fed the city for many years. But one of the warring Zealot factions burned the entire supply, apparently hoping that destroying this "security blanket" would compel everyone to participate in the revolt. The starvation resulting from this mad act caused suffering as great as any the Romans inflicted.

We do know that some great figures of ancient Israel opposed the revolt, most notably Rabbi Yochanan ben Zakkai. Since the Zealot leaders ordered the execution of anyone advocating surrender to Rome, Rabbi Yochanan arranged for his disciples to smuggle him out of Jerusalem, disguised as a corpse. Once safe, he personally surrendered to the Roman general Vespasian, who granted him concessions that allowed Jewish communal life to continue.

During the summer of 70, the Romans breached the walls of Jerusalem and initiated an orgy of violence and destruction. Shortly thereafter, they destroyed the Second Temple. This was the final and most devastating Roman blow against Judea.

It is estimated that as many as one million Jews died in the Great Revolt against Rome. When people today speak of the almost two-thousand-year span of Jewish homelessness and exile, they are dating it from the failure of the revolt and the destruction of the Temple. Indeed, the Great Revolt of 66-70, and the Bar-Kokhba revolt some sixty years later, were the greatest calamities in Jewish history prior to the Holocaust. In addition to more that one million Jews killed, these failed rebellions led to the total loss of Jewish political authority in Israel until 1948. This loss in itself exacerbated the magnitude of later Jewish catastrophes, since it precluded Israel from being used as a refuge for the large numbers of Jews fleeing persecutions elsewhere.

"While the Romans would have won the war in any case, the Jewish civil war both hastened their victory and immensely increased the casualties."

the mourning light
BY STEVEN WEIL
IT WAS THE SADDEST DAY OF THE YEAR.
I sat on the cold, hard floor with hundreds of fellow Jews, hungry, thirsty and unshaven. Together we mourned the destruction of Jerusalem: studying Lamentations, the haunting words of Jeremiah

the Prophet. For six straight hours we drowned ourselves in the Kinnot, poetic testimonies of those who witnessed the decimation of Jewish communities throughout the ages. The Crusades, the Inquisition, the Chemelnitzki massacres, the Pogroms, the Holocaust; they all stem from one calamity, the downfall of Jerusalem.

Just one week later, I stood with Mitch and Sue under the Chuppa. It was the happiest day of their lives, and I was helping them join together in marriage. He placed the ring on her finger, we read the Ketuba, and with joyous gratitude, friends and family members recited the seven blessings.

As the ceremony came to a close, the happiness was palpable and everybody was prepared to celebrate. But the excitement was momentarily and instantaneously shattered, as Mitch smashed his foot down and crushed the glass that had been lying there. The pile of shards and splinters that remained reminded us that no celebration is whole, no joy is complete as long as Jerusalem remains in a state of ruin.

Jerusalem, at the pinnacle of her glory, was the center of wisdom and Divine service. People from all over the world flocked to the Temple for the ultimate spiritual and intellectual experience. It was uplifting to hear the songs of the Levites, awe-inspiring to see the dignified stature of the Kohanim (Priests), and enlightening to sit in the gallery as the scholarly and creative educators of the Sanhedrin convened. A sense of unity prevailed among those lucky enough to make the pilgrimage and spend three times a year basking in God's presence. "If I forget thee O Jerusalem" cried King David. We are charged to keep Jerusalem at the forefront of our memory at our saddest and happiest moments.

Zachor, remembrance, is a powerful word to the Jews. Our holidays are celebrated to remember events that happened thousands of years ago. In the Jewish tradition, a yahrzeit, the anniversary of a death, has a special significance. It is an opportunity to remember someone who made an irreplaceable difference in our lives. How many Jews are there who do not attend prayer services regularly, but will not miss the four times a year that Yizkor, the memorial prayer, is recited? Zachor is the word that characterizes any commemoration of the most recent and devastating tragedy, the Holocaust. Remembering is crucial to the psyche of the Jewish people, but only because Judaism defines memory in a distinct and unique way.

"Breaking a glass at a wedding expresses the pain of a broken and incomplete people, a pain that haunts us even today and obstructs our ability to fully rejoice."

The Rav – Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik zt"l, a legal and philosophical giant of our generation – explains that the Jewish definition of memory is more than the mechanical reproduction of images and events that took place sometime in the past and have since been washed away in the tide of time. Remembrance is the resilience that enables us to preserve the experiences of history, be they joyous or tragic, so that they do not become a distant, clouded or meaningless memory. By keeping these experiences fresh and alive in our collective awareness, we can connect with and be influenced by people who lived and events that occurred tens, hundreds or thousands of years ago.

The experiences of our ancestors have remained with each successive generation, continually shaping our identity as a people. When we "remember" something from our past, we actually relive and re-experience it, for it affects us as acutely as it affected the generation that actually lived through these destiny-charged events.

When we remember Jerusalem, we remember her in this fashion. Breaking a glass at a wedding is not merely a symbolic or commemorative act. It is an act that expresses the pain of a broken and incomplete people, a pain that haunts us even today and obstructs our ability to fully rejoice. We do not just tell stories about Jerusalem each year on Tisha B'Av, we sit shiva, because the destruction of Jerusalem and the loss of its impact upon the world is as devastating to our generation as it was to those who were doomed to live through it.

Many people will attempt to revise history. They will say that the Holocaust never happened, or that the Temple never stood on that contested mountain in Jerusalem. Time and again, so-called scholars will try to convince us that the most significant events of our past are nothing but legends, uprooted from historical reality. But we know better. We refuse to let our past fade into oblivion, into some story that can be dismissed or rewritten.

The memories that we have collectively kept alive generation after generation have sustained us as a people, and have guaranteed that the turbulent journey of Jewish history has an ultimate and glorious destination. Remembering does not only preserve the past, it is a surety for the future. As Napoleon once said after passing by a synagogue on Tisha B'Av and watching in amazement as the Jews tearfully mourned Jerusalem: "I vow that this people is destined for a successful future in its own land, for where can we find a single other People which kept alive similar mourning and hope for thousands of years?"

THE QUESTION COMES AT SUKKOT and an answer comes at Chanukah: Does God need our help to bring redemption to the world? Do we wait for miracles, or do we help them along?

We are not the first to ask.

There is a debate in the Talmud between Rabbi Akiba, writing around 100 CE, and Rabbi Eliezer, his teacher, writing a few years earlier, a debate that has continued in the millennia since but that has become perhaps most acute in the last 100 years. It centers around the holiday of Sukkot, but it illuminates the entire conundrum regarding humanity's role in bringing redemption to the world.

Sukkot – the Feast of Tabernacles, right after Yom Kippur – is the holiday when we are commanded to dwell for seven days in fragile booths with roofs open enough to see the stars. This commemorates our exodus from Egypt, when we lived in small, light structures under God's protection while wandering in the desert for 40 years.

Rabbi Eliezer says that the sukkahs we build today are meant as reminders of the Clouds of Glory that accompanied us then. How miraculous was our lot in those days! Usually food comes from the ground; but the food – manna – fell from heaven. Usually we must build strong protections, but the cloud covered us all the time. We were sustained in a completely supernatural way, and this, Rabbi Eliezer argues, teaches us that when we do God's will, God will do for Israel in a way that is entirely miraculous.

Rabbi Akiba says absolutely not. Rather, we must do our own share and pave the way for God to bring in His great miracles. We have to use nature – we had to build our own booths and then God helped us. Only then did He bring in all the rest of the miracles: the manna, the clothes that never wore out and that grew with the children so they would never be cold.

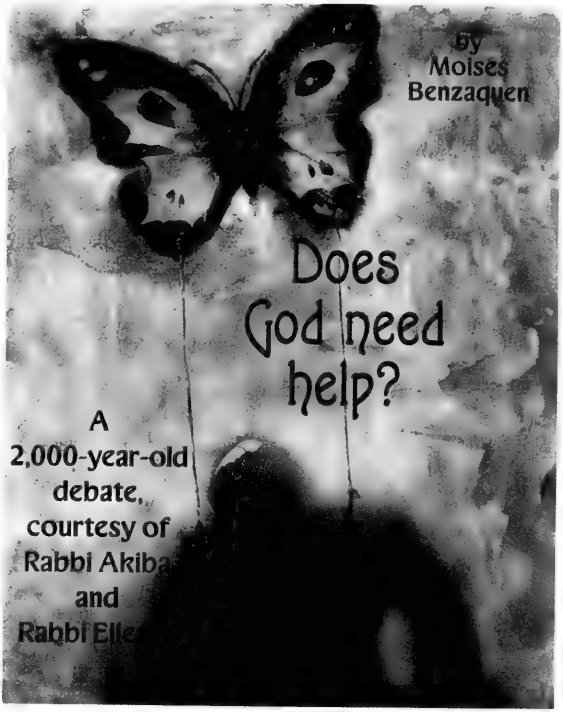
This dispute, it seems, has gone on for centuries, never resolved in our holy texts and responsa, never decided in favor of one camp or the other. In fact, today it has grown even more heated.

For there is the matter of the state of Israel. Do we build it ourselves, like a sukkah in the desert for God's miracles to enter? Or do we just study and do mitzvot, and wait for God's Kingdom to arrive by His grace?

An important proponent of Rabbi Akiba's view was HaRav Abraham Isaac Kook, the first Ashkenazic chief rabbi of Israel. Rav Kook was a builder. He not only praised but encouraged any Jew to come to Israel and build it, whether they were religious, atheist, nationalist or just a refugee. Everyone was bringing something favorable, he said; even if they were not religiously observant, they were fulfilling a unique mitzvah, and that mitzvah was to build the land, whatever their reason. They were building the sukkah – the frail structure which, like all our structures and all our lives, could ultimately be supported only by God's grace. But they must build it for Him to enter.

There is another religious viewpoint about Israel, which is that redemption from God will come only through miraculous, supernatural means. We have to sit down, do God's will and learn and study and pray and do mitzvot and let God do the rest. The purpose of the Torah, they say, is for us to sit and study it for its own sake – and that's what each and every Jew should do.

I don't think that they are wrong. But I think that they are not practical. Because most human beings are not made to sit and study all day long. There are a lot of people who want to do other things, and God made them too. As a matter of fact, the tribes of Israel were divided in just such a manner: some were sent to the seashore so they could be fishermen; some were agricultural and tended to the land. The tribe of Issachar was meant to study, and the Levites were the priests.



"A proponent of Rabbi Akiba's view was Rav Kook, who not only praised but encouraged any Jew to come to Israel and build it, whether they were religious, atheist, nationalist or just a refugee."

And indeed, the law goes mostly according to Rabbi Akiba – that each person, according to his or her own God-given gifts, must do their part. We have to start the process; we have to help ourselves.

God's ways are obviously unknown to us, and no one knows how full redemption will come. But the story of Chanukah, set in the Holy City of Jerusalem, holds a clue.

When the moment came to rededicate the Holy Temple after the Assyrian desecration in 165 BCE, there was only enough pure oil available to last one day. The temple light is supposed to burn eternally, and it would take eight days to make new pure oil. Should they wait, they wondered, for a steady supply of oil, or light the menorah only to watch it flicker out?

The Maccabees decided to light: Let us do the mitzvah that is in our hands to do, they said, which is to sanctify the Temple today, using the oil that we have.

And God provided the miracle: one cruse of oil lasted all eight days until new oil was prepared.

In the Talmud it says: "Please, My children, open for Me a door like the eye of a needle and I will open it as the doors of a palace." God wants us to get involved. We have to begin the process. And the process is in settling the land and building on it, creating a state, building Jerusalem.

The outcome is in His hands. But while we wait – while we study, pray and do every mitzvah and act of kindness that we can – we must make sure that when God is ready to enter His holy Sukkah, in our lives and in our world it will be ready. And when He is ready to keep the flame eternally alive, it will already be lit.

I first went to Jerusalem three weeks after the Six Day War in 1967. I was just under 19 years old. For a Jewish boy from the New York yeshiva world, one who moreover also attended Zionist summer camps in Pennsylvania's Pocono Mountains, the experience was, not surprisingly, overwhelming. It is difficult to separate the power of Israel, the power of that uniquely heady time in Jewish history, and the power of Jerusalem. Each merged into the other to create a permanent impact on Jews such as myself.

So deep was the impact, in fact, that I was certain that I would one day in the not too distant future make aliyah (live in the Jewish state). Indeed, three years later, after graduating from college, I applied to and was accepted by the Hebrew University in Jerusalem to study for a Masters Degree at its Institute on Contemporary Jewry.

For various reasons, I enrolled instead at Columbia University, at its School of International Affairs, and consequently ended up staying in America. That decision came to be one of those life-shaping forks in the road that all of us at some point experience. Had Columbia not accepted me, this American patriot might well have ended up being an Israeli.

Such was – and is – the power of Jerusalem.

It is not some romantic or religious ideology that leads me to say that there is no place on earth like Jerusalem. It is an incontrovertible fact. We Jews have bequeathed to the world a Bible, a God, the Ten Commandments, and much more. But all these are portable. Jerusalem is the one fixed, physical gift we have given to the world. And what a gift – the site of the Jews' Holy Temples, the central site of Christianity's origins, and the place from which Muslims believe that Muhammad ascended to heaven.

I am no ethnic chauvinist. In fact, I am more of a religious Jew than an ethnic one. But the truth is the truth. There is no parallel to the Jews' gift of Jerusalem to humanity – most particularly to its daughter religions, Christianity and Islam. Though not all Christians and very few contemporary Muslims will acknowledge it, the significance of Jerusalem, its unique power to touch the soul of the Jew, the Christian, and the Muslim is, in the final analysis, a profound verification of the power of the Jews in history. The Jews and their Bible declared Jerusalem holy, and much of humanity has decided that this is, in fact, the truth.

Given the widespread identification of men's souls with Jerusalem, one could say that God has chosen a spot on earth to meet us humans. Of course, God can be encountered anywhere on earth, and for that matter, anywhere outside of earth. But the love affair between God and humanity seems to have focused itself in this place called Jerusalem. That is why a Jew feels different in Jerusalem than in Tel-Aviv or Haifa, as much as he or she loves those and other Israeli cities (indeed, I would choose to live in one of those cities if I were to live in Israel). And that is why the Christian feels different in Jerusalem than in Bethlehem, the very birthplace of Jesus, and certainly feels different than when in Rome, the historic center of Christendom since the time of Emperor Constantine, and the seat of the Vatican. And that is why Muslims have named only Jerusalem Al-Quds, "The Holy," though Mecca and Medina are of greater theological significance.

Neurologists now tell us that the brain is actually programmed to encounter God, that we are literally designed to relate to a Supreme Being. It seems, therefore, that when God designed a place in the brain to encounter Him, He also designed a place in the world to encounter Him – Yerushalayim, the holiest city in the holiest land.

FRIDAY NIGHT, EREV SHABBAT, IS A SPECIAL NIGHT for practicing Jews of every denomination in almost every country of the world. But Friday night at the Kotel, the Western Wall in Jerusalem, has a spiritual dimension and grandeur which is like nowhere else. A few months ago my Kala, my new bride, Nina, and I returned from an eight-month visit to the Holy Land where we spent most Friday nights dancing and singing with hundreds of other Jews under the Jerusalem skies in this holiest of places. I say we "returned," but that isn't quite accurate. Let me explain.

For the last 30-plus years I have been training or working almost non-stop, the way we do in America, as a physician and scientist. In 1985 I accepted the position of medical director of a world-renowned nutrition company, traveling more than 100 days per year and speaking to international audiences often numbering in the thousands.

In 1996, quite suddenly my life began to change. I found my work with all its travel and fame less and less stimulating, and something deep within me called out for expression. I started to explore my Jewish roots and became more observant. By the summer of 1999, it was time for a break. I began disengaging myself from work, and in the spring of 2000, my fiancée and I decided to go to Israel to get married and to heed the ancient, ancestral call that has beckoned Jews for millennia.

Nothing in America, particularly in Los Angeles, can prepare you for life in Israel. Living in Israel is not like visiting Israel. By American standards life is "hard." The people seem gruff. The country and way of life, though Western, are clearly foreign, more Middle Eastern or southern Mediterranean. America may be a melting pot, but Israel is boiling. The country is small and the hostility of the Arab world beats a steady rhythm in your consciousness. The clash, often conflict, of Ashkenazi vs. Sephardi, vs. Chassidic, vs. non-religious Zionist parts of the Jewish population is shocking to Americans. But this is only the surface level of Israel, not the real Israel. The real Israel, particularly Jerusalem, is spiritual. Its effect on the Jewish soul is deep, constant, eternal and transforming.

Nina and I were married under the Jerusalem stars within sight of the wall of the Old City. The reception began at dusk as the setting sun turned the Jerusalem stone a deep pink and went on long into the night with dancing and singing and a joy unlike any other I have ever known. We rented an apartment just outside the Jaffa Gate, the entrance to the Jewish Quarter of the Old City used by Jews for 500 years, and quickly adapted to life in the Holy City. We had come to study and experience the culture, and the opportunities to study and learn in Jerusalem are enormous.

"America may be a melting pot, but Israel is boiling."

Everyday life, on the other hand, was quite difficult at first, mainly because of the cultural differences and our poor language skills – our Hebrew was rudimentary and no, everyone doesn't speak English, especially once you leave the hotels. Things did improve with time, but nothing about Israeli life was ever easy. America is easy. Israel is difficult – but meaningful. In fact, everything in Israel seems filled with a deeper meaning and significance, including the most mundane activities like shopping, dining and socializing. What is lacking in material trappings and comfort is more than compensated for by a spiritual richness that pervades every aspect of life in an almost physically palpable way.

It is remarkable how easy it is to be "Jewish" in Israel, especially Jerusalem. The majority of restaurants are kosher, and the variety of cuisines is enough for even finicky palates: Chinese, Japanese, Thai, Russian, Italian – everything! The markets stock only kosher food – no need to check labels, everything is kosher. In fact everything is Jewish. There was once a silly song: When you're in love the whole world is Jewish. Well, in Jerusalem it seems like almost everything is. It is an amazing experience for a Jew from America – where "Jewish communities" are subsets of a larger non-Jewish culture – to be submerged in a culture that is predominantly Jewish, both socially and religiously.

The rhythms of Jerusalem life are tuned to the Jewish clock, with its weekly, monthly and yearly cycles. The week builds up to Shabbat, and for those who are fortunate, Kabbalat Shabbat, the welcoming of Shabbat at the Kotel. When Sukkot arrives, there are sukkas literally everywhere. At Chanukah, menorahs light up windows for miles, and giant electric menorahs even decorate the wall of the Old City for all to see. "Jewish pride" is not just a slogan in Israel, it is a reality. And little by little this deep, abiding feeling of spiritual Judaism fills and nurtures the soul. Despite all the difficulties and contradictions in the outside world, I felt complete inside and connected to a profound sense of self.

After eight months, it was time to leave and return to America. In Israel you don't say "leave" Israel, you say "come down" from Israel. Going to Israel – actually the term is "going up" – is a culture shock, but coming back is also a culture shock. The size, ease and material comfort of America is strange at first but easy to adjust to.

For now, it's clear that America is our home and our work is here. But after living in Israel, life in America is forever changed, for the reality of Israel as a homeland, if not a home, is always with us. It is a piece of our soul that is still dancing every Friday night, at the Kotel, patiently awaiting our return.

David B. Katzin, M.D., Ph.D., is a physician and scientist who lives in LA with his wife Nina and has one daughter, Erica. Dr. Katzin recently retired as Medical Director of Herbalife International, and divides his time between Jewish studies, public speaking and working for Jewish philanthropic causes.

THE BIBLE CALLS ISRAEL THE "NAVEL OF THE EARTH." It's almost as if this was the place where some kind of birth nurture was given to the human race, and I do believe that it is the place of our spiritual enlightenment – where God revealed His plan and purposes for mankind. He revealed the law to His servants; He revealed His word to His prophets; and He revealed the revelation dealing with the latter days to those who became Christians. Therefore, this is the key place for about two billion Christians in the world, and however many Jewish people in the world, and hundreds of millions of Moslems who make some claim to this city.

But more than that, a spiritual struggle goes on concerning Jerusalem. It transcends politics. It transcends the beauty of archaeology – there are many beautiful archaeological sites around the world that don't bring up the same intensity and passion that Jerusalem does. I believe this is the place where God put His seal and He has continued to watch over it like the apple of His eye.

I grew up in a home where my mother took very seriously the biblical mandate given to Abraham: "I will bless those who bless you and curse those who curse you." She instructed me to always care for and love the Jewish people. I don't agree with the idea that somehow the Christian Church has replaced Israel in the plan of God or that the literal Israel is no longer significant. I think there are too many references in the Old Testament – in the biblical narrative – that speak of the return of the Jews to Israel, the rebuilding of the nation, the desert blossoming like a rose. All these things are clearly forecast and they deal with a literal Israel in a literal land. I do not believe that it is spiritualized, nor do I believe that the church has replaced that link between God, the land of Israel and the people of Israel. The church has its role and Israel has its role.

In my opinion, Israel's role is to possess the land that was given to Abraham and passed later to David and to Solomon, and that includes what my friend Menachem Begin used to call "Judea and Samaria." And certainly the city of Jerusalem must remain under Israeli sovereignty.

Now back in 586 BC, Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon invaded Jerusalem. From that time until 1967, Jerusalem was under the heel of various gentile powers: the Romans, the Greeks, the Turks, the British, or whoever. It wasn't until 1967 and the Six Day War that the State of Israel took back East Jerusalem. To Evangelicals, this was a very significant moment. And in our opinion, to give up that part of the city of Jerusalem would be a desecration that would be unthinkable: namely, the breaking of a solemn prophecy that has come to pass in our own lifetime.

"I don't agree with the idea that somehow the Christian Church has replaced Israel in the plan of God or that the literal Israel is no longer significant."

It seems to me that since the Six Day War we have seen increasing turmoil in the world. The nations are in flux. We have seen the fall of communism. We've seen a great spiritual revival among the nations of the world. But at the same time there is a sense of impending doom that kind of hovers over people. We talk about nuclear holocaust. We talk about biological warfare. Some even talk about the possibility of a strike at the earth from asteroids. People are thinking about a sort of ultimate time. The way I read prophecy in this context is that we are in the 40 years at the end of the gentile domination and also the revelation of God to the gentile people. There has been a great revelation over the years to the gentile people, but in my opinion that revelation is now coming back to Israel.

I think the Jewish people are going to begin to see their God – the God of the Bible, who is their protector, who brought them out of Egypt, who gave them the law, who has looked after them over these many years and who has now brought them back into their land.

The Messiah will not return in Milan, or Paris, or London, or Washington, or any other city or world capital. He will come to Jerusalem, and the attention of the nations will be drawn more and more to Israel. Those of us who are broadcasters, and especially those of us who are sensitive to religious views, have to enhance our news presence in Israel and be in position to offer more reports from Jerusalem through which the world can view events in Israel and the Middle East. That is why the Christian Broadcasting Network has set up a full news bureau in Jerusalem this year.

America's Christians understand that we are connected by the same spiritual roots that go back to the revelation of God to Abraham, and no amount of propaganda is going to shake that. I have wondered why the public relations regarding Israel that is emanating from the American Jewish community is so weak in relation to the representation of Jewish people in such disciplines. The passion we share – media – is not used for Israel or a Jewish story. The Jewish community has the experts – they should be instructing me!

My message to the Jewish people is that you have friends who are supporting you, who love you and who care about helping you with your struggle. They are working under intense pressure and are on your side in order to end that struggle in peaceful ways.

And my prayer for you is this: that you not be afraid of world opinion, but that you take the steps necessary for the safety of your families and your future – and your spirituality. May God grant you success in this, and peace in Jerusalem and in the entire world.

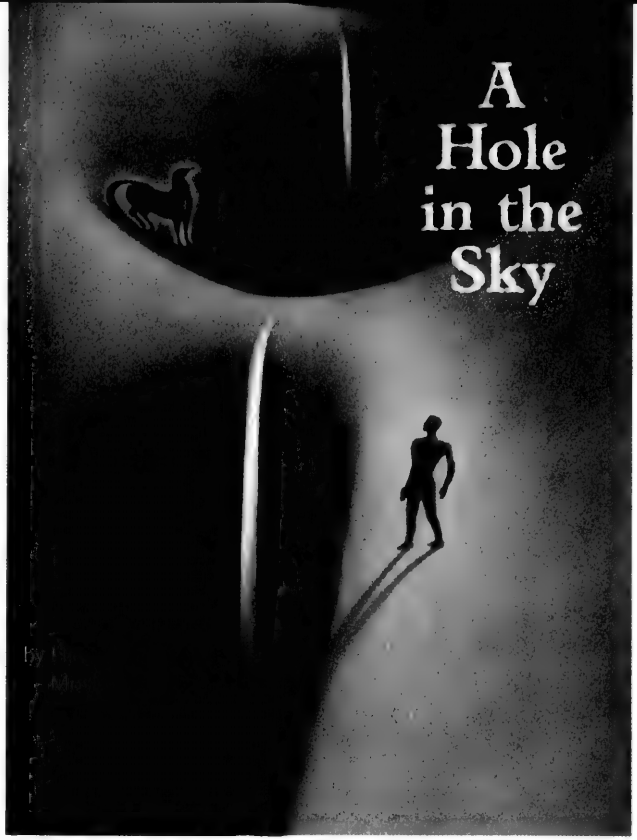
A Hole in the Sky



NEARLY 3,000 YEARS ago, when King Solomon reigned in Jerusalem, the capital of Israel, there was peace in the land, and the leaders of the world came to learn from his legendary wisdom. Three millennia later, the world's leaders are occupied with seemingly intractable political and religious problems involving this same city. It is as if at some level of their consciousness they know that Jerusalem is the only place in the world where these problems can be solved. And indeed, perhaps it is.

Kabbalah, the ancient, inner wisdom of Jewish tradition, teaches about the higher waters and the lower waters, the higher waters representing the spiritual world while the lower waters are the material world of our ordinary reality. They are separated by the rakiah, the firmament – a cosmic membrane that controls what comes down from the spiritual worlds to the material world and what goes up from the material world into heaven.

The Kabbalah, in the book of Zohar, tells us that above the city of Jerusalem, "...there is a hole (in the rakiah) that is called the Gevilon ... and through this opening a path extends from the earth up to the High Throne of the Almighty and to all four corners of the land of Israel." The Gevilon is a one-of-a-kind highway connecting the higher worlds with the lower worlds; it is taught that when we go to sleep, our souls go back to the higher worlds through the Gevilon to replenish their strength.

"The Kabbalah tells us that above the city of Jerusalem, there is a hole that is called the Gevilon, and through this opening a path extends from the earth up to the High Throne of the Almighty."

We are thus all bound to Jerusalem, and not only through its rich history but through our souls today. Because while it is possible to reach the higher realms from anywhere in the world, Jerusalem provides the point of transit for any such ascent. Jerusalem is a kind of doorway, which exists in the higher and the lower worlds at the same time.

What is this doorway like? What are its qualities? And how can it hold the keys to peace in our time?

The Hebrew name of Jerusalem is Yerushalayim, which means in part shalem, whole or complete, and shalom, peace. The wholeness of Jerusalem arises from its location just below the Gevilon. If one looks up while standing next to the Western Wall, a remnant of the Second Temple, it is hard to avoid the feeling that the sky above is a bit thinner than anywhere else in the world.

People of all religions pour out their hearts onto little pieces of paper they then leave in the crevices of the Wall. Their souls must know that their requests from there go straight to the High Throne, through the Gevilon.

Solomon's great wisdom, which was enthroned in Jerusalem, stemmed from his ability to bring together spiritual and material knowledge – not surprising since his throne sat beneath the Gevilon itself. The throne was a mechanical wonder and on it he meditated on the relationship between Divine wisdom, as embodied in the Torah, and the sciences. Torah, King Solomon knew, is meant to enlighten the sciences with the power of faith and belief, while the sciences are meant to uncover new Torah secrets.

Jerusalem contains today the same wisdom that unites the divine with the material, and it is this wisdom which has the power to help solve the world's seemingly intractable political and religious problems. It is not surprising that so many of these problems actually concern Jerusalem, because Jerusalem is like a hospital where all ills are healed. To those who don't see the healing potential within its walls, a hospital may seem hopelessly filled with sickness and despair. But the presence of the very people who require healing tells us where the healing power resides.

And the violence that is engulfing the world, pouring out into the streets of New York and Jerusalem, is all from the same dark source: a source that fails to answer G-d's request in Deuteronomy 30:19 – "I have set before thee life and death ... choose life" – by instead sowing destruction and death. The answer to that darkness, too, is in the light of Jerusalem, as sung by the psalmist: "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem, those who love you will be serene...." (Psalm 122)

Peace in our minds, and peace in our hearts, will come from Jerusalem, which retains within its walls and in its sacred, divinely connected space the secrets of the wisdom that can unify the opposing forces of conflict. Arrayed in the Gevilon, Jerusalem has the power to harness the will of humanity to work as one under G-d. Jerusalem contains shalom and shalem, a whole peace that is a complete peace.

"It shall come to pass," wrote Isaiah in Chapter 2 of his great prophecy, "that the mountain of G-d's house shall be established [in Jerusalem] as the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; And all nations shall flow unto it, and many peoples ... And He will teach us of His ways, and we will walk in His paths. For out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. He will judge among the nations, and settle the arguments of many peoples."

WHY, WHEN THE WORLD WAS CREATED, did God create just one man, Adam, and one woman, Eve? The rabbis answered: so that all humankind would come from a single union, to teach us that we are all brothers and sisters.

This Conference was dedicated to that simple proposition. We, all of us, have a common lineage, and are all, irrespective of race, religion or gender, created in the divine image. Indeed, this single idea, unknown to all other ancient civilizations, may be the greatest gift that the Jewish people have given to the world, the recognition of the equality and dignity of every human being.

The foremost right that follows from this principle is the right to be free, not to be a slave. It is imperative that the international community address and duly acknowledge, already far too late, the magnitude of the tragedy of slavery.

The horror of slavery is profoundly engraved in the experience of the Jewish people – a people formed in slavery. For hundreds of years the children of Israel were enslaved in Egypt until, as the Book of Exodus recounts, the call, 'Let my people go,' heralded the first national liberation movement in history, and the model for every liberation that was to follow.

The Jewish response to slavery was remarkable. Rather than forget or sublimate the suffering of slavery, Jewish tradition insisted that every Jew must remember and relive it. And to this day, on Passover, every Jewish family reenacts the experience of slavery, eats the bread of affliction, and appreciates once again the taste of freedom. Through the ages of our exile this psychodrama has had a profound impact on the Jewish psyche: making sure that every child born into comfort knows the pains of oppression, and every child born into oppression knows the hope of redemption.

But remembrance of our suffering as slaves has a more important function – to remind ourselves of our moral obligations. The experience of oppression brings no privilege, but rather responsibility. We have a responsibility to protect the weak, the widow and the orphan and the stranger, because as the Bible says: "You yourselves were strangers in the land of Egypt." Even God, in the first and most fundamental of the Ten Commandments, identifies Himself not as "Creator of the World" or "Splitter of the Red Sea", but as "the One who freed you from slavery".

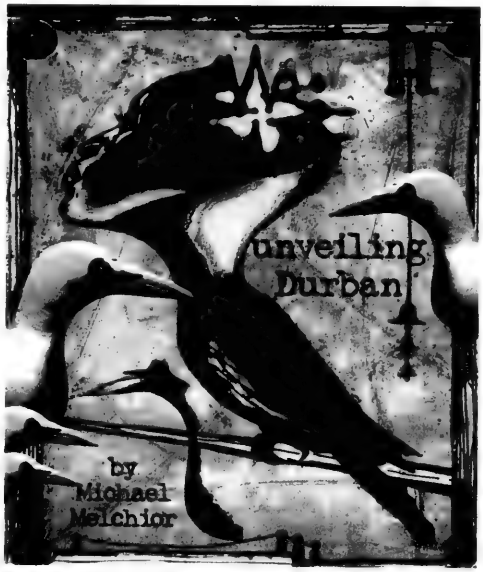
And indeed in every country in which they have lived, Jews have been in the forefront of the battle for human rights and freedom from oppression. The same urge for national liberation that led to the Exodus and that led to the Zionist dream that Jews could live in freedom in their land, was intrinsically bound up with the belief that not just one people but all peoples must be free. It was this conviction that Theodor Herzl, the founder of the Zionist movement, expressed in his book Altneuland, as early as 1902:

"There is still one problem of racial misfortune unsolved. The depths of that problem only a Jew can comprehend. I refer to the problem of the Blacks. Just call to mind all those terrible episodes of the slave trade, of human beings who, merely because they were black, were stolen like cattle, taken prisoner, captured and sold. Their children grew up in strange lands, the object of contempt and hostility because their complexion was different. I am not ashamed to say, though I may expose myself to ridicule for doing so, that once I have witnessed the redemption of Israel, my people, I wish to assist the redemption of the Black people."

As Herzl understood, remembrance of slavery is integral to the Jewish experience. A Jew cannot be truly free if he or she does not have compassion for those who are enslaved.

If slavery is one form of racist atrocity, antisemitism is another. And by antisemitism, let us be clear, we mean the hatred of Jews. The word antisemitism was deliberately coined in 1879 by Wilhelm Marr, an anti-Jewish racist in Germany, to replace the term judenhass, Jew-hatred, which had gone out of favor. It has always, and only, been used to describe hatred and discrimination directed at Jews. Attempts to eradicate the plain meaning of the word are not only antisemitic, indeed they are anti-semantic.

Those uncomfortable recognizing the existence of antisemitism not only try to redefine the term, they try to deny that it is different from any other form of discrimination. But it is a unique form of hatred. It is directed at those of particular birth, irrespective of their faith, and those of particular faith, irrespective of their birth. It is the oldest and most persistent form of group hatred. In our century this ultimate hatred has led to the ultimate crime, the Holocaust.



But antisemitism goes far beyond hatred of Jews. It has arisen where Jews have never lived, and survives where only Jewish cemeteries remain. And while Jews may be the first to suffer from its influence, they have rarely been the last.

Antisemitism reveals the inner corruption of a society, because at its root it is fueled by a rejection of the humane and moral values the Jewish people bequeathed to the world. As Anne Frank, the Jewish schoolgirl in hiding from the Nazis in occupied Amsterdam, wrote in her diary:

"If we bear all this suffering and if there are still Jews left when it is over, then Jews, instead of being doomed, will be held up as an example. Who knows, it might even be our religion from which the world and all peoples learn good, and for that reason only do we now suffer."

Anne Frank was murdered by the Nazis in Bergen-Belsen for being a Jew, just one of over one million Jewish children to be killed in the Holocaust.

Those who cannot bring themselves to recognize the unique evil of antisemitism similarly cannot accept the stark fact of the Holocaust, the first systematic attempt to destroy an entire people. The past decade has witnessed an alarming increase in attempts to deny the simple fact of this atrocity, at the very time that the Holocaust is passing from living memory to history. After wiping out six million Jewish lives, there are those who would wipe out their deaths. At this Conference too, we have witnessed a vile attempt to generalize and pluralize the word 'Holocaust', and to empty it of its meaning as a reference to a specific historic event with a clear and vital message for all humanity.

Could there be anything worse than to brutally, systematically annihilate a people; to take the proud Jews of Vilna, Warsaw, Minsk, Lodz; to burn their holy books, to steal their dignity, their freedom, their hair, their teeth; to turn them into numbers, slaves and the ashes of Auschwitz, Treblinka, Majdanek and Dachau? Could anything be worse than this? The answer is yes, there is something even worse: to do such a thing, and then to deny it, to trivialize it, to take from the mourners, the children and the grandchildren, the legitimacy of their grief, and from all humanity the urgent lesson that might stop it from happening again.

The 20th century, which witnessed the atrocities of the Holocaust, also witnessed the fulfillment of the Zionist dream, the reestablishment of a Jewish state in Israel's historic land. For Zionism is quite simply that – the national movement of the Jewish people, based on an unbroken connection going back some 4,000 years, between the People of the Book and the Land of the Bible. The national liberation movement of the Jewish people is like the liberation movements of Africa and Asia. It is a movement of which other national liberation movements can be justly proud. It has strived continually to establish a society that reflects the highest ideals of democracy and justice for all its inhabitants, a society in which Jew and Arab can live together, in which women and men have equal rights, in which there is freedom of thought and expression, and in which all have access to the judicial process to ensure these rights are protected.

The aspiration to build such a society was enshrined from the outset in Israel's Declaration of Independence:

"The State of Israel ... will foster the development of the country for the benefit of all its inhabitants; it will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants, irrespective of creed, race or gender; it will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, language, education and culture."

It is a tall task. It is a constant struggle. And we do not always succeed. But, even in the face of the open hostility of its neighbors and continued threats to its existence, there are few countries that have made such efforts to realize such a vision. Few countries of Israel's age and size have welcomed immigrants of all colors and tongues from over one hundred countries, sent medical aid and disaster relief to alleviate human tragedy wherever it strikes, maintained a free press, including the freest Arabic press anywhere in the Middle East.

And yet those who cannot bring themselves to say the words "the Holocaust" or to recognize anti-semitism for the evil that it is, would have us condemn the "racist practices of Zionism". Did any one of those Arab states that conceived this obscenity stop for one moment to consider their own record? Or to think, for that matter, of the situation of the Jews and other minorities in their own countries?

These states would have us believe that they are anti-Zionist, not antisemitic, but again and again this lie is disproved. What are the despicable caricatures of Jews that fill the Arab press and are being circulated at this Conference? What are the vicious libels so freely invented and disseminated by our enemies – about the use of poison gas, or depleted uranium bullets, or injecting babies with the Aids virus – if not the reincarnation of age-old antisemitic canards?

To criticize policies of the Government of Israel – or of any country – is legitimate, even vital; indeed as a democratic state many Israelis do just that. But there is a profound difference between criticizing a country and denying its right to exist. Anti-Zionism, the denial of Jews the basic right to a home, is nothing but antisemitism, pure and simple. As Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. wrote: "You declare, my friend, that you do not hate the Jews, you are merely 'anti-Zionist.' And I say, let the truth ring forth from the high mountain tops. Let it echo through the valleys of God's green earth: When people criticize Zionism they mean Jews... Zionism is nothing less than the dream and ideal of the Jewish people returning to live in their own land... And what is anti-Zionism? It is the denial to the Jew of the fundamental right that we justly claim for the people of Africa and freely accord to all other nations of the globe. It is discrimination against Jews because they are Jews. In short it is antisemitism."

The venal hatred of Jews that has taken the form of anti-Zionism, and which has surfaced at this Conference, is, however, different in one crucial way from the anti-semitism of the past. Today it is being deliberately propagated and manipulated for political ends. Children are not born as racists, racism is a result of lack of education and political manipulation. And today generations of Palestinian children are being deliberately and systematically indoctrinated, with textbooks stained with blood libels, and children's television programs dripping with hatred. This high-risk strategy is bound to fail, but it will exact a heavy price.

> "The Jewish response to slavery was remarkable. Rather than forget or sublimate the suffering of slavery, Jewish tradition insisted that every Jew must remember and relive it."

The conflict between us and our Palestinian neighbors is not racial, and has no place at this Conference. It is political and territorial, and as such can and should be resolved to end the suffering and bring peace and security to the Israeli and Palestinian peoples. The path towards such a resolution is clear: an immediate cessation of violence and terror and a return to negotiations as recommended by the Mitchell Committee Report, which both parties have accepted. The outrageous and manic accusations we have heard here are attempts to turn a political issue into a racial one, with almost no hope of resolution.

Barely a year ago, at Camp David, the Israeli Government demonstrated its deep commitment to peace by offering our Palestinian neighbors far-reaching compromises. These compromises, you will recall, were applauded by the entire international community. But the Palestinians did not accept these proposals, nor did they put forward any compromise proposals of their own. To our deep dismay they responded with a wave of violence. Over the past year this violence has escalated into protracted and inhuman attacks on the Israeli civilian population, forcing Israel to assume a role we abhor, defending our citizens by military means, which we had hoped and prayed would be relegated to the past.

I will not refer here to the disappointing statement we have heard from the head of the Palestinian Authority. Rather than use this vital forum to inspire his own people, and the people of the world, to seek peace, honor and harmony, he chose to use this podium to incite bitterness and hatred. Another missed opportunity by the leader of the Palestinian people.

My own cousins, two little daughters and their brother, lost their legs only a few weeks ago in a terrorist attack on a bus carrying children to school. Many Palestinian children have likewise been wounded for life. The vicious libels, the delegitimization and dehumanization we have heard at this Conference, will do nothing to prevent more Israeli and Palestinian mothers and fathers bringing their young ones to their graves.

But here today, something greater even than peace in the Middle East is being sacrificed – the highest values of humanity. Racism, in all its forms, is one of the most widespread and pernicious evils, depriving millions of hope and fundamental rights. It might have been hoped that this first Conference of the 21st century would have taken up the challenge of, if not eradicating racism, at least disarming it. But instead, humanity is being sacrificed to a political agenda. Barely a decade after the UN repealed the infamous "Zionism is Racism" resolution, which Secretary General Kofi Annan described, with characteristic understatement, as a "low point" in the history of the United Nations, a group of states, for whom the terms "racism", "discrimination", and even "human rights" simply do not appear in their domestic lexicon, have hijacked this Conference and plunged us to even greater depths.

Can there be a greater irony than the fact that a conference convened to combat the scourge of racism should give rise to the most racist declaration in a major international organization since the Second World War?

Despite the vicious anti-semitism we have heard here, I do not fear for the Jewish people, which has learned to be resilient and to hold fast to its faith.

Despite the virulent incitement against my country, I do not fear for Israel, which has the strength not just of courage but also of conviction.

But I do fear, deeply, for the victims of racism. For the slaves, the disenfranchised, the oppressed, the inexplicably hated, the impoverished, the despised, the millions who turn their eyes to this hall, in the frail hope that it may address their suffering. And who see instead that a blind and venal hatred of the Jews has turned their hopes into a farce. For them I fear.

We are here as representatives of states, and states of their nature have political interests and agendas. But we are also human beings, all of us brothers and sisters created in the divine image. And in those quiet moments when we recognize our common humanity, and look into our soul, let us consider what we came here to do – and what we have in fact done:

We came to learn from our history, but we find it being buried to hide its lessons. We came to communicate in the language of humanity, but we hear its vocabulary twisted beyond all comprehension. We came out of respect for the sacred values entrusted to us, but see them here perverted for political ends.

And ultimately, we came to serve the victims of racism, but have witnessed yet another atrocity, committed in their name.

"Return again, return again, return to the land of your soul. Return to who you are, return to what you are, born and reborn again." – Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach

TAKE TEN BREATHS AND WALK WITH ME THROUGH THE LAYERS OF OUR LIVES: three thousand years of shared spiritual experience, carved into the stones of the holy city of Jerusalem. Feel the joy of coming home. Reach into yourself and find the part of you that was here before. Prepare yourself to receive this gift – Jerusalem, the center of our spiritual collective consciousness.

Breathe deeply as you enter the ancient walls of the old city through the Jaffa Gate. We pause at #6 Or HaChayim Street, site of the Reb Attar synagogue. This was the birthplace of the Arizal, in 1534. One of his greatest teachings is that each of us has lived many lifetimes in Jerusalem; we keep returning to heal ourselves and fulfill our people's destiny. So we have been in Jerusalem during many different lifetimes, and that is what we will experience today.

With this in mind, we transcend space and time and move 100 yards down the street to another world, the era of the First Temple. Within minutes, we have traversed back through 2,200 years of history. The year is now 701 BCE.

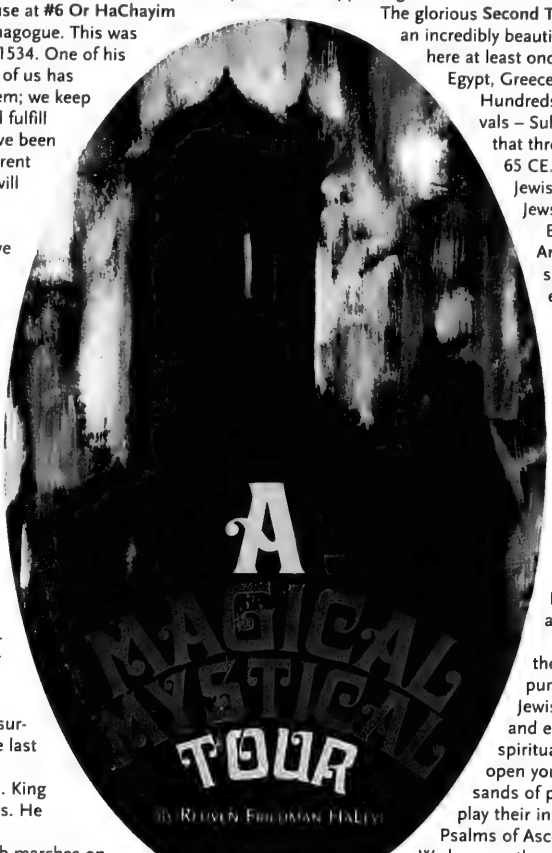
We are standing in front of a remnant of the northern wall around Jerusalem. Today it lies below the sidewalk, below layers of civilization, but once it stood as a mighty fortification, 20 feet wide and 25 feet high. This wall and G-d spared our ancestors from annihilation.

You are there. Experience the panic and fear as we are threatened by an implacable foe. Our brethren in the ten northern tribes have been sent into Assyrian exile. We are the only survivors, a small remnant and the last Jews left on earth. Our king is Hezekiah, our prophet is Isaiah. King Hezekiah will fight the Assyrians. He builds this defensive wall.

The Assyrian King Sennacherib marches on Jerusalem. All 46 major cities of Judea are destroyed, exiling 200,000 more Jews. We must survive. Assyrian general Rabshakeh shouts: "Surrender or die. If you surrender, we will send you to a nice country with vineyards and wheat. How can you stand against us? Nobody else has!"

We go to seek the advice of our Isaiah. As we tremble and pray, he prophesies: "Not an arrow will enter Jerusalem." That Passover night, in joy mixed with fear; we ascend to the Holy Temple. We are surrounded. This might be our last meal. Feel the pain and the faith. Know what it is to be clinging to the last hope for your survival. Pray as you have never prayed before. Know that only G-d can save you.

That night a plague breaks out in the Assyrian camp; 185,000 officers die. Open your heart; imagine arising on Pesach morning to see the Assyrian army defeated. Stand here in the Jerusalem light and experience for a few moments the exhilaration of having survived, the overpowering gratitude to G-d. We are the smallest number of Jews left since Jacob went into Egypt. It is one of our closest escapes.



Now we move forward in time 765 years and about 200 yards to the east, down the hill and down the western side of the city to the year 65 CE, five years before the Second Temple was destroyed. Jerusalem is one of the four great cities of the Roman Empire, of which we Jews, now widely scattered, comprise about 10 percent. Walk across Hurva Square, the center of the Jewish quarter, down to Tiferet Yisrael Street, past the arches from the time of the German crusaders, down the stairs of the western hill of the old city. Appearing before us is the holy Kotel.

The glorious Second Temple stands as the crowning glory of an incredibly beautiful Jerusalem. Every Jew must come here at least once in his lifetime. We are pilgrims from Egypt, Greece, Babylon, Yemen and Arabia.

Hundreds of thousands of us arrive for the festivals – Sukkot, Pesach, Shavuot. Josephus writes that three million pilgrims came for Pesach in 65 CE. The Temple is the center of everything Jewish, but hundreds of thousands of non-Jews come as well.

Enter what today is called the Ophel Archaeological Park, an excavation the size of ten football fields, and experience the ancient ascent to the Temple. Walk up the very same steps our brethren trod some 2,000 years ago as they approached Hulda's Gates, the Temple's main entrance.

But first we must immerse ourselves in the mikvah waters to be purified. It's easy; there are more than 100 mikvahs here. Afterwards, with indescribable excitement we don our finest festive clothing, leaving leather shoes and money behind. Walk through the three rooms and imagine them lit by olive oil lamps. A Levite guard asks if you've immersed and grants you entry.

Let go of all your thoughts. Imagine the joy, the brotherhood, the sense of purpose and of being one with the whole Jewish nation, imagine the sense of purity and elevation you experience there. The spiritual light is so powerful it is hard to open your eyes. There are hundreds of thousands of people and yet it is silent. The Levites play their instruments and sing the fifteen Psalms of Ascent. Our hearts are completely open. We have no thoughts. We enter through the gates, and as the incense is placed on the altar, we and all Israel experience oneness with G-d. Our offerings have been accepted; we are healed.

At this moment, we remember that all Jewish souls were present at the giving of the Torah on Mount Sinai. And we know that the Temple service is a collective experience on that same level.

Open your heart to all these lifetimes that you have lived here, and to the miracles that we have seen. Although our Temple remains in ruins, there are no limits to the spiritual heights your soul can reach when travelling back through time in our Holy City.

Come home to a place you've been to before. Recapture that past and renew your future. Return and be reborn again.

THE WISHING WALL

The first time I went to the wishing wall in Jerusalem was with my sister Tova and my cousins Michael and Melanie. They had many wishes, but there was only one thing I wanted more than anything and it was a baby brother. As I watched my cousins write down their wishes I knew this was my greatest chance to have my wish for a little brother granted. So I picked up a pen, wrote my wish on a piece of paper and stuck it in the highest hole that I could reach. I never felt my wish would come true until now. I had always felt I would be stuck with sisters. Now for the first time I knew I would finally get a brother. My wish came true a year later when my little brother Noah Moshe Yonah was born on March 10th, 1999. Noah is now 2-1/2 and goes to Maimonides School with me and my sisters Tova and Mia.

I will try to see how gossip hurts people, including myself, and work to eliminate it from my life.

I will try to replace words that hurt with words that encourage, engage and enrich.

I will not become discouraged when I am unable to choose words perfectly, because making the world a better place is hard work.

And I am pledging to do that, one word at a time."

King David's Greatest Victory

King David is beguiled by a bathing woman. It is Bathsheba, wife of Uriah the Hittite. He summons her to his palace, lies with her and she conceives. He fails to get Uriah to return home for a night with his wife. In desperation, he orders his general, Joab, to place Uriah on the frontline where, as expected, he falls in battle. Then the drama begins. Nathan the prophet appears before the king presenting a parable about a rich man and a poor man who were neighbors. BY RABBI CHAIM SEIDLER-FELLER When a wandering traveler arrives at the rich man's home, the rich man takes the poor man's only lamb to feed his guest. Upon hearing the tale David flew into a rage and said to Nathan, "The man who did this deserves to die." Nathan said to David, "That man is you!" Consumed by guilt, David declares: "I have sinned before the Lord." In my view, this is the greatest moment in the Bible. It is the source of the Jewish commitment to speak truth to power and to nurture a life of self-examination. It's the humbled king who admits his guilt who is the true hero. Such a man was King David, founder of Jerusalem, city of integrity and renewal.

More than 1,000 new recruits of Hezbollah listen to their leader, Sheikh Hassan Nasralla, during a recent induction ceremony in Beirut to honour the group's first suicide attack on Israel in 1982.

Hezbollah says it rebuffed U.S. overture

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BEIRUT — Hezbollah said last Friday it had rejected a secret U.S. offer to "forgive" alleged involvement in attacks on westerners in exchange for ending the guerrillas' hostility towards Israel.

In an interview in the Kuwaiti Al-Rai Al-Am daily, Hezbollah spiritual leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah said the offer followed suicide attacks on U.S. targets that killed thousands of people on Sept. 11 and sparked Washington's anti-terror war.

"The United States thought we'd be stricken with fear," he said. "They came to us thinking there was a chance we'd give after September 11 what we'd refused before."

He said unnamed intermediaries had offered to "forgive Hezbollah its past", including the 1983 bombing of the marine barracks in Beirut which killed 241 people, and has helped make Hezbollah a fixture on U.S. lists of "terrorist" organizations.

In return, Hezbollah would distinguish between Islam and "terrorism", withdraw from the Arab-Israeli conflict, cut ties to Syria and radical Palestinian groups that fight Israel, and turn over information Washington assumed it had about militant Islamist groups, Nasrallah said.

"Of course we rejected all these offers because we believe it's a political bomb aimed at finishing off Hezbollah," he said, adding that Washington's recent decision to ask Lebanon to freeze Hezbollah's assets was a response to being snubbed.

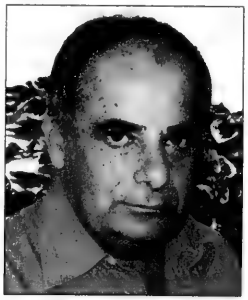
Peace in a 'holding pattern'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN & PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporters

TORONTO — Israel is entering a "holding pattern and a process of damage control" while it waits for a new generation of pragmatic Palestinian leaders to emerge, says journalist and researcher Hirsh Goodman.



Hirsh Goodman

"We could be in a holding pattern for a long time and we could sustain it," Goodman told The CJN one day after speaking at the Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture series at Holy Blossom Temple.

There is virtually no chance of a substantial movement in the peace process as long as Yasser Arafat remains the Palestinian leader, he said.

Community Growth

WINNIPEG — Community planners with the local federation have unveiled a scheme to increase the city's Jewish population to 18,000 from 14,000. Dubbed "Grow Winnipeg," the plan envisions increased recruitment of Jewish families, retention of young adults and renewal of community spirit.

Position Clarified

VANCOUVER — Spokespeople for Canadian Jewish Congress left a recent meeting with New Democratic Party MP Svend Robinson saying they were satisfied with his clarification of NDP policy on Israel. Robinson, a vocal critic of Israel, affirmed his support for Israel's right to exist and he applauded its vibrant democracy. He also defended the rights of Palestinian while deploring the use of violence to achieve their goals.

Donations Up

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg Combined Jewish Appeal announced a 6.77 percent increase in "card for card" donations over last year. The total increase in donors' gifts is part of a long-term effort to increase the total campaign from $3 million in the late 1990s to $4 million by the end of the 2002/03 campaign year.

Mosque Dispute

NAZARETH — A controversy over a mosque in Nazareth was reignited when Muslims began building the house of worship again last week, but were halted by Israel. Christians in the northern Israeli city oppose the construction because the mosque would be adjacent to the Basilica of the Annunciation, one of Christianity's holiest sites. Muslim leaders said they would resume building soon, even if they do not receive the necessary permits.

MOSCOW — A Jewish cultural centre opened in Moscow last week. It will operate in a mansion recently acquired by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee in the city's downtown. Jewish Crash Victims

NEW YORK — A Jewish couple from Long Island were among the 260 victims aboard Flight 587, which crashed shortly after takeoff from JFK Airport. Melvin and Elaine Landsman were planning to vacation in the Dominican Republic. A third Jewish victim was identified as Israeli businessman Ilan Wasserman, a longtime resident of Queens.

Screening Tests

NEW YORK — Screening tests were held in New York on Sunday for those willing to help a six-year-old boy who needs a bone marrow transplant. Ashkenazi Jews are most likely to match genetically with Elliott, who has a disease that will be fatal without a transplant. All potential donors automatically were registered with the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Registry for patients in need of transplants.

Hung Jury

CHERRY HILL, N.J. — The case of a rabbi accused of arranging his wife's murder ended in a mistrial last week. The judge declared a mistrial after the jury said it was unable to decide on all three counts against Rabbi Fred Neulander. Jurors deliberated for more than 40 hours over seven days before sending the judge a note saying they could not reach a decision. Neulander may be tried again. Neulander's wife, Carol, was found beaten to death at the couple's home in 1994. Authorities alleged the rabbi wanted his wife killed so he could continue an affair. Neulander resigned his pulpit in February 1995 amid reports he had been unfaithful.

Israel Survey

PARIS — French citizens sympathize more with Israel than with the Palestinians, according to a poll conducted for the Israeli Embassy in Paris. Twenty-six percent of those surveyed claimed to sympathize with Israel and 19 percent with the Palestinians. But 35 percent answered "neither one nor the other." The respondents also seemed disappointed with the leadership of both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Eighteen percent said they sympathized with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, and 25 percent said they sympathize with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

Dead Sea Scrolls

NEW YORK — The publication of 38 volumes of Dead Sea scrolls and commentaries are in their final stages of preparation. One of the great finds of 20th-century archeology, the scrolls portray Jewish thinking during the period 2,000 years ago that produced rabbinic Judaism. Dating from 250 B.C.E. to 70 C.E., the scrolls were found between 1947 and 1956 in the caves at Qumran on the West Bank.

Medieval Mikvah Uncovered

LONDON — Archeologists in London have found a medieval ritual bath they say is among the oldest pieces of physical evidence of Jews in Europe.

The mikvah dates from the 13th century and is "the only identifiable structure that has survived from the Jewish community of medieval London," according to the Museum of London.

Jews came to England at the time of William the Conqueror in 1066 and thrived here until they were expelled by Edward I in 1290. They were readmitted in the 1650s by Oliver Cromwell.

The stone mikvah consists of a semi-circular basin about four feet across and over four feet deep with a flight of stone steps leading down to it.

John Clark, a medieval curator at the museum, called the find "very significant."

Jews were so well integrated into medieval English society that physical evidence of their presence is hard to come by, Clark said.

Holocaust Walls of Remembrance dedicated

Monument engraved with names of some 3,000 victims of Shoah

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yad Vashem literally means "a monument and a name."

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, appropriately, is providing both: On a public monument, names will be a silent tribute.

Nearly 1,000 people braved autumn's first chill to gather in Earl Bales Park on Remembrance Day to dedicate the first three walls of the society's Holocaust Walls of Remembrance, designed to serve as a permanent memorial to Shoah victims whose families and descendants have settled in and around Toronto.

The newly-unveiled walls are engraved with the names of some 3,000 victims of the Holocaust, with each name accompanied by the person's town and country of birth. Organizers plan eight walls, each with eight panels, but say they will put up as many of the monuments as demand dictates.

The black slabs will ring the bronze, flame-topped obelisk that serves as the community's rallying point for Yom Hashoah, and are near the bronze bust of Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish war hero credited with saving the lives of up to 100,000 Hungarian Jews during World War II.

Following the dedication ceremony, addressed by Defence Minister Art Eggleton, loved ones gently drew their fingers over the names etched into the black Italian marble, as if trying to bond with parents, grandparents and relatives.

The walls will hold more than names. Their reverse sides will tell the whole story of the Holocaust, highlighting deportations, the Jewish Resistance, life in Jewish ghettos, and the stories of the Righteous Among the Nations. Remarkable photo-etchings recall famous images of the era.

The project "is an exhortation to combat evil and terrorism," said Eggleton, one of several speakers at the dedication. "We owe it to victims of the Holocaust and we owe it to ourselves."

For Donia Blumenfeld Clenman, a survivor of two Nazi-run slave labour camps in her native Poland, the walls provide a kind of closure because they give final markers to those with no graves.

Reflections of GA moments

From the editor's desk

A gathering of more than 3,000 people, "pressed" together in one hotel for more than three days is hardly the place to look for moments of quiet, reflective contemplation.

And yet, oddly enough, despite the congestion of crowded hallways and very noisy vestibules, fleeting moments of sanctum sanctorum tranquility were not that rare.

Very likely, those moments were simply the mind's sub-conscious attempts, as a result of the ubiquitous congestion and noise, to assimilate and store into the cluttered chambers of its memory, some of the pieces of information and inspiration heard or felt during any one of the countless discussions, debates, arguments, lectures, seminars, forums and plenary sessions that were the structure and purpose of the three days.

Last week in Washington, the Jewish federations of North America, under the auspices of their umbrella organization, the United Jewish Communities, convened for three days for their annual General Assembly.

The program, the occasion, some of the speakers, and the myriad human "encounters" yielded many moments of quiet reflection.

In the next three weeks, I shall share with readers a few of the reflections that sprang from those quiet moments.

We owe a great deal to the younger generation, especially to our children on campuses across North America. And we do not often enough acknowledge that debt.

The assault on Israel's legitimacy is probably fiercest on college campuses, where ideologies rage, inhibitions are mild and discourse is often ugly. The case of Concordia University in Montreal may be an extreme example in Canada, but it is not the only example in North America.

In such a choking climate of intimidation and intolerance, any expressions of Jewish identity and solidarity with Israel are significant acts of pluck, character and backbone.

Many manifestations of those very traits last week were displayed by large numbers of the 700 college students who attended the GA.

Of those 700, nearly 150 were Canadian. And it was the Canadian contingent that repeatedly drew admiring comments and high accolades from the "older generation."

More than one person remarked to me that the pre-assembly Shabbaton was suffused with ruach (spirit) and high energy because of the leadership of the Canadian students.

More than one person remarked to me that they could always tell when Canadian students were in the room to lift discussions or debates to even higher levels.

Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt, the co-founders of the Birthright Israel program, publicly praised the exemplary involvement and intense commitment of the Canadian students who, as Steinhardt noted, have a "particular spirit."

I record this observation not from any sense of ethnocentrism or jingoism, but rather, simply, out of plain pride.

Officials are to be commended for financially and otherwise facilitating the attendance of students at the assembly. The "investment" of funds used to instill, solidify and reinforce Jewish identity in our children is beyond reward.

But all of our students – not only those who travelled to Washington, but those who travel or seek to travel a Jewish road on campus during stages in their lives that are challenging and exploratory and during times that are turbulent and troubling – must be commended even more.

They conduct their lives with a sense of urgency, relevance and full-heartedness that our parental sensibilities long ago relegated to the past. And greater is the lesson we are taught about ourselves when we see our children's great energy.

For reminding us how we once lived our lives and how life can still be lived, we owe our students, our children, a great deal.

On a related student subject, officials in Israel and in the Diaspora acknowledge that the Birthright Israel program is a great, ongoing success.

Bronfman, Steinhardt and Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister Rabbi Michael Melchior held a joint press conference during the GA to make that very point. Each of them spoke extemporaneously and was, in turn, deeply eloquent.

Bronfman: "Birthright was not conceived as an aliyah program but rather as a unity of Jewish souls. There are no second-class Jews anywhere on earth. Jews will be more knowledgeable wherever they live for having visited Israel and Jerusalem."

Steinhardt: "The program makes a special effort to go to the farthest reaches of the Jewish world to touch as many of our youth as possible who are unaffiliated, uncommitted and uneducated about their Judaism. Once they leave college, they are gone...The extraordinary emotional resonance of the Birthright program creates a great opportunity for us to 'catch' them before they leave school...I thank every young person who goes on Birthright, who says the heck with terrorism, the heck with fear. I'm going to Israel."

Melchior: "Birthright works with every individual who comes on the trip making them the 'centre of the world', as it were, and their experience of Jewishness and Jewish fellowship becomes a rejoicing."

Police asked to investigate 'anti-Semitic' Web site

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Toronto police hate crimes unit has been asked to investigate a Web site that repeats age-old anti-Semitic stereotypes – the kind most typically associated with neo-Nazi propagandists.

In this case, however, the site is not operated by racist skinheads but by a group called Muslims of America Islamic Centre (MOA). Canadian Jewish Congress is asking that the operators of the site be charged with promoting hatred.

In addition to vilifying Jews with "vitriolic examples of classic anti-Semitism," the site also attacks gays, lesbians, Hindus and other groups," Congress asserts.

"The site reprises virtually every lie in the anti-Semites' vernacular, including Jewish conspiracies and control of the media," said Prof. Ed Morgan, chair of Congress' Ontario region. "A separate section, dubbed 'The Truth about the Talmud,' maligns one of Judaism's most important religious texts and presents adherents of Judaism in a vile and pejorative fashion."

Included in the site (www.ummah.net/moa-on-line/) are links to the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a Czarist-era forgery that Canada Customs has deemed hate literature and barred from entry into Canada, said Len Rudner, director of community relations for Congress. (Last week, the links would no longer connect to the server computer.)

In a letter to the hate crimes unit, Rudner noted the site claims the existence of a "Zionist conspiracy to cut down the Muslim population." The site also claims Zionists promote adultery and abortion among non-Jews to offset a low Jewish birthrate.

"The intent of this barrage of hatred can only be to promote hatred against members of the Jewish community," Rudner stated.

Although the site is based in the United Kingdom, it includes a Toronto contact address and phone number, one of several "sources for Islamic information" in North America. However, the Toronto number is not in service. Other numbers listed for MOA offices in Florida, Delaware and New York connected to private residences while one in Massachusetts connected to a martial arts club.

Jewish hospice plan being examined

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new facility is being considered to meet the needs of adult Jewish people in the last few months of their lives.

The facility, whose working name is Residential Jewish Hospice of Ontario, would provide compassionate care for terminally ill Jewish people who do not want active treatment, says Andrea Nathanson, co-ordinator of the project.

Nathanson, a registered nurse, has assisted many people at the end of their lives, she says, and is proficient at co-ordinating home care, but says that most people are not.

When her father-in-law was dying just over two years ago, the family wanted him to die at home, and they had a team of home support workers to help them.

"Now, however, these support workers come in to initially assist the families and then wean themselves out of the home. It isn't always possible for families to handle the situation themselves."

It's a shame, she says, that due to the current health-care crisis, these people have to put their loved ones in an institution because they are unable to care for them at home.

She thought that people might benefit from having their family member transferred to a Jewish hospice that would have the "look, feel and resources of a comfortable, state-of-the-art Jewish home."

Last winter, she began calling palliative care specialists with her idea, and called a meeting of people willing to join a committee. "We had about 14 people at that meeting and we created a care model and a business model.

"We envisioned a six-bed Jewish facility that catered to Jewish cultural values and provided a comfortable home for patients and their families. We want a peaceful, welcoming home with an area in which people could observe Shabbat."

She made a preliminary presentation to Baycrest Centre with the notion of having the hospice as a possible satellite project, "and they liked the idea, but worried whether there is a need in the community. They suggested we do a needs assessment."

She also contacted the Jewish Hospice, an organization that, through referrals, has people visiting terminally ill patients. "We linked with them because they see people [who might need a hospice] and we wanted them to suggest us. They also worried about community need."

Nathanson says she believes there is a tremendous amount of interest and support in the community; together with the committee, she developed a survey which she needs 300 people to fill out.

"People who have lost a loved one to a long-term illness within the past 18 months are candidates to complete the survey. Because of the nature of this facility, sudden passing of loved ones would not qualify as having the appropriate circircumstances to complete it."

The questionnaire contains such questions as whether they would have considered such a facility for their family member, whether they feel there is a need for it in the community, where the dying person they were close to spent the last few months of his life, and whether $285 a day is a reasonable amount to pay for this service.

The RJHO would be a not-for-profit organization, she said, that would be funded by private donations. Patients or their families would be asked to make a donation (commensurate with their ability to pay) to cover all or part of their share of the operating costs, says Nathanson.

Those interested in filling out the survey can call Nathanson at 416-848-9574.

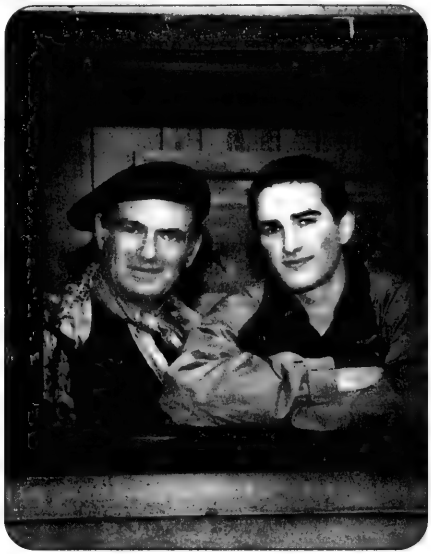
Father and son keep musical traditions alive

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Jaques and Michael Israelievitch, bringing the next generation of listeners into classical music concert halls may be one of our biggest challenges.



Jacques and Michael Israelievitch.

The father-and-son duo performed several pieces together at the Young Artist Series at the Glenn Gould Studio recently. With Jacques, the Toronto Symphony Orchestra concertmaster, on violin, Michael played several percussion instructments – including marimba and djembe.

But while the free noontime concert was full, there were only a handful of young adults in the audience.

Blaming the Canadian education system for the current apathy among young people toward classical music, the elder Israelievitch said that "music and visual arts are important. They humanize people. Yet, any time there is a cutback in education, they are the first courses to go."

Music and art appreciation has to start when children are young, said Jacques, an internationally renowned soloist who was awarded a knighthood in the Order of Arts and Letters by the French government for his contributions to the world of music.

Governments need to be more involved so that music can be more accessible at every level, he said in an interview.

In France, musical education is free, Jacques added. Music is available in schools as well as in a whole network of national conservatories which exist in almost every town.

He asked if there are any real music programs at the Jewish day schools.

"Are Jewish students studying the arts or are we creating a whole generation of people educated in the Jewish religion and then only in practical things they need to make a living, like math and computer science?"

Jacques, who gives master classes on the violin at the Royal Conservatory of Music and with youth orchestras, said he almost never sees Jewish students at his workshops.

For a community that historically has pursued the study of music, "there doesn't seem to be a push today to encourage our children to study music," he said.

Jacques' son, Michael, 18, is currently studying at the Juilliard School in New York. Although he began piano when he was very young, he didn't pursue music seriously until he was 12 and began percussion. The instruments he now plays include African drums, Japanese temple bowls, bells – basically anything that can be hit and produce a sound.

Michael has performed with numerous orchestras and ensembles. He is the principal percussionist/timpanist with the St. Louis Symphony Youth Orchestra and has won first prize at the U.S. National Music Festival.

"Playing with my father [as part of the Israelievitch Duo] has been an integral part of my learning experience, Michael said.

The father and son have performed works by such composers as Samuel Adler, Murray Adaskin and Srul Irving Glick.

It's not that common to hear violin and percussion performed together, Michael said.

However, most audiences are drawn into it and find the rhythm element quite infectious, Jacques noted.

Jacques' three sons are all involved in the arts. David, the oldest, is a student at the University of Victoria and focuses on creative writing. He currently composes hip hop and rap lyrics. Josh, the youngest, sings in his school's choir.

For Jacques' 50th birthday, his wife Gabrielle commissioned several pieces of music so that all his children could be involved in a celebration.

At that time, Michael Colgrass composed Hammer and Bow for percussion and violin. Father and son played the piece together for the first time at Jacques' party. However, they have gone on to perform it several times and have recorded it on the Fleur de Son Classics record label.

Jacques said it's a tremendous experience to be able to perform with his son.

"I'm on the stage playing and I'm so enormously proud of my son's achievements."

New wartime records could help genealogists: expert says

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The horde of Nazi records that the Americans confiscated from Germany after World War II has finally been catalogued, making it much more accessible to genealogists and historians, says an expert on German Jewish genealogy.

Peter Lande, who spoke to the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada (Toronto) during Holocaust Education Week, said the material includes concentration and death camp records, deportation lists, and many other types of data.

What's perhaps most impressive is that Lande, a retired American diplomat who lives in Washington, D.C., did all the cataloguing himself.

Most of the captured German records were microfilmed and returned to Germany in the 1950s. They take up 189 reels of microfilm, with 1,000 frames per reel. Lande said he examined every frame – 189,000 in total.

The microfilmed collection is housed at the U.S. National Archives, with copies at a few other American research institutions and at Yad Vashem. The index is available through the JewishGen web site, he said. The web site address is http://www.jewishgen.org/infofiles/CapturedGermanRecords.html#collection

The collection includes many diverse Holocaust-era records – for example, a list of about 120,000 Dachau inmates and a much smaller list that enumerates residents of one town who were late paying their water bills. The reason they hadn't paid was probably "because they'd been killed," Lande said.

A longtime volunteer with the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, Lande was born in Germany and came to the United States with his family in the late 1930s. He has scoured many war-era collections looking for genealogically relevant material.

In recent years, he has worked to put various Holocaust-related lists and films onto CD-ROMs for libraries and specialized research institutes worldwide. "Just think of all the collections that could be made available if this idea catches on," he said.

Lande described another major project relating to the former Soviet Union's Extraordinary State Commission into Nazi war crimes.

Immediately after the war, the Soviet fact-finding body tried to determine exactly what had happened in Soviet territory occupied by the Nazis. The commission published its multi-volume report in the late 1940s.

Yad Vashem microfilmed the collection in Moscow in 1990 and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum has a copy, but the names of individual victims appear haphazardly, on a town-by-town basis. For the last few years, Lande said, the U.S. museum has paid keyboarders in St. Petersburg and Minsk to consolidate the names onto a computerized – and thus easily searchable – master list.

The keyboarders enter the names in cyrillic letters, and the marvels of technology take over from there, he said.

"We have a system whereby you push a button and it appears in Latin text on the same screen," Lande said. "We've opened up an area that was basically inaccessible for 99 percent of researchers."

Lande said he wants to help people achieve closure through documentary evidence about relatives who perished in the Holocaust.

"People want finality. They want to know when their father died. This is important to people. I'm not talking just about genealogists who are doing nice charts."

HEARTS OF STONE!

For Jews, this past year has been the most difficult in 50. Filled with bombings, terrorism, shock, sorrow and tears in Israel and New York - perhaps no one has suffered as much as The Schevischurder family in Israel.

They lost five members in the Jerusalem "Sbarro" bombing.

The parents were with 5 of their 8 children when a suicide bomber detonated a knapsack filled with nails and explosives. The mother and two daughters A"H were killed instantly. The father and son A"H lay mortally wounded and died after reciting the Shema Yisrael together. Two young girls aged 8 and 10 were injured, one very seriously.

The 3 brothers not with the family found their sisters in the hospital. Then they came together for the five concurrent funerals which took place on Mount Menuchot in Jerusalem.

The father Mati was a Jewish studies teacher and the mother Tzirel worked with deaf children. They left a small amount of life insurance. The remaining 5 children aged 8 to 21, are destitute and facing a crisis. The youngest girl faces many surgeries and long term therapy.

WON'T YOU PLEASE HELP?

We need every Jew to help these five orphans financially. We can defeat those with hearts of stone. Charitable tax receipts will be issued for donations of $18 and up. Please give generously. In the merit of this mitzva may you and all of Israel be blessed with a year of health, happiness and peace. Thank you.

Israeli investors seek opportunities in Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When developers of a luxury waterfront condominium in Toronto decided to market the project to new buyers, they included in their advertising campaign a pitch to what seemed a natural market – in Israel.

Hebrew-speaking readers of Yediot Aharanot this past summer were treated to a full-page ad promoting investment in "Waterpark City," a development in the heart of downtown Toronto. For Israelis used to the country's high-price, high-tax regime, the offer looked pretty good. The prices were reasonable and the return on investment more than respectable.

The advertisement, it appears, is aimed at tapping into a growing body of Israeli investors flush with surplus cash who have been shifting their investment focus from the Holy Land to business opportunities around the world. Some have invested in eastern Europe – in countries like Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic. Others have looked to Latin America.

In the last 12 months, "Canada, especially Toronto, has become familiar to Israeli citizens as a good opportunity to come over and buy a condominium unit for investment purposes," said Benjamin Hertz, chief Canadian representative for Bank Leumi le-Israel.

The risk-return equation in Canadian investments is quite attractive for Israelis, Hertz explained. Consider a modest purchase, a 400-square-foot condominium unit. In Toronto, it can sell for $100,000 US. The same sized unit in Israel would be priced 20 to 25 percent higher. Furthermore, investors can expect about a five percent return on their investments in Israel while Canadian units return eight to 11 percent, Hertz said.

"Israelis believe the real estate market in Toronto is going to go up, not down, over a long period of time." That adds the likelihood of a capital gain to the steady income stream they are looking for, he added.

The waterfront development is a joint project of H & R Developments, a leading Canadian builder, and Malibu, an Israeli firm. H & R and Malibu began marketing the project in Israel last summer, according to Globes, an Israeli financial newspaper.

Residential units are only part of what Israelis are looking for – and only a small part at that. Globes reported recently that Delek Real Estate purchased the 34-storey Tour Bell office tower in Montreal from the CDP Pension fund for $130 million US. Communications giant Bell Canada is the prime tenant in the 112,000-square-metre building. Bell agreed to enter into a 17-year lease, paying $16 million US per year, giving Delek a 12 percent return.

Meanwhile, Delek Real Estate, in conjunction with its subsidiary Delek Belron, recently purchased three other Canadian buildings for a total of $150 million US. Two were residential buildings in Montreal with 700 apartments and the third was an office tower in Toronto. The tower is rented by the Canadian government and the Royal Bank of Canada, Globes reported.

Delek, one of Israel's largest overseas real estate investors, owns 20 properties in Canada and Britain, with the value of its Canadian investments reaching $350 million US.

Israeli interest in foreign investment is a natural development in any growing economy, Hertz said. Pushed by a declining Israeli real estate market and relative bargains abroad, Israeli capital is looking offshore for better returns and diversification of assets.

In Canada, Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal are the location, location, location for Israeli investors, who generally favour commercial properties like offices and malls over residential units.

Hertz, who assists Bank Leumi's Israeli clients uncover new opportunities, estimates that Israelis have invested $500 to $600 million US in Canada in the last five months. In Toronto alone, anywhere from 100 to 120 condos are purchased on an annual basis.

Benjamin Noy, Israel's consul for economic affairs, traced the history of Israeli investment abroad to a small group of Israeli contractors who were hired to do jobs around the world and who ended up as pathfinders for other Israeli investors. Solel Boneh, for one, was hired to do construction work in Africa and Latin America and with the collapse of communism, also became active in eastern Europe.

Over time, Israeli firms sought an equity stake in the developments they were building, particularly in shopping malls and offices in Hungary, Poland and the Czech Republic, and even some in Florida, Noy said.

Changes to Israeli foreign currency controls about five years ago opened the door wide to Israeli corporations, allowing them to pursue opportunities abroad.

In Canada, for example, the Gazit Group, a major Israeli real estate development and management company, acquired control of Canadian Centrefund Realty (now known as First Capital Realty), a real estate owner/manager, in June 2000.

Meanwhile, Canada-Israel trade in goods continues to grow, thanks in large part to the bilateral free trade agreement that came into effect in 1997. In the first six months of 2001, Israeli exports to Canada hit $150 million US, a 22-percent jump from the same period the year before. Canadian exports to Israel, reached $145 million US, bringing the annual grand total to an estimated $1 billion in two-way trade.

Since 1997, trade volumes have increased by 93 percent, Noy said.

Dispelling the doubts

Last week, the government announced that some 1,000 soldiers from the 3rd Battalion, Princess Patricia's Light Infantry, based in Edmonton, would be departing imminently for Afghanistan. In making the announcement on behalf of the government, Defence Minister Art Eggleton described the Canadians' military assignment as a "stabilization mission to assist in opening corridors for humanitarian assistance."

Despite the rather "sculpted" language used by the minister, and despite (as of this writing) the apparent broad collapse of the Taliban government and its armed forces, there should be no doubt in the minds of Canadians concerning the nature of the mission on which our soldiers have been sent. It is not without danger; it is not without peril.

We therefore extend our prayers on their behalf, convey to them our deep gratitude and bid them Godspeed and a safe return to their families and to their communities.

There should also be no doubt now in the minds of Canadians concerning the importance, let alone the morality, of our soldiers' mission in Afghanistan or of Canada's full-hearted support of and involvement in the coalition against the forces of terror.

The Taliban government and Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda network were full partners in their murderous ambitions and operations against the West. This is now certain.

As members of the Taliban party and the government hastily fled their strongholds in Kabul last week, they left behind irrefutable proof of their perfidious pact. That proof was described in the New York Times: "A flight simulator computer program, a list of flight schools in the United States and documents describing chemical, biological and nuclear warfare referring to the Qaeda organization were found here in two houses littered with paper.

"Some of the documents... were in a house that belonged to the ministry of defence of the Taliban government. Other documents were found in a private residence two miles away in the same upscale neighbourhood of Kabul... Throughout both houses were scattered green and yellow forms in Arabic labelled 'Al Qaeda ammunition Warehouse.' The forms list weapons, including rifles and grenades and state to whom they were issued.

"The apparent Qaeda presence in a Taliban defence ministry building suggested that Osama bin Laden's organization and the radical Islamic government were closely linked.

"In one house, a page torn out of Flying magazine was found, listing flight schools in Florida..."

Osama bin Laden has told us many times he wants to kill Christians and Jews, Americans and Israelis. The Taliban government has now been fully exposed as having been complicit in bin Laden's plans.

When our soldiers and the soldiers of all the coalition forces return safely from their mission, let us remember the great debt we will owe them all. For they are in Afghanistan defending us.

Supporting Harris is no affront

In the article "Harris praised as 'good friend' of the community" (CJN, Oct. 25) Carly Steinman, social action co-ordinator for the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, is quoted as saying that the ideology of the Ontario provincial government is a "direct affront to our Jewish values." She said that certain steps taken by the government "challenged our traditions of tzedakah, tikkun olam, and struggles against injustice and discrimination." She added that "our" fight for a "kinder and more equitable Ontario" has been greatly bolstered by Premier Mike Harris's resignation.

It may come as a surprise to Ms. Steinman that there are many supporters of the Harris government who are Jews, including Jews who try to adhere to Jewish values in their lives. The attorney general of Ontario, who is quoted in the same article, is one of them. For Ms. Steinman to say that she disagrees with, and does not like, the government, is within the bounds of acceptable discourse. It is absolutely unacceptable and arrogant to brand the government, and by extension its supporters, as being an "affront" to Jewish values. Who appointed Ms. Steinman as the arbiter of Jewish values?

Ms. Steinman seems to have forgotten that we live in a democracy. There are Jewish members and supporters of all major political parties in Canada. I suggest that many, if not most of those people, including the supporters of the Harris government, have made their political choices thoughtfully. Such people honestly believe that their political choices are consistent with their religious values. One may disagree with those Jews who support other political parties, and even try to convince them through reasoned debate that they are mistaken. But we are entering into dangerous territory if we brand those with whom we disagree as, in effect, enemies of our tradition.

I call on the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism to repudiate Ms. Steinman's comment, and to reaffirm political pluralism and tolerance for opposing viewpoints as Jewish values.

Harris legacy not praiseworthy

Many constituencies within the Jewish community would strongly contest the notion that Premier Mike Harris has been a "'good friend' to the Jewish community" (CJN, Oct. 25). Indeed, vast segments of our community believe that Harris's agenda and actions have been diametrically opposed to the fundamental traditions and values of the Jewish community. Among those who have been most negatively impacted by the neo-conservative ideology of the Harris government include: families and individuals who depend on food banks so they won't go hungry; those who cannot afford to pay wildly escalating rents and those on waiting lists for subsidized housing; physically and developmentally disabled persons who have experienced significant cuts to their benefits and access to services; senior citizens living on fixed incomes or those waiting to get into chronic-care hospitals; people who have become ill and had to lie in corridors in emergency wards; and thousands of families who send their children to public school and have witnessed the devastating impact of budget cuts, resulting in a lack of basic educational resources, ever increasing class numbers, fewer ESL programs, etc. By any measure, this is hardly a legacy that we would wish to praise.

Harris legacy costly

You have published several articles on Harris's "good legacy" to the Jewish community (CJN, Nov. 8 etc), referring to tax rebates for parents who pay for private education. (Presumably it does not refer to cuts in funding at Baycrest.)

The Jewish community should be aware that this legacy comes at a considerable cost. For instance, Jewish students who intend to have a career in the billion-dollar music and media industries need to take public high school arts courses that are not currently available in Jewish schools. They will then find themselves facing overcrowded classrooms, shortages of textbooks and other materials, and declining standards of cleanliness and safety due to lack of money to pay janitors. These are the conditions facing every public school in Ontario and it is nothing for Jewish or any other parents to be happy about.

An overwhelming response

Jewish Family & Child Service recently publicized in The CJN its search for a Jewish adoptive home for three Jewish children from New Brunswick.

The community response was overwhelming and heartening. We had hundreds of calls from people who were eager to provide a home for these young children.

We want to let the community know that we have found an excellent Jewish home for these three siblings. It is not often that we can intervene so successfully in people's lives, but we can all take pride and nachas in the fact that these childrens' lives will be immeasurably enhanced and that the community has also brought joy to people longing for children.

We want to thank the community for its generosity of spirit.

The media's lexicon for the Middle East

This article is the second of two parts. Part 1 was published last week.

By DONALD CARR

Most English language newspapers, television networks and radio stations have what is called a style book which dictates to writers, commentators, anchors and newsreaders the appropriate use of words in material for publication or broadcast.

Reviewing past media coverage of events in and affecting Israel, one is driven to the conclusion that for many, there must be a distinct style book, or lexicon, reserved especially for reporting on that part of the world. It probably looks something like the following:

Palestinian witnesses
Refers to statements made by Palestinian Arabs, to be resorted to either (a) when the reporter or commentator is not present at a particular incident and receives information from Israeli witnesses, which, if reported, will show a "one-sided Israeli bias" to Palestinian Arab neighbours where the reporter or commentator lives (such as the American Colony Hotel, or in Ramallah), or (b) when the reporter or commentator is concerned that his or her Palestinian "hosts" will retaliate if a report favourable to Israel is filed, such as the PA's seizure of all but one film crew's footage of the bloody lynching of two Israeli soldiers by a mob in Ramallah, or the PA's denying them interviews with PA leaders.

Peace Process
Refers to an illusory set of negotiations and apparently tentative agreements between Israel and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat, which have occurred from time to time, but have led to nothing but the current so-called Al Aksa intifadah. These include (a) the "Oslo accords," pursuant to which the PA was established, but none of the undertakings by the Palestinian Arabs therein was carried out, (b) the unprecedented offers made by former U.S. president Bill Clinton at Camp David Two, all of which were either rejected by Arafat or breached by him and his Palestinian Authority, (c) the steps recommended in the report of the Sharm El-Sheikh fact finding committee, chaired by former U.S. senator George Mitchell, whose astoundingly successful recommendations for solving the inter-religious wars in Northern Ireland are well known, (d) intermittent attempts at discussions between Shimon Peres and Arafat, none of which have led to any lessening of "terrorism" (see below) or any realistic prospect of the Palestinian Arabs recognizing the validity and existence of the State of Israel.

To be used by reporters or commentators unaware of the context of the Arab/Israeli confrontation.

Provocative
Use when describing an Israeli counter-move to an act of violence by Palestinian Arabs, where in such counter-move no Arab casualties or deaths occur. For example, the occupation of Orient House, used by the PA for diplomatic or political purposes and planning of attacks on Israeli civilians, all contrary to the Oslo accords. To be used when it is patently obvious that "overreaction" or "cycle of violence" cannot be used, no matter how one-sided a reporter or commentator might be.

Refugees
Use exclusively for Palestinian Arabs who left their homes in "occupied lands" in 1948, many out of fear, but more at the urging of invading Arab armies, which wanted clear lines of fire and promised their early return once the Jews had been "thrown into the sea." Notwithstanding that the number of Palestinian Arab refugees is variously estimated at 538,000 (Israeli sources), 720,000 (UN estimates) and 850,000 (Palestinian Arab sources), the term is to be extended to current generations of descendants of those people, the vast majority of whom have never set foot in any of those original locations and who are now estimated to number 3.5 million.

Never to be used in reference to Jews, who, in approximately the same numbers as the Palestinian Arabs, were obliged to flee Arab countries in 1947 and 1948 to avoid harm and who left behind them billions of dollars worth of property, possessions and institutions.

A reason for not applying this term to Jews is the fact that, unlike the Palestinian Arabs, they were absorbed into various havens – and particularly Israel, impoverished and surrounded by enemies. The majority of the "refugee" Palestinian Arabs were left by Lebanon, Syria and Jordan to fend for themselves and to be used by the Arabs as pawns in the "political" war against Israel (although Jordan alone, bestowed upon those living under its control a meaningless Jordanian citizenship). Many of those Palestinian Arabs and their descendants were and are housed in "refugee camps" (see below).

Refugee Camps
Refers to those settlements of Palestinian Arabs displaced as a result of the 1948 war in territory either captured by the Jordanians or the Egyptians, or in sovereign territory of Lebanon and Syria. Unlike the tents and corrugated-iron Quonset huts used by Jewish refugees until their integration into Israeli society, these locations include many multi-storeyed concrete, permanent residences, factories, shops and offices. Most of these locations exhibit conditions at least as "permanent" as the former homes of those who left rural areas and, in most cases, have facilities, such as running water and electricity, that did not exist in their former rural homes.

Right of Return
An illusory and non-existent status under any known international law; invented by Palestinian Arabs and their descendants to obfuscate a process, which, if implemented, would destroy Israel by allowing an influx of Arabs whose numbers (currently estimated at about 3.5 million) either immediately, or within a short time, would outweigh the Jewish population of Israel and achieve the Arab dream of annihilating the Jewish State by a means other than the wars, terrorism, boycotts and diplomatic isolation already attempted.

This erroneous concept stems from a non-binding resolution of the UN General Assembly, Resolution 194 (III) of Dec. 11, 1948, which resolved that "the refugees wishing to return to their homes and live in peace with their neighbours should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date, and that... compensation... should be made good by the governments or authorities responsible."

All Arab states voted against the resolution at that time. Note that the resolution (a) did not refer to "Arab" or "Palestinian" refugees, (b) referred to refugees who wished to live at peace with their neighbours, (c) did not attempt to oblige any state to comply, but recommended permission, (d) referred to "governments and authorities" in the plural (thus, clearly intending to refer to more than Israel) and, finally, (e) never used the word "right."

The spurious assertion of this "right" ignores what was virtually a population exchange, involving a similar number of Jews from Arab countries who were re-settled in Israel. Many similar movements of much larger populations have taken place around the world, such as with the Hindus and Muslims in India and Pakistan; the Poles, Germans and several other nationalities in Europe; and various ethnic groups in the former Yugoslavia.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, the word and concept "right" carries with it a very appealing ring to western ears. Should be used to avoid delving into the background of this issue.

Terrorists
Notwithstanding its use with respect to Northern Ireland, IRA bombers in England, the Tamils and members of Basque ETA, elsewhere in the world and, after the Sept. 11 attacks and subsequent anthrax infections in the United States, this term is not to be used to describe Arab bombers, gunmen, mortar-shellers or other attackers of civilians in the Middle East, except where their targets are not Israeli – for example, U.S. bases in Lebanon or U.S. Navy ships.

Originally eschewed in preference for the terms "freedom fighters" or "guerillas," but now that these have fallen out of favour, it is preferable to use "activists," despite its use in describing individuals in the western world who join peaceful demonstrations or parades, or join organizations dedicated to some kind of change by democratic means.

Postscript
Successive Israeli governments and the Israeli media have unwittingly contributed to part of this lexicon by using the words "settlements" and "settlers" when referring to communities of Israeli Jews and their inhabitants.

These Jews have built permanent, modern towns and villages, with all the necessary infrastructure: sewers, water, paved roads, lighting, community centres, synagogues, schools and homes on land legally acquired and paid for (usually by the Jewish National Fund over the past nearly 100 years) even though those lands were across what came to be known as the "Green Line."

The "Green Line" was never a national boundary of any kind, but a ceasefire line drawn in green ink on a map after the War of Independence, when Israel successfully staved off the attempted annihilation of the new State by surrounding countries, including Syria, Egypt, Lebanon, Jordan and Iraq.

"Settlement" is the literal translation of the Hebrew word hityashvut, used in the 1920s and 1930s, when the Jewish Agency assisted newcomers to Palestine to build new, small, agricultural communities. These words transmit to western ears the concept of small gatherings of squatters living in covered wagons or makeshift wooden shacks, pioneering uninhabited wastes, such as the rolling lands of Wyoming, Montana or Texas, often positioning themselves on land which is not theirs and to which they have no right, title or legal interest.

This has led to the denigration by the media – and, strangely enough, unintentionally by some official Israeli sources – of such communities as Pisgat Ze'ev (over 34,000 residents), Maalei Adumim (over 22,000), Ariel (over 14,000), Efrat (over 6,000) and Kiryat Arba (over 6,000). In turn, the general western community has absorbed a gross distortion of the status of these communities and their inhabitants.

So, too, Gilo, a neighbourhood in Jerusalem, indistinguishable from any other neighbourhood of that city, with a population of over 27,000, studded with modern apartment buildings, homes and all of the other hallmarks that make it a city neighbourhood, has come to be categorized by the media as either a "settlement" or "occupied Arab lands," when mortar and machine gun fire have frequently hit its residences from the neighbouring Arab village of Beit Jala.

Opinions

Immigrants to Canada

Unless I am mistaken, there is a groundswell of anti-immigrant feeling spreading in the country. I suppose that underlying this sentiment is a fear of terrorism, even though we have no evidence that attributes terrorist acts to immigrants. In the United States, there is a sense that its borders are too porous, and that refugees and immigrants may be potential terrorists. To be sure, we must support careful screening of all applicants, but we must not forget that immigrants constantly renew the lifeblood of the nation.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Of course, our immigration process has to follow the strict rules and the refugee determination that frequently takes place must also abide by the strictest standards. There may be some disagreement about how high these standards ought to be, but if we put them too high, we may keep genuine refugees out – and as a former refugee from the Nazis to the United States, I know that without a reasonable refugee law, I would not be here today to write this article, but would have died long ago in Auschwitz.

I recently had the privilege of reading a speech that Canadian Senator Jerry Grafstein gave in the Senate. In his speech, he said:

"In the last decade, Toronto's small Afghan immigrant community has grown to 20,000, many of whom are now proud Canadian citizens. In Toronto, the police can arrest people in over 130 languages, and Toronto City Hall can provide services in 80 languages which is on the increase according to the mayor. Toronto is the first city in the world to give birth to a multilingual television station with programs in more than 18 languages, weekly."

The senator then turned to a discussion of the current immigration bill:

"In a careful, meticulous way, we must review the immigration act and amend it, if we must, or restrain the government if we should discover overzealous provisions after careful consideration and weighing of the evidence.

"[We must] examine this bill carefully to see what steps must be taken to satisfy our citizens not only about their security, but about their freedom as well and their economic prospects through the medium of immigration, which has become part of the lifeblood of Canada."

Having had a close connection with the immigration and refugee process, I support the senator's sentiments wholeheartedly. I hope that there is enough money in the government till to spend on training the personnel that will administer the bill when it is finally passed. A piece of paper will not protect us one way or the other – it will be people who take its purpose seriously and efficiently.

Different Palestinian voices

Even as Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat seems to be losing control to the extremism of the Palestinian street and rejectionist factions within the PA, other voices are questioning both his leadership and the benefit of ongoing violence for the Palestinians themselves. None of this indicates any change in official Palestinian policy, nor does it mean that Arafat's conduct will change, but it does point to more diverse dissent within the Palestinian community than is generally acknowledged. Consider the following recent examples.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Several weeks ago, Sari Nusseiba, a member of the Palestinian "aristocracy" and one of its best-known intellectuals, published an article in Arabic and Hebrew in which he called for abandonment of the demand to exercise the right of return of Palestinian refugees to pre-'67 Israel. Until Oslo, Nusseiba had supported one secular state that would incorporate both Israel and the West Bank. After Oslo, he came around to supporting a two-state solution. He acknowledges that for this to work, the Palestinians must accept the Israeli position that to protect its viability as a Jewish State, the Palestinian right of return cannot be exercised.

In late October, a coalition of Palestinians and Israelis signed a full-page ad calling for an immediate implementation of the Mitchell Plan, including cessation of all violence and attacks, a freeze on settlements, and a return to negotiations based on UN resolutions 242 and 338. All the Palestinian signatories held official and semi-official positions in the PA. Senior among them was Yasser Abed Rabo, minister of science in the PA, who has gone on record before in acceptance of a two-state solution that would allow each state to define its national identity – code language for acknowledgement of the Jewish claim to Israel.

Earlier this month, press reports leaked the story of the abortive resignation of Muhammad Dahlan, head of Gaza's security services and one of Arafat's closest advisers. According to these reports, Dahlan disagreed with Arafat's strategy in dealing with opposition groups such as Hamas, Islamic Jihad and even the Tanzim. Dahlan's criticism stems from recognition that the benefits of the intifadah have been exhausted, while Arafat is losing control and the radical street is dictating policy.

Arafat refused to accept the resignation, and the entire episode can be dismissed as an internal ritual within a closed leadership clique, but its very publication is evidence that all is not stable.

Two weeks ago, Yazeed Si'ar, a Cambridge-based Palestinian intellectual, author and Arafat advisor, publicly criticized Arafat's strategy (or lack thereof) as inimical to the Palestinian interest in peace with Israel. He spoke of the weaknesses and corruption in the PA's governance system, and of Arafat's failure to see beyond his short-term, tactical analysis of what the Palestinians have gained over the last forty years. While extremely critical of Israelis' lack of fundamental understanding of the Palestinians, he was equally vocal in his assessment of the Palestinians' failure to comprehend their Israeli counterparts. For him, the inevitable outcome of the prolonged conflict has to be two states side by side, with Israel defined and governed as it is today. What is not clear is how long it will take to get there, or at what cost. For this, he blames Arafat's poor judgment.

At the end of the day, what counts is what Arafat does and not what anyone around him says. The fact that all of these statements are made in the Israeli press can be cynically viewed as an effort to seduce Israeli public opinion without any substantive changes in official rhetoric or policy.

But this can be analyzed differently. When coupled with the fact that the Palestinian middle class is sending its financial assets abroad and high emigration figures among the more affluent groups in the PA, this may all point to cracks in the wall of solidarity with the intifadah in what has never been a monolithic community. As always, the debate over tactics and strategy towards Israel masks a debate over the future shape of the Palestinian community and its leadership. The intifadah no longer offers political gains, especially after Sept. 11. Acting upon this recognition involves serious decisions on the Palestinian side that will have far-reaching – and likely convulsive – internal consequences.

Sex and the terrorists

Now that I have your attention...

Let's spend at least a few minutes doing something other than agonizing over the many depressing recent events.

If we obsess about nothing other than the situation facing Israel and Jews in the wake of the anti-racism conference in Durban, the ongoing violence of the intifadah and the apprehension of more post-Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, then we might as well pack it in. There will likely be tough times ahead. But in the past century there have been periods far more difficult for Jews than the present time, and I am not just referring to the Holocaust.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

So leave it to a recent issue of the Forward, the American Jewish weekly, to bring us front-page news of what is really important in the Jewish world. I refer of course, to their triumphant article on the latest Playboy playmate, who turns out to be Jewish. Not just a little Jewish, but really Jewish. The young lady apparently took a recent trip to Israel, which made a great impression, and also attended services periodically when growing up.

I confess I have not yet had a chance to check out the relevant issue of Playboy, but I will assume this young woman was not chosen for her chess-playing abilities. I don't know if she is the first Jewish playmate – likely not – but it's interesting that the selection made the front page of the Forward. Life – Jewish life – goes on.

Jews can take pride in more than their intellectual or economic achievements. Many Jews are glad when Miss Israel does well in a Miss Universe competition. And many North American Jews recall with pride when Bess Myerson won the Miss America crown in 1945, the first and only Jewish woman to do so.

Beauty pageants are one thing, but nudity is quite another. Years ago, I was in Israel when the first issue of an Israeli Penthouse magazine, in Hebrew, hit the stands. Having heard about the American version of Penthouse, I decided to buy the Israeli version, for research purposes of course.

What a surprise! The Israeli issue was as tame as a girlie magazine could possibly be. It was not a Hebrew translation of the American product. The few pictorials featured topless European-looking models, and that was it. Nothing, frankly, that one could call pornographic.

In fact, that issue of Penthouse revealed a great deal about the ambiguous relationship Jews have with physical beauty and eros.

To my amazement, the text that accompanied the pictorials were not the standard, "Martina loves surfing and horseback riding." No, to my surprise the texts selected were all lovely lyrical passages from the Song of Songs. Most readers of the magazine, even secular Israelis, would probably have recognized those passages.

What an irony. Even when trying to score a blow for sexual freedom, the Israeli producers of the magazine could not escape the hold of Judaic tradition. Why did they do it? I cannot know for certain. I would argue it was not done to deliberately disgrace any holy texts. I suspect it simply seemed like a logical, perhaps even clever, choice. In effect they were trying to make the case that erotica has its place in the Jewish biblical canon. Which it does.

In North America, the scant research available suggests that Jews hold liberal attitudes on matters relating to sex and sexual morality. Jews are more likely than non-Jews, certainly in the United States, to tolerate pornography, to support sex education and birth control in public schools, to support equal rights for gays and lesbians and to support free access to abortion.

Among the non-Orthodox, Jews are at least as likely to engage in pre-marital sex, though the Canadian rate of out-of-wedlock births is far lower for Jews than for non-Jews.

The conventional wisdom, articulated by Dr. Ruth Westheimer among others, has been that Judaism, unlike Christianity, has always had a more liberal posture towards sexual pleasure than Christianity. So let Jews kvell over the Jewish playmate and think pleasurable and erotic thoughts in the shadow of Osama bin Laden. There was sex even in the ghettos and in the camps. Let there be sex now.

The Kirshner File

Jewish Montreal of a bygone era

Writing under the pseudonymn of Ben Mordecai, Israel Mendres was a stellar fixture in the pages of Montreal's Yiddish-language newspaper, the Keneder Adler.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Catering to the tastes and sensibilities of East European immigrants, Mendres was the master of the personal essay, known journalistically as a feuilleton. Perfected in Europe by writers such as Theodor Herzl, the founder of modern political Zionism, it lent itself to nuanced observation.

Mendres, born in Russia's Pale of Settlement in 1894, immigrated to Canada at the age 16. Before he discovered journalism, he worked as a tailor. In 1922, the Keneder Adler hired him as a staff writer. For the next 40-odd years, until his death in 1964, there was hardly an issue without his byline.

In his stylistically unadorned feuilletons, he described Jewish immigrant life in Montreal. Being closely attuned to its rhythms, Mendres' deft, timely sketches distilled the essence of a universe. In the main, social, cultural and economic issues attracted his attention.

He wrote of shifting neighbourhoods, class struggle, rivalries between Zionists and Bundists, Yiddish theatre, anti-Semitism and the formation of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

In 1947, when he was something of a personality, Mendres published 55 of his short Yiddish pieces in book form under the title of Montreal fun Nekhtn (Montreal of Yesterday). It covered the period from 1900 to 1920.

On the 50th anniversary of its publication, the French Canadian scholar Pierre Anctil, having recognized its importance as a Quebec historical document, translated it into French.

It was only a question of time before an English version appeared. Montreal of Yesterday, published by Vehicule Press, is now available to readers. The translator, Vivian Felsen of Toronto, is none other than Mendres' granddaughter. "It was something I had to do," she told me.

Montreal-born Felsen, who was 18 when Mendres died, knew her grandfather very well. The daughter of Irvine and Anne Glass, to whom this book is in part dedicated, Felsen is a Yiddishist. Like her mother, a Yiddish teacher whose father was Mendres, Felsen spoke Yiddish as a child and studied it as an adult. Speaking of Mendres, she said, "He was even-handed and tolerant and was at home in every segment of Jewish society."

Which, perhaps, is why he had a foot in virtually every nook of Jewish Montreal.

Wide-ranging and perceptive, Montreal of Yesterday opens with a brief piece about the transformation of the city from a small town to a major metropolis.

Focusing on its former Jewish neighbourhoods, Mendres recalls that the corner of St. Urbain and Dorchester lay at the heart of Jewish Montreal. He lovingly evokes Dufferin Park, where Jewish immigrants congregated, and Dufferin School, where Jewish immigrant children "distinguished themselves with the highest grades."

More affluent Jews lived on streets like Prince Arthur and Ontario. The wealthiest resided on Sherbrooke, near University and McGill College.

Back in those days, Jewish families visited St. Helen's Island, site of Expo 67, on Sundays to enjoy the greenery and fresh air. "[It] was a paradise where they felt very much at ease," Mendres writes. "They would meet people who had come from the same town or hamlet in the old country, some of whom were newcomers, others partly established and many already well established."

The prosperous among them were easily spotted. They sported watches with gold chains over their vests, massive gold rings on their fingers and gold teeth.

Among workers, cloakmakers were deemed the aristocrats. "They earned higher wages, they were better dressed, attended the Yiddish theatre more frequently, purchased Jewish books more often, and in summer sent their wives to St. Sophie or New Glasgow."

Nonetheless, they were far from secure. Since jobs were seasonal, they were at the mercy of bouts of unemployment and were forced to dip into their savings and incur debts. Few cloakmakers, not to mention tailors, could afford to send their children to high school, so in most cases, they were pressed to work at age 13 or 14.

There was tension between "uptown" and "downtown" Jews. Downtowners were "greeners" who sought to increase their influence in the community, while uptowners were determined to maintain their ascendancy.

In addition, workers were pitted against employers in a perpetual class struggle. It was not until 1919 that tailors won a 40-hour week.

"Many Jewish workers lived in dire poverty. Those with large families suffered the most. If a worker had a wife who was healthy, hard-working and a good cook, his situation could be ameliorated. He could rent a larger flat and take in boarders."

As Mendres points out, workers clashed among themselves. The groups that vied for influence were the anarchists, the socialists and the Labour Zionists (to whom Mendres was sympathetic). Socialist and anarchist trade union leaders claimed that Zionists used pro-Israel propaganda "to dispel their hopes for... revolution."

Masthead of the first issue of the Keneder Adler, Aug. 30, 1907.

In 1902, when the socialists opened a store to sell the Jewish Daily Forward and Yiddish literature, they, in effect, created the first Jewish cultural centre in Montreal. Hershman's bookstore became a gathering place for immigrant Jewish intellectuals.

Shortly afterward, Montreal got another Jewish bookshop. It specialized in radical political literature. "While in the second bookstore socialist and anarchist theories and radical party politics were debated, in the first bookstore world politics were discussed." Mendres is mildly amused that the radical store, against all expectations, began to sell Jewish new year's cards, silk prayer shawls and other religious items.

Israel Mendres in 1930

Sensing a demand for secular Hebrew books, Hershman decided to open a store for Hebraists and maskilim. It was a short-lived venture.

Bookshops aside, the most important cultural institution of the era was the Jewish Public Library, founded in 1914.

The launching of the Keneder Adler in 1907 is the subject of a chapter in Montreal of Yesterday. It was, he reports, "a momentous occasion for the Jews of Montreal and the rest of Canadian Jewry." He wrote that "there was uncertainty regarding its viability...it was a risky undertaking as the population was too small to sustain a daily newwspaper. But [it] survived and proved invaluable in the formation of national cultural institutions and expanding the scope of organized Jewish life in Montreal."

When the 1920 San Remo conference adopted the 1917 Balfour Declaration, which recognized a Jewish homeland in Palestine, the Keneder Adler printed a special holiday edition in several colours.

Yiddish theatre flourished in Montreal, and the Monument National Theatre was its chief venue. According to Mendres, it provided the Jewish masses with entertainment, education and a social life. "For immigrants, an outing to the Yiddish theatre was a festive occasion. They would dress in their finest clothes as for a wedding."

Yiddish actors, from Jacob Adler to Bertha Kalish, enjoyed a privileged status. "Even the immigrants who came from large cities... were excited about these stars."

Since immigrants were unable to frequent the theatre often, because of the price of tickets, they went to movies more regularly. Mendres suspects that they had an ulterior motive. As he puts it: "On a wintry day, the cinema was very warm in comparison to the flats in the poor neighbourhoods where the newcomers then lived."

Judging by his observations, movies and theatre played a role in the ritual of courtship. "If a young man cast his eye on a girl he liked, he invited her to the cinema. Later he would ask her to the Yiddish theatre, when he had already decided that he would become her fiancé."

In closing, Mendres refers to anti-Semitic "street incidents" in Montreal, "academic" anti-Semitism among ultra-nationalist French Canadian intellectuals, and efforts to establish the Canadian Jewish Congress in 1919.

This, essentially, is where Montreal of Yesterday ends. Felsen is currently translating her grandfather's second volume of felletons, Between Two World Wars, originally published in the year Mendres died.

I look forward to reading it.

Radical Change in Spousal Support Law in Ontario: Uncertainty Reigns (Part 1 of 2)

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

The following article was written by Cheryl Goldhart, of the firm of Gowling Lafleur Henderson LLP. She is a colleague in the family bar with extensive experience in divorce matters. Cheryl specializes in negotiating complex agreements in all areas of family law. In addition to her considerable courtroom experience in the Toronto area, she is a family law instructor at the Bar Admission Court and was a past Chair of the Ontario Bar Association, Family Law Executive. Ms. Goldhart has written numerous articles for the Bar Admission Course, professional journals, periodicals and magazines.

Cheryl's text neatly summarizes a major dilemma for lawyers, Judges and parties in Ontario spousal support disputes. Although it was written for lawyers, I feel it has an important message for the general public, and am therefore presenting it here for your perusal.

In order to fully understand Cheryl's discussion of Miglin v. Miglin — a landmark case which recently went before the Ontario Court of Appeal and is now before the Supreme Court of Canada — you need to understand the "Pelech trilogy" of cases which preceded it.

Three Supreme Court cases, called Pelech, Richardson and Caron, created a certain legal test or "threshold". This legal test applied to people claiming spousal support, even though such people may have given up rights to make such a claim in a separation agreement or marriage (prenuptial) contract they had signed. The Supreme Court's test: can the person claiming spousal support in the face of such an agreement prove that (a) something has happened since the agreement was signed that is radical or exceptional, and (b) that such radical and exceptional events or new facts were caused by the marriage or something that happened as a result of the marriage. For instance, if, some time after the agreement was signed, a non-smoking woman became unexpectedly ill from lung cancer caused by her husband's heavy smoking habits, this "trilogy" of Supreme Court cases suggests that the Courts might be able to ignore the spousal support releases contained in the agreement that was signed. [A spousal support "release" is a contract wherein one spouse agrees to release the other spouse from the obligation to make spousal support payments; by signing this agreement, the party that has been receiving payments forever relinquishes her right to claim such payments]. The Courts could then possibly order spousal support in spite of the existence of this contract.

In summary, according to this legal test, once such an agreement is signed, a woman cannot simply make a claim based on need alone. The need must be related to the marriage and be something that was unforeseen and dramatically new in the woman's life. The Ontario Court of Appeal in Miglin appears to have changed all this and made it much easier for women in Ontario to make a fresh claim for support. Whether the Ontario Court of Appeal was correct in doing so will be determined in a few months by the Supreme Court of Canada.

MIGLIN V. MIGLIN: WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

by Cheryl Goldhart

When I went to law school, I learned that a contract was a contract. If there was offer and acceptance, as well as consideration passing between the parties, then a contract was made. Sure, there were circumstances which could defeat the validity or enforceability of the contract, but assuming all the elements of a valid and enforceable contract were in place, it was presumed that one could rely on the deal.

Imagine my surprise when I became a family lawyer and discovered that if the contracting parties happen to be spouses, then the rules are somehow different. This is especially true in the case of spousal support.

A contract for spousal support was a contract as long as there wasn't some radical, unforeseen change in circumstances, after the contract was made, that was causally connected to the marriage.

When is a contract not a contract?

That's what the Pelech trilogy stood for. So, as family lawyers, we were relatively secure in our drafting of agreements and with advising our clients. We could tell them that unless something really horrible and awful happens — something we couldn't even imagine (because it was unforeseen) and it was somehow connected to the marriage — you, client, are safe from future claims.

In 2001, the Ontario Court of Appeal in Miglin v. Miglin put an end to that. The second-last nail in the coffin of reliable agreements has been hammered. We can only wait for the Supreme Court of Canada to bury them once and for all, as Mr. Miglin has been granted leave to appeal to that Court.

Justice Abella for the Ontario Court of Appeal in Miglin decided that the test for a variation of the terms of an agreement which settled the issue of spousal support, as set out in the Pelech trilogy, is dead. There is a new, much lower, threshold to overcome if a party wishes to revisit the issue of spousal support following the making of an agreement. One needs only to establish a "material change". Based on the facts of Miglin, the circumstances that will constitute a material change do not appear to be particularly onerous.

Amicable relationship turns sour

In Miglin, the parties owned and worked together at a well-known lodge north of Toronto. Upon their separation in 1993, they entered into three agreements: (1) a parenting agreement; (2) a separation agreement which contained a full, final and comprehensive spousal support release (the kind we were all told to draft in those days upon the release of support); and (3) a five-year consulting agreement which was renewable from time to time on consent. The consulting agreement provided that the husband (who kept the business) pay the wife $15,000 per year through the business. These payments (as well as the child support set out in the separation agreement) were subject to cost of living indexing.

Following the parties' divorce, things changed. The otherwise amicable relationship between the parties turned sour, apparently at the hands of the husband. He was upset with the wife for, among other things, moving to the suburbs and converting to a new religion. [John Syrtash's note: She became a Jew]. He interfered with the wife's time with the children and made unreasonable demands. He then terminated the payments under the consulting agreement and generally made the wife's life miserable. He was what I call a "bad man". The trial Judge and the Court of Appeal certainly saw him that way, although they did not use such a description.

Notwithstanding the agreements entered into by the parties, the wife returned to Court requesting support and, upon her application, Justice Tobias at trial awarded her spousal support of $4,400 per month for five years and child support of $3,000 per month. Mr. Miglin appealed.

Behaviour constitutes "material change"

On the issue of spousal support, the trial Judge and the Court of Appeal found that the consulting agreement was "thinly disguised spousal support", notwithstanding the release in the separation agreement. Thus, the facts of this case are not ideal for the consideration of the effect of a full, final and comprehensive spousal support release, since there really wasn't one in this case. Putting that technicality aside for a moment, the Court of Appeal examined the Pelech trilogy and determined that because it was decided under the 1968 Divorce Act and not the 1985 Divorce Act, it was no longer good law. Thus, the threshold for varying the terms of the valid separation agreement which finally settled the issue of spousal support was no longer a radical change in circumstances causally connected to the marriage.

The Pelech trilogy was decided on the modest wording of s. 11 of the Divorce Act, 1968. The current Divorce Act (1985) provides a much more thorough scheme as to the objectives of awarding spousal support in general (s. 15) and the variation of support where a previous order has been made (s. 17).

The Court of Appeal in Miglin could not reconcile a higher threshold for the variation of an agreement (as required in the Pelech trilogy) than for the variation of an order. The threshold should be the same and it should be simply a material change. In Miglin, it appears to me that the change which allowed the wife to overcome the threshold was the fact that the husband became a "bad man", making the wife's life miserable and resulting in her having increased child care responsibilities. According to Miglin, once the threshold is overcome, the four pillars or objectives of spousal support set out in s. 15.2 (6) must be established. In the December 6 issue, we'll explore these four objectives and their implications.

DEC. 6 ISSUE: The implications of "Miglin" on family law practitioners and their clients.

Marcus chairing major fund-raising conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Paul Marcus wants to encourage members of the Jewish community to take part in an upcoming major fund-raising conference he is chairing.

Paul Marcus

"Fund-raising is becoming more and more sophisticated, more and more competitive, so the general community, including the Jewish community, has faced the double impact of government cutbacks," said Marcus, senior vice-president of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto. "Since charities are taking greater steps to raise private funds and to engage volunteers, I think donors are demanding much more accountability."

Jewish fund-raisers, whether from large or small organizations, face the same issues as their counterparts in the general community, he said.

The conference he is working on, Orchestrating Philanthropic Greatness, will be hosted by the 900-member Greater Toronto chapter of the Association of Fundraising Professionals (AFP). It will take place Nov. 28 to Dec. 1 at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

The conference, for which about 700 people have already registered, is the largest conference and trade show of its kind in Canada, Marcus said. "It provides educational opportunities at all levels. Whether you're new to the field or a seasoned professional, there's a place for you at the conference… It's an intensive professional educational opportunity."

This year, he noted, the conference, which is geared to the needs of Canadian fund-raisers and open to both AFP members and non-members, offers a new track for professionals with 10 or more years of experience.

Marcus – who was director of international affairs for B'nai Brith Canada and then director of development for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto before joining Mount Sinai four years ago – is enthused about the "quite international and quite impressive" lineup of speakers. It includes journalist Pamela Wallin and former CFL football star Terry Evanshen, who lost most of his memory after being seriously injured in a 1988 car accident.

Seminars on such issues as direct mail fund-raising will address the impact of the Sept. 11 terror attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. At a recent American conference, Marcus heard about a charity that is already using postcards in the wake of the U.S. anthrax scares. "Others are making greater use of e-business," he said.

For further information about the conference, go to www.afptoronto.org.

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 9% Plus

With interest rates at their lowest level in 40 years and stock markets in the doldrums, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield on your investment.

Consider the following example, which compares the investment of $200,000 in a GIC at 5% with an insured annuity, for a man aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	10,000	23,500
Taxable Income	10,000	4,500
Tax (50%)	5,000	2,250
After Tax Income	5,000	21,250
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,250
Spendable Income	5,000	10,000
Gross Equivalent Yield	5%	10%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Effective improved yield on investment = 100%

Jewish Life

Israel needs grassroots Diaspora support

By MICHAEL ELIESEN

Guest Voice

I recently returned from a UIA Solidarity Mission to Israel that was one of the most exhilarating trips of my life. We were extremely fortunate to meet with many extraordinary people, including Russian olim, Ethiopian children, Gilo residents, high-ranking military leaders, leading journalists and MK members. We also had a private meeting with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

I am pleased to report that while there are obvious "hot spots" to be avoided, and the threat of suicide bombers is always a factor, our group did not experience any threat of any kind. We felt safe and secure during our entire visit.

I came back with an enormous amount of inspiration and determination to support Israel in a variety of ways.

Firstly, I feel that our Jewish community must demonstrate our commitment to Israel by actively participating in missions of all kinds. Everywhere we travelled, people met us with gratitude and appreciation for our support and for our listening to their daily struggles. We cannot and should not allow the fear of terrorism to stop us from maintaining relationships with Jews in our homeland. They need us to be there to know we care, and they need our financial support to help boost their decimated tourism industry.

By attending missions, we are also able to learn in much greater detail about Israel's hardships on a first-hand basis. It is one thing to read about the daily fighting that goes on in Gilo, and quite another to sit down with residents who describe how they fear for their children's safety, or to listen to Russian students describe how they view their future after having their friends killed in the Tel Aviv disco bombing.

On a political level, missions allow us to witness and participate in the intense debate between the left- and right-wing philosophies that divide Israel over how to best achieve peace in the region. After hearing numerous representatives from both sides, I realize that most of us rush to make judgments without ever really getting a true understanding of what it is like to be an Israeli in these difficult times.

Israel needs all the PR support it can get. In fact, Jews everywhere need to play a much larger role in speaking out against the hatred that is being spewed around the globe. There are so many important stories that either are being suppressed or are receiving very little attention. From violent anti-Semitism in Durban to "the anatomy of child sacrifice" among Palestinians, Jews everywhere need to educate themselves and speak out in greater numbers. We cannot allow our professional organizations to do all the work; instead, they must be supported by widespread grassroots participation from Jewish communities throughout the world.

An alternative to Cuba

By MURRAY TEITEL

Guest Voice

Readers casting about for a warm place to spend their upcoming winter vacation should be aware of a letter written by Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat on June 16.

Its recipient has a lot in common with Arafat. Both profess to champion the cause of oppressed people, all the while contributing to the problem by oppressing their own people through brutal and autocratic dictatorships.

The letter thanked Cuban leader Fidel Castro who, two days earlier, had led thousands of Cubans in a political rally that ended a week of official acts in Cuba to show solidarity with the Palestinians and to accuse Israel of a policy of "genocide" against the Palestinians backed by the United States.

"With deep emotion we saw the image of your excellency with the Palestinian shawl on your shoulders at the head of a popular demonstration of solidarity with our heroic people's struggle... I consider this show of strength and unbreakable friendship... as a strong and effective message from a dear world leader who enjoys great international prestige... I thank you for this brave position against the Israeli aggression towards our people."

In his Sept. 1 address to the United Nations' World Conference Against Racism, Castro again claimed Israel was committing genocide against the Palestinians. The third sentence of his speech rambled on as follows:

"Neither has anyone the right to set preconditions to this conference or urge it to avoid the discussion of historical responsibility, fair compensation or the way we decide to rate the dreadful genocide perpetrated, at this very moment, against our Palestinian brothers by extreme right leaders who, in alliance with the hegemonic superpower, pretend to be acting on behalf of another people which throughout almost 2,000 years was the victim of the most fierce persecution, discrimination and injustice that history has known."

Castro again claimed Israel was committing genocide against the Palestinians

When he finally neared the end of his remarks, Castro urged the delegates to "put an end to the ongoing genocide against the Palestinian people."

I tried to obtain precise figures on the importance of Canadian tourism to the Cuban economy. I called the embassy in Ottawa and was directed to the tourist office in Toronto. The person there did not know and directed me to the consulate. A Web site supposed to contain the information was largely devoted to Castro's speeches. However, I found out that in 1996, tourism replaced sugar as Cuba's No. 1 industry, that among all nationalities, Canadians are the most frequent visitors, and that an estimated 370,000 Canadians went to Cuba last year.

Cuba, which severed diplomatic relations with Israel in the wake of the 1973 Yom Kippur War, has in the past proved willing to adjust its policies. In 1995, it began permitting Jews to emigrate to Israel in significant numbers as part of a strategy to get the United States to lift crippling economic sanctions. In the following five years, 400 Jews obtained Cuban exit visas and went to Israel on Canadian travel documents.

Few non-Islamic governments are as virulently anti-Israel as Cuba's. Fortunately, for those who would find it abhorrent to support such a regime with their vacation dollars, there is a good alternative destination which, though not quite as warm as Cuba this time of year, will send its visitors back to Canada much more reinvigorated and refreshed than Cuba could ever hope to: Israel.

Jewish Life

Jewish parenting, part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's probably one of the most wonderful and important words in the Yiddish language: mensch.

Although English may not have a single word comparable to mensch, I found a Web site that does a pretty good job defining it:

"To be a mensch has nothing to do with success, wealth, status. The key to being 'a real mensch' is nothing less than character: rectitude, dignity, a sense of what is right, responsible, decorous" [http://members.tde.com/ben/phyllis/homily4.html].

Now that we've defined what a mensch is comes the next challenge: raising one. Today, some insights on bringing up a mensch from the World Wide Web.

Aish HaTorah's parenting page is called "How to raise a mensch." There are articles on over thirty thought-provoking topics. Here's a sampling:

• On cultivating kindness: "Raising a mensch is more than training our kids to say please and thank you; it's nurturing the Divine image within our children. Instilling the trait of kindness is one of the primary ways of being like God, whose essence is giving."

• On discipline: "Always keep in mind that the punishment is for the benefit of the child, not for you. This requires a healthy dose of emotional objectivity... Your son or daughter is not yours, but is a trust given to you by God. Raising her well is how you show that God's trust was well-placed."

• On accepting imperfection in your children: "Feel good about your and your child's accomplishments. That's the antidote to perfectionism. Revel in the happiness of accomplishment... don't discount the small ones... Your child is not a nachas machine" [http://aish.com/family/mensch/].

Psychologist John Gottman also has a few suggestions. To raise a mensch, he says, parents must encourage their child's emotional growth. The first step is to look at your own parenting style, which Gottman divides parents into four categories:

• Dismissing – these parents ignore or minimize a child's feelings, especially negative ones;

• Disapproving – these parents believe emotions make people weak;

• Laissez-faire – these parents think the only possible reaction to negative emotions is "to ride them out"; and

• Emotional coaches – these parents value a child's negative emotions as an opportunity for intimacy.

It is critical for parents to set an example, Gottman says. "Parents who want to teach their children about kindness, empathy and compassion must actually show those qualities toward other human beings, including the children themselves" [http://www.jewishsf.com/bk970530/sfraise.htm].

New York Senator Hillary Clinton popularized the African saying, "It takes a village to raise a child." In the essay "It takes a kehilah to make a mensch," Jeffrey Kress and Maurice Elias look at what responsibility the Jewish community must play in raising and nurturing its children [http://www.rci.rutgers.edu/~melias/JENrevise.pdf].

In her poem, Lech Lecha – A Missive to Parents, Susan Edelstein suggests that just as Abraham was instructed to go forth, Abraham's descendents have a responsibility to go out and help the world:

They should go from their "baseball game/... horseback riding lesson/... dance recital/... gymnastics meet/... To be a light unto the nations/ To perform acts of loving kindness/ To welcome the stranger/ To love your neighbours as yourself/ To say 100 blessings every day/ To feed the hungry/ To clothe the naked/ To console the bereaved/ To be holy because God is holy/ To make peace where there is strife/ To study Torah/ To choose life" [http://www.clickonjudaism.com/pages/parenting07.html].

In an article about the importance of bringing up children to be mensches, Rabbi Donald Rossoff writes that he was given a bumper sticker that says, "My kid is a mensch," a reaction to those bumper stickers that boast that a child is an honours student or a great athlete.

He writes, "But the question comes up, 'Which one is it? Which of my four kids is the mensch?' I have a couple of answers to the question, depending on my mood. My usual answers are either, 'I'd like to think they all are [mensches]' or 'They take turns'" [http://uahc.org/congs/nj/nj007/yk2000_ 2.htm].

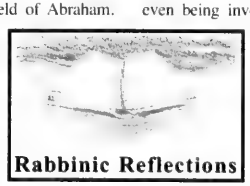
Justice, not pacifism

By RABBI JASON ROSENBERG



One of the names for God which we find in our siddur is "Magen Avraham" – the shield of Abraham. That name finds its origins in Lech Lecha, a parshah which we read several weeks ago. In it, God says to Avram, "Do not fear, Avram, because I am your shield" (Genesis 15:1). What was it, our sages ask, that Avram had to fear?

One answer comes from Bereshit Rabbah. Not long before this episode, Avram had been engaged in a righteous war to save his nephew Lot. The midrash teaches that Avram was worried that there might have been one innocent or God-fearing man whom he killed. A moral man such as Avram knew that even in the most just of wars, people who don't deserve to be killed will be killed, and that weighed heavily on his mind.

Rashi takes this worry one step further. He teaches that Avram wasn't just worried about the righteous who may have died, but about every single life which he took, even those who "deserved" to die. Avram knew that even being involved in a milchemet mitzvah, a war in which he was commanded to fight, didn't mean that killing came without consequences.

Judaism is not a pacifist religion – a religion that holds fighting and violence as invalid options. In the Babylonian Talmud, we learn quite simply that if someone tries to kill you, you must kill them first. This is more than practical advice – it's based in a philosophy of justice. We have an obligation to stand up to injustice, wherever we encounter it, even it it's directed at us. If we do nothing to stop those who would perpetrate evil, then we are, in a small way, responsible for that evil. The fact that we were the targets of that evil doesn't take away that obligation from us. This is true not only in personal matters, but in broader ones as well.

As was alluded to above, there are wars which are a mitzvah, a religious obligation. We don't have to look far to find examples in our own world. The war which America is currently leading against terrorism, and the war which Israel is fighting in order to protect itself, most certainly qualify. These are wars which must be fought – it would be a great injustice to not engage in them, whatever those who call for "peace at all costs" would have you believe.

That doesn't mean that these are good wars. No war is good. The simple fact is that every single person who is killed in these battles, from the most innocent of bystanders to the most evil of perpetrators, have one thing in common: they are all human beings, made in the image of God. And every time we kill one of them, we are lessened. We move a step away from the people who we wish to be. So let us follow our patriarch's example: even as we engage in the wars we must fight, let us never stop praying for peace.

Chinese academic Guang a specialist in Jewish studies

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Pan Guang is that rarity of rarities.

In China, the world's most populous nation, he is one of only 20 to 30 academic specialists currently working in Jewish studies.

Guang, the director of the Centre for International Studies in Shanghai, was here last week to deliver lectures at York University and the Chinese Cultural Centre of Greater Toronto.

"The topic of Jews in China has become hot, though in some parts of China people know little about Jews," said Guang, a 54-year-old scholar whose specialties include Israel and the Arab world.

Pan Guang

Guang's institute, situated in the Shanghai Academy of Social Science, houses the Centre of Jewish Studies, of which he is dean.

Established in 1988, the centre sponsors lectures on Jewish and Israeli topics, organizes conferences and sets up tours for foreign dignitaries.

There are identical centres in Beijing, Nanjing and Qunming.

In Shanghai, Guang has personally guided several Israeli prime ministers and presidents: Yitzhak Rabin, Benjamin Netanyahu, Chaim Herzog and Ezer Weizman.

He also showed Shimon Peres around when he was foreign minister, and Ariel Sharon when he was minister of national infrastructure.

"More and more Chinese people are interested in Jews and Israel," said Guang, a historian and political scientist who wears several hats.

In addition to being vice-chair of the Shanghai Jewish Studies Association, he is director of The Chinese Society for Middle East Studies.

Guang's newest book, The Jews in China, was published last month in Chinese and English editions.

It covers the Jewish experience in China – from the settlement of Persian merchants in Kaifeng in the eighth century to the arrival of German and Austrian refugees in Shanghai in the 1930s.

Guang is also the author or editor of The Revitalization of Jewish People, Jewish Civilization and The Jews in Shanghai.

His scholarly articles run the gamut from Notes on Britain's Policies Towards Palestine, 1897-1948 to The Emergence of Early Zionism and its Ideological Origins.

In 1996, he received a Canadian government grant to finance his research on Jewish families in Canada whose roots are partially in Shanghai. He spent five weeks in Canada, talking to members of about 100 such families.

Born in Shanghai, Guang has delved into Jewish history for the past 22 years. His interest in Jews – and Israel – was aroused by Jewish neighbours.

He estimates that China is home to approximately 7,000 Jews: 6,000 in Hong Kong, 200 in Shanghai, 200 in Beijing and about 500 elsewhere.

Ninety percent or more of the Jewish residents in China are Ashkenazim. They are originally from the United States, Australia, Europe and Israel. They are mainly businesspeople, students and diplomats.

Serving their religious needs are several functioning synagogues in Hong Kong and Shanghai.

Apart from an acquaintanceship with Jewish neighbours, Guang was drawn to Jews by indirect means.

His father, born in Vietnam, was the butt of anti-Chinese discrimination, which Guang compares to anti-Semitism.

As a student, Guang studied the similarities between these prejudices, as well as the position of Chinese and Jewish communities outside their ancestral lands.

He soon discovered that Jews and Chinese shared an affinity for family and education, and had both been singled out for persecution.

"The Chinese, like the Jews, have suffered much devastation. This has given the Chinese people deep sympathy for the Jewish people."

Guang, whose interests encompass the Holocaust, explained that anti-Semitism never took root in China because Confucianism, unlike Christianity, never demonized Jews.

Chinese universities do not as yet have departments of Jewish studies, but courses on Jewish history have been introduced.

At the Centre of Jewish Studies, the most popular courses deal with modern-day Israel and international terrorism.

Before China formally established diplomatic relations with Israel in January 1992, there were few opportunities for academics like himself to study Israel on a systematic basis.

"It was quite a sensitive topic," he said.

Since then, the field has been thrown wide open, and Guang has taken advantage of the new situation.

Guang has visited Israel three times, having been a visiting scholar at Bar Ilan University and the Hebrew University.

China's bilateral relations with Israel, he believes, "are going very well." They enjoy "fruitful co-operation" in areas ranging from trade to the military.

And, he added, both nations share a common interest in combating Islamic fundamentalism, which, in China, manifests itself in the western part of the country.

Ten years ago, China was pro-Palestinian. Today, he noted, "we're neutral."

Before the advent of diplomatic relations, virtually the only kind of stories Chinese newspapers printed about Israel turned on its occupation of the West Bank, Gaza Strip and Golan Heights.

Now, he suggested, the coverage is far more balanced. Zionism is favourably compared to Chinese nationalism and books by Abba Eban and about Golda Meir have been published.

Guang is familiar with a smattering of Hebrew, notably the word "shalom," but his Yiddish is, for all intents and purposes, non-existent.

"I know one Yiddish phrase," he said, a smile wreathing his face. "A grosse dank, thank you very much."

Radical Muslim anti-westernism said serious threat

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The "real enemy" in the Muslim world today is radical anti-westernism, an American scholar and newspaper columnist said in a recent lecture.

This ideology is spearheaded by Iraq and Islamic fundamentalism, said Daniel Pipes in a talk at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation.

Pipes is director of the Middle East Forum, based in Washington, D.C. A publicly-supported, non-profit organization, it works to define and promote U.S. interests in the Middle East.

Pipes, whose right-of-centre articles appear in The Jerusalem Post and the National Post, is also outgoing editor of Middle East Quarterly.

Describing Iraq as "a classic totalitarian state" and its leader, Saddam Hussein, as a latter-day Joseph Stalin, Pipes said Hussein's overarching goal is power and his means of preserving it are weapons of mass destruction and vast oil reserves.

"He's becoming an ever greater threat," Pipes warned, adding that the West is not fully supporting the Iraqi opposition movement.

Calling radical Islam, or Islamism, a form of "Islamic fascism," he said its chief ideological objective is to restructure Muslim societies.

Such societies already exist in Iran, Afghanistan and Sudan.

Pipes said 10 percent to 15 percent of Muslims identify with and support Islamism.

In democratic countries, governments should strive to weaken them, he said, but in radical nations, they should be crushed.

Animated by historical grievances and feeling under siege by the West, Islamism gained its first firm foothold in Iran with Islamic revolution in 1979.

Iran then declared war on the United States, Pipes said.

But Islamism has been in combat with the West since the formation of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt in the 1920s, he noted.

Islamism opened its anti-Western campaign of violence with the 1983 attacks against the U.S. embassy and marine barracks in Beirut.

Before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in Manhattan and Washington, D.C., 600 American citizens had been killed by Islamist assaults, Pipes said.

Despite these casualties, there was never a real sense of urgency or alarm in the United States.

Pipes said he feels safer after Sept. 11 because the U.S. government has finally begun to counter international terrorism.

But he warned that Islamic terrorists may take their violence to a new level: bioterror.

Pipes said anti-Semitism today is mainly a Muslim phenomenon, with Christian anti-Semitism having been shunted to the fringes.

"Christian anti-Semitism is yesterday's story. Muslim anti-Semitism is tomorrow's."

Jewish organizations, he said, "should wake up to it."

The coalition Washington has assembled to fight Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda terrorist network and the Taliban regime in Afghanistan has not really affected the United States' basic relationship with Israel.

"It hasn't touched the fundamentals," he said. "There is not much to worry about."

Pipes said the current intifadah has not interfered with the flow of daily life in Israel, but it has devastated the Palestinian economy.

Urging Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to adopt "a more active" policy toward Palestinian terrorism, he called on Israel to assassinate Sheik Ahmed Yassin, the spiritual leader of Hamas, the Islamic Resistance Movement.

Esther Wachsman, a speaker who preceded Pipes, lost her 19-year-old son, an Israeli soldier in an elite commando unit, at the hands of Hamas.

Nachshon Wachsman was kidnapped, and subsequently murdered, in October 1994.

Daniel Pipes

In measured tones, Wachsman, whose parents are Holocaust survivors, told of her ordeal after his kidnapping near Ben-Gurion Airport.

She said the mastermind of her son's murder, Mohammed Dief, a Hamas leader, is still at large.

Wachsman, who immigrated to Israel from the United States in 1969, scolded Washington for its hypocritical criticism of Israeli raids into Palestinian autonomous areas while America fights a war in Afghanistan, thousands of miles from its shores.

Wachsman's companion, Yehudit Dasberg, a settler from Gush Etzion whose daughter and son-in-law were murdered in a roadside ambush, delivered a grim account of life in the West Bank today.

The event was sponsored by the Toronto Zionist Council.

Rabin's legacy of peace recalled on Remembrance Day

By REVA KAISER WEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Putting aside their philosophical differences, nine local Jewish and Israeli organizations came together on Remembrance Day to honour the late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

The evening program, which commemorated the anniversary of Rabin's assassination on Nov. 4, 1995, was sponsored by Habonim Dror Zionist Youth Organization, Hashomer Hatzair Youth Organization, Camp Shomria, Bnei Akiva of Toronto, BBYO, Na'amat Canada, the Labour Zionist Alliance, the Consulate General of Israel and the Jewish Agency for Israel.

A collection of songs and recitations, including In Flanders Fields and the eulogies delivered at Rabin's funeral by former U.S. president Bill Clinton and Rabin's granddaughter Noa Ben Artzi, venerated Rabin's efforts and accomplishments in pursuit of peace for the State of Israel.

"Rabin was, and will remain in our hearts, a soldier of peace," said keynote speaker Maya Goldenberg, an Israeli professor of political science.

Goldenberg shared memories of the Rabin she knew while working in his government as an advisor to the minister of industry and trade. In addition to his military prowess and political leadership, Goldenberg said the late prime minister's attentiveness to detail made an impact on her.

"[Rabin] took every issue and subject he dealt with seriously and deeply... he was never caught unprepared."

She recalled a meeting Rabin attended with representatives from the ministries of finance and industry and trade on funding for the Israeli film industry. All in attendance were impressed by Rabin's appreciation of the film industry and his meticulous research of the issues. "Rabin, the great commander, showed great sensitivity to any issue he dealt with," Goldenberg said.

Zahavit Ben Hillel, the vice-consul of Israel in Toronto, spoke about Rabin's legacy and the continuing quest for peace.

"Today the dream of peace may seem overwhelming and difficult," she said, especially after Sept. 11.

"We must remain resolute in our goal... for peace and a peaceful future for our children."

Two Canadian teens serve on BBYO executive

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Canadian teens are serving on the international board of the 20,000-member B'nai B'rith Youth Organization (BBYO) for the 2001-2002 year.

Joanna Haber, an 18-year-old Montrealer, was elected international s'ganit (vice-president) of B'nai B'rith Girls, and Daniel Sacks, 16, of Vancouver, was elected Grand Aleph Moreh (international membership vice-president) of Aleph Zadik Aleph (AZA) at their respective international conventions earlier this year.

Joanna Haber

Haber, a second-year CEGEP student at Dawson Junior College, said in a phone interview that her duties mainly involve programming. She is in regular phone and e-mail contact with the vice-presidents of the more than 40 regions worldwide.

They happen to be Haber's counterparts, because she also serves as s'ganit of BBG's Eastern Canada Region (serving Montreal and Ottawa, with just over 100 members).

"Basically I'm there [as international s'ganit] as a resource." Haber is hoping to take part in a BBYO "Passover Ambassador" trip to Bulgaria, which has its own chapter of the youth organization, to learn about Bulgarian Jewish traditions and share some from here.

She will also plan an International Convention with her AZA counterpart.

Daniel Sacks

Haber initially got involved with BBG because her best friend's older sister, a BBYO member, persuaded the two girls to attend a cookie-baking program. "We both found our niche. This is my fifth year – hers too."

BBG runs a lot of social and sports programs, both for individual chapters and city- or region-wide, said Haber.

Community service is also a "big aspect" of membership, said Haber. Aside from helping make up Rosh Hashanah and Passover baskets, her chapter is implementing ongoing community volunteer service at the Golden Age Nursing Home.

Food sometimes plays a role in programs, like the one she attended initially. In one member-in-training program, ice cream and sprinkles were used to demonstrate different aspects of membership, she said. "Then everyone got to eat their sundaes."

Sacks, like Haber, serves double duty for BBYO. Apart from his international duties, he is regional president of the 250-member Evergreen Region, which is active in British Columbia, Washington and Oregon.

The region is considered, at least financially, American, said Sacks, but programming has not been affected by BBYO's recent separation from B'nai B'rith in the United States. (In Canada, BBYO became independent of B'nai Brith Canada in the early 1990s.)

A native of Toronto who moved to Vancouver in 1989, the Grade 12 student at Collingwood High School was "recruited" to the youth organization five years ago in his Hebrew school class.

A unique opportunity for Jewish youth

"I've always enjoyed it. The social aspect is a lot of fun, and also being able to learn new things in terms of leadership and planning programs."

His chapter, which has about 16 male and female members, takes its name, "P'sagot Teumot," from Vancouver's Twin Peaks, the Lions mountains on the North Shore.

"We try to cover a lot of different things – community service, social, athletic, Judaic," said Sacks.

In his capacity as international Grand Aleph Moreh, Sacks deals with membership, recruitment, retention and education of members. "My main focus is keeping in touch with the council and regional [membership chairs] as well as planning the chapter leadership training conferences that we do every year with my female 'co.'"

His regional experience has given him a good base for his international position, he feels, because the members are spread out geographically, with some cities a 13 to 14-hour drive from others. BBYO, Sacks said, is "a unique opportunity for Jewish youth in that so much of it is youth-led, youth-planned and youth-run."

Jews need to lead by example: Donniel Hartman

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The current war is about religion, not terrorism, says Rabbi Donniel Hartman, co-director of The Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem.

"We're not fighting terrorism. We're fighting a much more deep and significant battle over the role religion plays in our lives," said Rabbi Hartman, speaking at a recent lecture co-sponsored by Holy Blossom Temple and Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

The Shalom Hartman Institute, founded by Rabbi Hartman's father David and named for his grandfather, is a leader in the field of pluralistic Jewish thought and Judaic research, and a major centre for rabbinic, teacher and lay leadership education.

We have built an international coalition, but we have yet to come to terms with the type of coalition we must build, Rabbi Hartman said.

Religions do not warrant a place in the coalition because they have a great past or because they are powerful, he said. "It has to be earned by truly transforming a religious ideology into a civilized one."

The three fundamental principles at the source of the religious war are messianism and redemption; certainty; and moral exclusiveness, he said. "Where you stand on these issues makes the difference on whose side you are on. You are on the side of the coalition, or on the side of the enemy."

It would be foolish to ask religions such as Christianity or Islam to give up the tradition of messianism and redemption, he said, "because it is deep in the fabric of what their religious tradition is about. A yearning for the redemptive era is too deep in the human psyche.

"I am not asking for their traditions to reject messianism but to change they way they deal with it. They should accept the notion that messianism and redemption must be treated as the Holy of Holies – a place that is more sacred than any place on earth, the place where God is closest to man," he said.

People can sanctify and deify messianism and redemption by declaring that it is not a place that they can control or inhabit. "We need to understand that messianic theories have created forces of profound evil.

Donniel Hartman

"The minute someone thinks they understand what it takes to be redeemed, we have at that moment the potential for evil. We have put in place the vision that the ends justify any means, and by definition, those means will include moral depravity."

Another source of evil, said Rabbi Hartman, is the belief that religion provides certainty. "The first and most important aspect of a person of faith has nothing to do with how you pray or what you eat, it is an understanding of who you are not.

"The minute a human being believes they can touch certainty, is the minute they forget they are not God. The minute they have certainty, is the minute they believe they can [fly] a plane into a building," he said.

"We have to understand that life with God means an understanding that we are not God. The fundamental lesson of Shabbat is to train you to understand that you are not in control of the world or of other humans."

When a religion adopts the third fundamental principle, moral exclusiveness, said Rabbi Hartman, "it is creating a tradition which can go any way it wants. When you only talk to your own faith, there are no limits to where you can go.

"To love God is to hear other people and to live in the midst of the world. When religious traditions feel that there are no critics, [they] are a force for potential evil," he said.

We want our children to walk freely in Jerusalem, he said, but we know that we cannot defend them solely by the strength of borders and by the skill of military personnel.

"We have to stop fooling ourselves. This is not a battle for armies; it is much deeper. No one can fight other religious traditions. Unless each religion recognizes that it wants to be part of the coalition, unless it is willing to uproot [its traditions], it is a foundation for evil."

We cannot correct other people's religions, Rabbi Hartman said, but we can serve as an example. "I can make sure my religion is correct."

We have been in desperate pain in the past number of months, he said, but we must not perceive this pain as a necessary model for the future.

"We can live in a different world, but only if we set our forces in the right direction. To be a Jew is to have the courage to set [our] sights on a dream [we] want to have. While we have to check evil, we also have to concentrate on where we want to be.

"Our job as Jews is to commit our religion to be a force for good. That is the battle we have to fight. That is the world for which we yearn," he said.

Building to house services for people with brain injuries

TORONTO — The Community Head Injury Resource Service of Toronto (CHIRS), along with Ontario Attorney General David Young and Willowdale city councillor John Filion, recently kicked off construction of a unique four-storey building.

The building – at 62 Finch Ave. W., at the corner of Kensington Avenue, in Willowdale – will house CHIRS's specialized programs and services, as well as administrative offices. The new facility will also have a much-needed residential floor for supervised group living.

"I am very excited about the capability of this new building to deliver top notch services to members of our community, addressing the barriers that exist for people who have acquired a brain injury," said Young.

CHIRS is a registered not-for-profit charity that helps people with an acquired brain injury (ABI) maximize their potential for independent living by providing them and their families with ongoing support in the community.

Formerly known as Ashby House, CHIRS is a multi-service agency that was started in 1978 as the first community-based brain injury program in North America.

The CHIRS Club lets people take part in a variety of work and play activities and provides a place of understanding, support and friendship for people with brain injuries.

The building will be accessible by subway and close to other community services. Construction is expected to be completed by March 2002.

Yemenites reject commission's findings

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A blue-ribbon Israeli commission looking into the disappearances of hundreds of Yemenite children released its findings recently, and they show there was no government plot to abduct and sell the youngsters to adoptive parents.

But the decision was roundly criticized by the Israeli Yemenite community, with the mayor of Rosh Ha'ayin, Yigal Yosef, who was a member of an earlier investigatory committee, calling it a "whitewash."

Toronto resident Moshe Behar isn't surprised by the commission's findings.

Even when he testified before the panel three years ago, he had no faith it would reveal the truth. The issue, he said, is too volatile, too embarrassing to the government of Israel and "too many people are living who were part of the scandal."

At stake for the commission was the allegation that from 1948 to 1954 Israeli authorities removed healthy Yemenite children from their parents and sold them for $5,000 apiece to childless Jewish couples in the Diaspora.

The commission, which investigated the issue for seven years, reported that it could find no "all-inclusive establishment plot" to remove Yemenite children from their immigrant parents for adoption by childless families.

It found that documentation exists for 972 of 1,033 missing children, that five missing babies were found alive and that it could not determine what happened in 56 other cases. In those cases, the commission said it was possible that individual social workers handed the children over for adoption, but there was no official Israeli government policy to do so.

The inquiry heard testimony from 900 family members of missing children plus another 150 witnesses. It was also authorized to examine adoption files. Almost one-third (231) of the cases it examined concerned children from other communities, although most were refugees from Arab and North African countries.

Among Yemenites, the commission found most of the disappearances occurred from 1948 to 1951. Families living in immigration camps at that time were forced to place their children in baby houses and were often unable to maintain contact with them.

Afterwards, there was a lack of organized procedures to maintain contact between the families and authorities, the commission stated.

The commission found that if there was a delay by the families in visiting their children, authorities assumed the children had been abandoned. No special efforts to locate parents were made by authorities. If children died, they were buried without the parents' knowledge and, in effect, disappeared.

Behar is convinced he is one of the snatched children and in recent years, he has been able to track down his birth mother in Israel, who met him in secret lest her husband and family learn about her past. His birth father, who never married his birth mother, avoids him totally. Neither want their current lives disrupted.

His mother explained that he was born out of wedlock and quickly removed by social workers.

"Big people came and took you away. I didn't even give you milk," she told him.

His mother was later told he had been taken to a hospital and that he died there.

When he tracked down a social worker familiar with the case, he was told "off the record" that he had been put up for adoption for $5,000. The social worker, concerned about her job, would never tell that to the commission, he said.

Behar has no confidence in the inquiry's report. Like Yemenite critics in Israel, he believes politics played a role in its decision.

"There's enough evidence but they tried to keep everything quiet. It's too embarrassing.

"I knew the Israeli government would try to deny it, but it did happen. It happened to me."

His testimony before the three-person panel was disappointing.

"They shot me down," he said. "The only way is to spend millions of dollars and fight them in court, and that's gambling."

"What can I do about it?" he continued. "What's done is done. The milk has been spilled."

Holocaust holds lessons for future, Christian scholar says

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If we don't effectively memorialize the Holocaust, in 45 years it will have been reduced to merely a historical event devoid of emotional impact or importance, warns Stephen Smith, founder and director of the Beth Shalom Holocaust Centre in Nottingham, England.

"Saying never again is not enough," he said. "We owe it to the victims and our children's children to get it right."

Smith, a Christian scholar of religion, gave the Nicholas M. and Hedy J. Munk Annual Lecture at Beth Tzedec Congregation as part of Holocaust Education Week.

In 1991, when Smith was 24, he and his brother visited Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, an experience that changed their lives.

Delving into the study of the Holocaust – Smith earned a post-graduate certificate in Jewish studies at Oxford and a certificate in Holocaust education from Yad Vashem – they were inspired to create the Beth Shalom Holocaust Centre in 1995 and to push for an annual Holocaust Memorial Day in Britain, which was inaugurated last January.

Noting the numbers of survivors "will diminish by default" Smith urged his audience to listen to their voices, to hear their anguish. He also urged them to listen to the second generation, for whose parents "the Holocaust was never in the past."

Text materials – including transcripts of war trials, memories, diaries – are essential to the task of remembrance, Smith said.

Many important sites and names connected with the Holocaust have not even been found, let alone marked and memorialized. This must be changed, Smith said. While the number of museums and institutes devoted to the task is increasing, "over two million people are not yet identified. Don't they deserve the dignity of a name?"

There is a danger, Smith warned, that future generations will see Jewish history as a story of persecution. "We must tell about Jewish lives, Jewish culture. Jews had a long, rich history [in Europe], until they were driven to the fringes of society. And after the war, they rebuilt their lives."

Smith said we must understand that the Holocaust was "a European event, born from the European experience."

The emergence of Nazism was essentially "an ordinary event," he said, and its success proved that "anyone can be a bystander – and anyone can be a perpetrator."

Noting other instances of mass murder in China, Armenia, Rwanda and Bosnia, Smith asked, "How can two hundred million civilians be massacred, and only a handful brought to justice?" Honouring the victims and the survivors of the Holocaust "brings dignity to other forgotten victims," he said.

But the best memorial, Smith said, would be for genocide to simply stop. "If we can track the human genome, and put a man on the moon, can't we stop killing each other?"

The evening also honoured Nathan Abramowitz, who recently retired as executive director of Beth Tzedec.

Memorial based on Vietnam Veterans' Memorial

Clenman, a well-known, award-winning writer of poetry, children's literature and short stories, engraved the names of seven of her relatives who perished: Her father, grandfather, three aunts and two uncles.

One of those aunts, Rozia, was the subject of a loving poem Clenman wrote years ago. Now, "I feel that Rozia has finally acquired a cemetery," she says.

Organizers say the project is modeled loosely on the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington D.C., where names of the dead are also etched into simple black walls.

The cost of the Yad Vashem project is estimated at $750,000, money that was raised mainly through the visit earlier this year of former U.S. President Bill Clinton, who spoke on behalf of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

The cost of engraving a name is $180 per line, but society officials say no one will be turned away. For details, call 416-785-1333.

Journalism failed to follow the 'bad guys': prof

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Crossing the Triboro Bridge in New York en route to a speaking engagement in Toronto, journalist Craig Wolff was struck by the city's scarred skyline. Where once the majestic towers of the World Trade Center had soared into the sky, there now lay a smouldering pile of rubble.

A casual conversation with the cab driver jolted Wolff out of his thoughts. "It will never happen again," the cabbie opined. "Nothing happens twice in the United States."

Holocaust survivors light candles in memory of the six million during Holocaust Education Week. Seen here are Walter Steuerman and Nathan Kahn.

Wolff couldn't believe his ears. The complacency and lack of historical perspective shocked him.

As a reporter with the New York Times, he was part of a team that won a Pulitzer Prize for its coverage of the first World Trade Center attack in 1993 – not exactly ancient history. At the time, Islamic terrorists drove an explosives-laden van into the complex's underground garage. The ensuing blast carved out a six-storey deep crater, but the tower above did not collapse onto the other, as the terrorists had hoped.

At the time, "I was looking up and thinking, my God, they wanted to bring it down," he recalled.

Wolff, who now teaches at Columbia's Graduate School of Journalism, was in Toronto recently to address a Holocaust Education Week program sponsored by Beth Habonim Synagogue.

In an interview prior to his speech, he suggested the media have fallen down on the job by failing to follow through on the coverage of the first World Trade Center bombing and report in depth on "the bad guys" who perpetrated the attack.

Sept. 11, he believes, changed that.

"We need to write about the bad guys. We need to follow them, monitor them" and avoid the fluff stories that have so captivated American journalism.

Wolff noted that on the day in 1998 when the United States bombed Afghanistan in retaliation for the Al Qaeda attacks on two U.S. embassies in Africa, the media was transfixed by former president Bill Clinton's testimony in the Monica Lewinsky case.

Reporters, Wolff said, have not paid sufficient attention to experts who have warned that terrorists pose a dire threat to America.

"We have a very uncomfortable relationship with people who we term 'alarmist.' We don't quite know what to make of [them]," he said.

Juliet Karugahe, a native of Rwanda, speaks at a Toronto synagogue during Holocaust Education Week about the need never to forget the Holocaust or the genocide in Rwanda (in which some of her family were murdered). [Dafna Lorber photos]

Wolff pointed to other weaknesses in journalism's day-to-day coverage. Balance and objectivity are the western media's holy grail, he said, but there are times when a situation doesn't lend itself to balance, such as giving equal weight in a story to a denial of the Holocaust.

Moreover, journalists cannot always divorce themselves from their stories, Wolff contends. He tells journalism students "we have to bring our informed intelligence and be more knowledgeable about what we write about."

Wolff, who escorted a group of non-Jewish journalism students to Poland as part of the March of Remembrance in May 2001, said the experience of visiting Nazi death camps left the group shaken.

They quickly understood that the Nazis' cruelty could not be easily reduced to a stock phrase, such as "mass murderers." The Nazis broke down people's doors, kidnapped them, sexually assaulted them. "We must show what they did in infinite detail," he said.

Two Rwandan students who live in Toronto spoke after Wolff. The pair, who also participated in the March of Remembrance, drew links between the Holocaust and the Rwandan genocide in 1994, in which one million Tutsis and moderate Hutus were killed.

"The silence from the international community gave a small group of people the nerve to think that a crazy idea is less and less crazy, because they knew the world would not do anything about it," said Juliet Karugahe.

She urged the audience to become "a witness to one person's story and tell the story. You won't believe what a difference you can make."

Sollange Umwalli said the trip to Poland unblocked her emotions about the Rwandan genocide. The opposite of love is not hate, she explained, but indifference. If you are indifferent, you "give a ticket to those who do it."

She urged the audience to ensure the phrase "never again" really means putting an end to genocide.

At the young age of 24, Dror Cohen, a fighter pilot and instructor at the Israeli Air Force's Flight School was injured, leaving him paralyzed from the waist down and confined to a wheelchair.

Today, thanks to the therapy, rehabilitation and specialized sports programs offered at the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv, Dror is a leading athlete in disabled sports in Israel. CTV hires its first full-time religion reporter

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mark Schneider figures that one way to make amends for his past journalistic indiscretions is to do his new job, and do it well.

Atypically for someone in his field, Schneider – who concedes to having once practised "one of the more egregious examples of 'gotcha' journalism" – has recently been appointed the first full-time religion reporter for a Canadian television network, and only the second in North American network history.

Mark Schneider

A 26-year veteran of the news business, Schneider is now heading up a weekly segment on CTV's National News called Horizons. Airing Thursday nights, the spot, which runs an average of 2½ minutes, looks at a wide range of spiritual, religious, moral and ethical issues, from a decidedly "softer" vantage point than the journalist is used to.

For Schneider, a 53-year-old American-born Jew who practises Buddhist meditation, the new beat is, pardon the expression, a godsend.

For years, especially as Ottawa bureau chief for Vancouver-based BCTV, Schneider practised, by his own admission, a particularly confrontational brand of journalism, shot through with anger, aggression and disregard for its consequences, except if they helped boost his stature.

"I had been unfair and unprofessional. I had been corrupted by my own shallow celebrity," the candid Schneider told The CJN from Vancouver, his home and professional base. "Over the years, I felt extremely badly and guilty and shameful over what I had done, and I started to think about reforming my life."

At the same time, Schneider, whose last assignment was technology reporter for CTV, was thinking about how to make television news less sensational and more meaningful.

"News is such a toxic presence in our lives," he says. "I wanted to do news that would actually save civilization."

He put together a proposal for Kirk Lapointe, CTV's senior vice-president for news, who also happens to be a vocal booster of religion coverage in the media. To Schneider's surprise, Lapointe tapped him last summer for the brand new spirituality and ethics beat.

"At first, I was upset and unhappy," recalls Schneider, who was comfortable in his old beat, dubbed Digital Desk. "I didn't know what I was wishing for."

But soon, he discovered he could do the job in exactly the way he had envisioned TV news could be: less episodic and more interconnected with daily life. It was also helping him redress his own past.

"I was making connections with people of faith, and realized that journalism could be informative as well as uplifting, and that each of these events are actually connected with each other." On a personal level, "I find myself feeling like I've collided with my destiny."

Part of his healing has come about, he says, with the realization that his job can be free of cynicism, superficiality and an endless diet of violence, crime, sexual intrigue and social unrest.

"When you think of the breathless rush and urgency that comprises TV news, I'm now asking the audience to sit back and ponder this on a deeper level. Now, I bring caring instead of contempt to the job. It's liberated me to be sensitive."

Schneider says his new post comes at a crossroads in human history, when people seem to be yearning for spiritual fulfillment.

"I believe society is starting to witness a tremendous pilgrimage. People are starting to see moral chaos and feel unmoored and disconnected. The events of Sept. 11 really did mark the beginning of a spiritual discontinuity.

"I feel my job as a journalist is to get on that dusty road pilgrims are trudging and tell their story."

The technique requires a different touch, he says. "It can't be preachy. It has to be new, exciting and sometimes, convey a notion of heroism."

Among Schneider's concerns is that's he alone in the field. The only other full-time religion reporter at the network level in North America, ABC's Peggy Wehmeyer, was axed earlier this year.

"No other network has this beat. It's going to be a tremendous challenge."

But his personal faith, he says, will help. Schneider describes himself as "deeply Jewish, culturally. One cannot be a Jew and not be sensitive to the plight of the oppressed and to those who have not found their way to the mainstream of society."

Birthright documentary to premiere next week

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Filmmaker Leonard Pearl figures he and his crew interviewed more than 100 Canadian Birthright Israel participants before they left on the free, 10-day trip to Israel.

"We were amazed to find out how many did not have a connection to or understanding of the State of Israel."

Even more amazing, however, was that when the same participants were re-interviewed after the trip, all of them loved Israel and felt a connection to their heritage, he said. "Every single one."

Pearl's 44-minute documentary, birthright israel – completed after two years' work by Pearl and his partners in 12 Tribes Productions, Rena Godfrey and Isaac Szpindel – will premiere Nov. 26 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. The event, sponsored by Birthright Israel, Canada Israel Experience and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for past participants, family and friends,will feature musical entertainment and a dessert reception.

In a phone interview from his Thornhill office last week, Pearl said his biggest regret was that he couldn't include "every little moment" from the 200 hours captured during two Canadian trips this year and last.

One of the moments that did make the cut and that Pearl found especially moving came at a military cemetery when the Canadians and their Israeli counterparts first felt a connection.

The film also captured a Shabbat service (filmed just before Shabbat began) during which two disabled participants danced on crutches while one of the Canada Israel Experience staff members looked on, moved to tears.

Canada Israel Experience is the largest tour operator for Birthright Israel trips out of Canada and one of the sponsors of the documentary. The sponsors did not have input in terms of content, said Pearl.

Pearl recalls wondering whether the participants' initial feelings of connection would last. After following the stories of some of the participants on a longer-term basis, he was satisfied that, in the majority of cases, the trip had a lasting impact.

The film, in the end, focused on the stories of about half a dozen participants, and also featured interviews with Birthright funders Michael Steinhardt and Charles Bronfman.

At the end of the film, Bronfman, speaking "straight from the heart," sums up what the trip is all about, said Pearl, who didn't want to lessen the impact of the closing segment by revealing much more.

Pearl, whose first child is eight months old, said that, although he felt connected before making the documentary, the experience made him realize how important it was to him that his son grow up understanding that he is part of the Jewish people and how important Israel is to his being.

A former lawyer who pursued his dream of filmmaking at the encouragement of his wife, Pearl, 33, started 12 Tribes Productions three years ago. His partners, also in their 30s and pursuing second careers, came on board later.

Pearl, an alumnus of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, attributes his passion for making Jewish films to the values he learned from his parents. He is currently working on another documentary and a feature film that he describes as a Jewish "Joan of Arc meets Braveheart," based on a true story.

Negotiations are under way to have the Birthright documentary, his second film, aired on television. His first film, a documentary about Jews rescued by an American organization during the Holocaust, has not yet been released.

Tickets to the birthright israel premiere are available for $12 from the Canada Israel Experience Centre. For further information, call 416-398-6931, #5.

Impressions of a General Assembly rookie

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and U.S. President George W. Bush were invited to the General Assembly (GA) of the United Jewish Communities in Washington, D.C. this past weekend. But they weren't there, and I really didn't mind.

Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres was there, and so was Tom Ridge, American director of homeland security. But I really didn't notice.

Sure, it was an amazing opportunity to hear top politicians and world leaders speak. But I wasn't there for the speakers and I wasn't there for the seminars. I was there because 4,000 other Jews from across the world were there with me in the largest annual gathering of the Jewish community. I was there because I share a common heritage, culture, and religion with people from North America, Israel and beyond.

I was there as a student delegate, one of 35 students from Southern Ontario who braved a grueling twelve-hour bus ride to be in Washington for the four-day conference. Over 120 students came from across the country, and together we made up 20 percent of the student delegates, the largest contingency of Canadian students ever attending the GA. And we made sure that everyone at the conference knew who the Canadians were.

Ridge thought that we were pretty easy to identify in the crowd. We were the ones jumping up on our chairs and screaming and waving our Canadian flags when he mentioned Canada at the solemn plenary session Monday evening. We were the ones who cheered when he sang the opening notes of Oh Canada. We were a small but vocal group, he called us. We liked to make ourselves heard.

And loud we were. At the Shabbat dinner, after every speaker, after every course was served, the Montreal table would erupt into enthusiastic song and dance. By the end of the conference, we would sing this tune after every announcement and event as our way of saying thank you and yasher koach.

Not only were our voices loud, we also made sure that we were recognized as a group of students different from our American counterparts. Distinct Canadian programming was introduced this year, so instead of listening to lectures on American-based topics, we met with Canadian-Israeli diplomats and ambassadors, representatives from the Canadian Jewish Congress and members of the Canadian embassy in Washington. We had opportunities to discuss campus issues which directly affect Canadian Jews in universities across the country.

But I think that as a GA rookie, nothing amazed me more than the sheer size of the event. The security amazed me. The number of people rushing to and from their meetings and seminars, or schmoozing in the foyer and the hallways, all of them wearing their plastic security badges around their necks, amazed me.

"I told you it would be busy," said a friend. He was right. We didn't stop; there was always something going on: a lecture to go to, a speaker to hear, new friends to see, or entertainment to enjoy. Even Shabbat wasn't restful; they kept us busy and out of trouble with tight schedules and back-to-back activities.

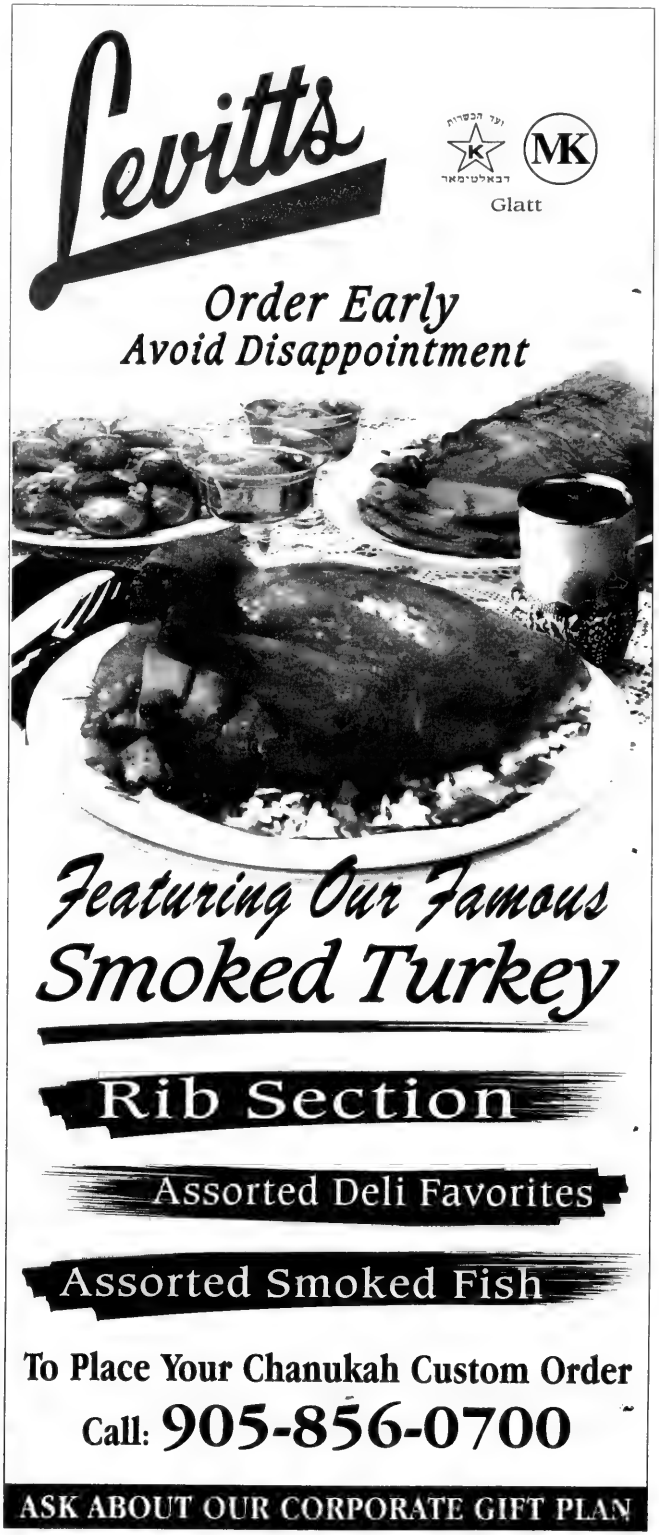
"I can't believe that was Saturday. Was that supposed to be relaxing?" gasped my roommate before collapsing on the bed after the Shabbaton.

Richard Joel, president of Hillel International, forewarned us about the "schmoozing in the hallways" part of the GA. At the Shabbat dinner, he jokingly told us that the business of Jews is done in hallways. After the GA, I'm convinced that he's right. It was an example of networking at its greatest. Even the students networked. You'd never guess, but one of the exhibitors selling El Al posters and fruit candies is secretly a second cousin of your aunt's housekeeper's daughter. I guess it's just a small world, eh?

In the end, it wasn't about the speakers and the lectures, although I know I walked away from the seminars with a bit more knowledge tucked into the dusty corners of my mind. The conference was about the "great network of Jews," the six degrees of separation that connect the entire Jewish community (and trust me, it is a very small community).

It was definitely worth the bus ride.

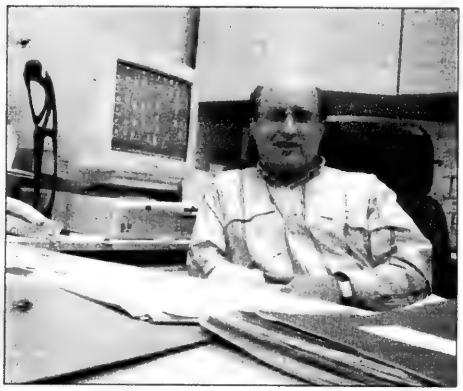
HEADING TO WASHINGTON: More than 65 students from Hillel Jewish Student Centres and FederatioNext, an initiative of FEDERATION CJA's PROMONTREAL, boarded buses to the General Assembly. More than 3,000 leaders from Jewish federations across North America, as well as leaders from Israel and around the world attended.



Doctor pilots food-incentive program in Zambia

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — A local doctor and his team are using food as an incentive to get patients to take their drugs in parts of the world where finishing a course of medication can mean the difference between life and death.



Dr. Mitchell Levine brought back a Zambian interpretation of "The Thinker" from his working trip to Africa.

Dr. Mitchell Levine, director of the Centre for the Evaluation of Medicines, came back from Zambia last month where together with Dr. Eli Tshibwabwa and Dr. Marek Smieja, he is running a pilot program that addresses poor health and nutrition in developing countries.

Two years ago, Levine and a group of researchers began working with CIDA, the Canadian International Development Agency, to develop a childcare project in Haiti, the poorest country in the western hemisphere. The program dispenses both food and drugs to sick children. Caregivers who make sure the medicines are taken also receive food.

The nutrition element struck a chord with Levine.

"Food is such an integral part of Jewish life... maybe this is not unique," says Levine, a pharmacoeconomic consultant for Ontario's Ministry of Health who teaches and practices internal medicine.

"Certainly in conditions of poverty, it is a critical part of life, and a very powerful motivator. Giving food has an element of nurturing – real and symbolic – when you're trying to help somebody."

Although it's still too early to assess the results, signs indicate the program is working well. Even with the risk that some recipients might sell their rations, the incentive to return for more and to continue the treatment remains.

Tshibwabwa, a former radiologist and professor in the Congo who currently works at the Centre for the Evaluation of Medicines with Levine, suggested that they try the model in Zambia. Zambia is a poverty-stricken nation with a malnourished population living in crowded conditions – circumstances which are ripe for the spread of tuberculosis bacteria.

"The treatment for TB takes eight months," Levine says, "and we have to remember there are several serious obstacles for these patients. Many live in outlying areas and have no transport, so it can take them a day to walk to their clinic. Imagine you have TB, which leaves you with little energy, and you have to walk 15 miles in the heat to see your doctor.

"Also, when you are sick with TB, your appetite is depressed. Once you take medications, your appetite returns, but if there is nothing to eat, getting better is actually a disincentive."

The situation in Zambia is further complicated because 70 percent of TB sufferers also have HIV. AIDS victims with weakened immune systems die from other infections that they cannot fend off, Levine explains. By treating the TB, these patients can be helped.

During their recent five-day visit to Zambia, Levine and his team met with the project's agency partner, CARE International, a humanitarian, non-governmental organization. They also met with representatives from the United Nations World Food Program and members of the Zambian medical community.

"The key is to speak with the communities already there, because what worked in Haiti was not going to work in Zambia," Levine says.

"We arrived with a plan we soon realized needed modifying. The aid workers told us that everyone in Zambia is desperate for food, so we couldn't give to just those with TB. It would also risk drawing away volunteers from health care programs already in place. So we decided only our patients would get supplements and if the breadwinners in the family were the ones with TB, they would get an extra portion of food to feed their families."

Logistics in Zambia were complicated.

"The population we want to reach lives in outlying districts, not cities," Levine says. "Food supplies cannot be airlifted in and have to reach clinics by road, which are potholed and rough at the best of times. During the rainy season, they are impassable. So then you get into the issue of storage and how to keep the food supplies from spoiling."

Levine says he was stimulated by the challenge of solving these problems.

"I have to go across the world to solve them – the answers aren't in a textbook or with a colleague down the hall."

At the same time, he says, he was affected by what he saw.

"In Haiti, I went round clinics with two- and three-year-olds really sick with TB. They give you a look of need that goes right into your soul. It makes you feel so embarrassed, because you're so well and fed, and they are suffering so much."

When he returned, he discussed what he saw with his own three children.

"They realize not to take what they have for granted," he says. "For myself, what I saw put everything in perspective. While the problems we have here are important to us, they really pale by comparison.

"Professionally, it made me aware of the responsibility I and others like me carry. We want to go outside the usual boundaries and make a difference, and we are careful to work with the agencies and infrastructure already in place. But we have to come to the IMF and the World Bank and say 'Look, giving out drugs isn't enough.' I feel we need to spread the word to agencies and pressure them into giving food too, even though it is more expensive."

Meanwhile, Levine is looking at applying the motivation principle – should it prove successful – to patient groups closer to home.

"We asked ourselves, "What's important to street people? Or HIV patients?" he says. "So we put together a proposal to help the Inuit and suggested that giving gasoline might be a good incentive because fuel for skidoos is so expensive up north."

Tory Times or Sorry Times

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Little more than a decade ago, Tory ranks still swelled across the country, including a significant amount of supporters within the Jewish community. Brian Mulroney was perceived as a Canadian Ronald Reagan – a head of government who broke with the reserved, understated, perhaps even unenthusiastic orientation toward Israel characteristic of his predecessors. Instinctively, Jews saw a friend in the Tory leader. And, in truth, that perception was confirmed, and still is today.

Yet in the ten years that have passed, the number of Jews who identify themselves as Tories has evaporated even more completely than the overall disintegration of Conservative support in Canada.

Some have argued that Jewish roots in the PC party were never deep, that Jewish support was limited to the Mulroney years and linked more to him than the party he led.

To be sure, there were always the Sidney Spivaks, B.J. Finestones, Hugh Segals and Stella Torontows whose Conservative affiliations were deep-seated and enduring. But for most, the argument goes, and directly paralleling the general Canadian experience, the "affair" with the Tories was as shallow as it was intense.

Not everyone, however, is convinced that Jewish support was either shallow or exclusively linked to Brian Mulroney.

There is no real prospect for the resurrection of the Conservative Party under its current leadership. But the notion of a viable, small c conservative party as an alternative to the Liberals is worthy of serious consideration within the Jewish community.

As was the case with the NDP, which we looked at last week, the community is faced with a strategic choice. Do individuals without any special ties to the Liberals simply place their political involvement in limbo or do they seek to create a presence within the surviving Tory shell – hoping that once Joe Clark can be persuaded to exit the scene, they can help rebuild the party into a real contender?

Operating from the principle that a dynamic and credible opposition is the most effective way to ensure good government, the answer is very clear. Just as the market imperative demands that one acquire stock when the price is low, so too the potential for meaningful influence is greatest when a political party's value is depressed. And you can't get much more depressed than the Joe Clark Tories!

There are scores of Jews who not so long ago counted themselves as Tories. These were not simply individuals who voted Tory, but who raised money, organized and promoted the Conservative Party as a legitimate home for Jews. Now is the time for them to re-affirm their partisan identity.

Rarely has so ripe an opportunity presented itself for playing a central role in the shaping of a political party. It would be a shame if the opportunity were missed... because in three years' time, it could make all the difference.

Proceedings launched against alleged war criminal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Vancouver man convicted in Italy for Nazi-era atrocities is facing the loss of his citizenship for allegedly lying about his wartime activities when he immigrated to Canada.

A statement of claim filed by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration alleges that Michael Seifert, 77, was personally involved in killing and brutalizing inmates at a camp outside the northern Italian city of Bolzano, where he served in 1944 and 1945.

Documents filed in Federal Court claim Seifert, an SS guard, displayed wanton cruelty and viciousness in the treatment of prisoners at the Bolzano (Bozen) camp.

"Michael Seifert was personally involved in the beatings, the torture and the killing of prisoners in the camp and in the [camp's] isolation cells," the government alleges.

On Nov. 23, 2000, Seifert was convicted in absentia by the Italian Military Tribunal of Verona for killing 11 prisoners and was sentenced to life in prison. On Oct. 18, an Italian court dismissed his appeal of the conviction.

Seifert is an ethnic German who was born in Landau, Ukraine. During the war, he joined the SS and Police units of the German occupation forces. After serving as a guard in Nikolayev, Ukraine, he was assigned to the SS and Police Leader, and in the fall of 1943, his unit retreated from Ukraine in the face of advancing Soviet forces.

At the end of the war, Seifert travelled to Germany and resided in Lutgenrode. He immigrated to Canada in 1951 at a time when SS members and concentration camp guards were ineligible for entry. Federal authorities claim he lied about his place of birth – he said it was in Estonia – and say he would not have been admitted to Canada had he truthfully described his wartime activities when interviewed in a security screening.

The documents filed against Seifert claim that "in at least one instance, around Christmas 1944, Seifert participated in the beating and killing of a prisoner who tried to escape. The prisoner was tied to a pole in the camp and beaten savagely by Seifert and other guards until he died."

Seifert participated in other attacks, the minister alleges.

"On a day in December 1944 or January 1945, Seifert with another guard whipped a prisoner near the isolation cell block area.

"In February 1945, Seifert and Otto Sein, another guard at the camp, beat a young male prisoner in the cell for two or three consecutive nights. One of them held the young prisoner, while the other poked his fingers into the young man's eyes. The young man's body was taken out of his cell in a bag after the last night of beating."

Other alleged instances of Seifert's mistreatment of prisoners include beating an old man when the man failed to get up for the daily roll call, as well as Seifert's participation with two other guards in the beating and shooting of two prisoners in the camp's courtyard area.

During the winter of 1945, the documents allege, "Seifert and Sein poured cold water all over a woman who was held in the isolation cell block. She died shortly thereafter."

In March 1945, Seifert and four or five other guards "beat and killed a prisoner who had tried to escape in the camp courtyard."

Finally, the statement of claim alleges that Seifert was probably involved in the forced deportation of Jews and other prisoners to Nazi extermination camps, concentration camps and forced labour camps.

Seifert has retained Victoria lawyer Doug Christie to represent him. Christie acted on behalf of Imre Finta, who was acquitted of war crimes charges in the early 1990s. He has also represented Holocaust deniers Ernst Zundel, Jim Keegstra and Malcolm Ross in other cases.

Canadian Jewish Congress welcomed the launch of immigration proceedings, but questioned why it took a full year after his conviction in Italy for the government to act.

"Seifert has enjoyed the privilege of Canadian citizenship for decades, mocking the claim that Canada is not a safe haven for Nazi war criminals," said Prof. Irving Abella, chair of Congress' war crimes committee.

Cotler backs anti-terror bill; suggests amendments

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The federal government's counter-terrorism bill must be considered "human security legislation" designed to protect the most fundamental human rights of all – life, liberty and the security of the person, according to human rights lawyer and MP Irwin Cotler.

Speaking recently at a University of Toronto conference on the government's controversial Bill C-36, Cotler urged participants to "think outside the box" and not accept a civil liberties/national security dichotomy when considering the bill.

The bill should be examined as a proportionate response by an international criminal justice system to "a transnational and existential threat," and not merely as a response to domestic criminal activity, he said.

Cotler said Canada must toughen its laws to protect against terrorist threats, while ensuring that the civil libertarian critiques of the bill are addressed. He proposed several amendments to the bill that would leave its overarching goal in place while softening its most troubling intrusions on civil rights.

The government bill has been widely criticized, with critics saying it goes too far in restricting democratic rights.

> Must be considered 'human security legislation'

The government caucus has had "a thoughtful debate" on the bill with a broad range of views expressed, said Farah Mohamed, a spokesman for Justice Minister Anne McLellan. She said the minister was scheduled to appear before the House justice committee on Tuesday of this week "and will signal when amendments could be made." The committee will then go through the bill on a clause-by-clause basis to discuss the proposed changes.

"Prof. Cotler is a scholar on this topic and he's someone the minister has a lot of respect for," Mohamed said.

In his address to the law conference, Cotler argued that "on Sept. 11, we passed a strategic and juridical watershed. The anti-terror law therefore must be appreciated and assessed in the context of the existential threat of this transnational terrorism, and the vulnerability of open and technologically advanced democratic societies to this genre of terror."

Nevertheless, Cotler proposed several changes to the bill.

Cotler, who has defended political prisoners such as Nelson Mandela and Natan Sharansky, suggested it would be prudent to drop the section that defines "terrorist activity" in terms of the perpetrators' motivations. As it now stands, the definition of terrorism could be taken to include civil disobedience, unlawful activity (such as an illegal strike) or even violent conduct that is not terrorism, he stated.

Turning to the provision that would create a list of groups involved in terrorist activities, Cotler said the legislation should be amended to give an organization "prenotice" that it is slated for the list, along with the opportunity for an advance hearing to contest the listing. As the bill now stands, a group may contest the terrorist designation only after it has been listed.

Addressing other provisions of the bill, Cotler said suspects should be considered to have "facilitated" terrorist activity only if they know that such activity is going to take place. As the bill is now written, someone could be considered to facilitate a terrorist activity even if they were unaware that the activity was going to take place.

Turning to the question of access to information and the right to privacy, Cotler pointed out the bill gives the attorney general the power to issue a certificate prohibiting disclosure of certain information, on national security or defense grounds.

"Bill C-36 should at least be amended to provide for the necessary safeguards and oversight," he said.

On the controversial preventive arrest and investigative hearings provisions, Cotler argued, "The untested novelty – and potential for intrusion on traditional due process rights – warrant the application of a sunset clause to these provisions."

Other suggestions Cotler made included:
- judicial confirmation or judicial authorization for the interception of foreign communication to or from Canada.
- inclusion of a non-discrimination clause to signal that visible minorities should be protected from discriminatory treatment.
- the provision of a "due diligence" defense to charities to prevent legal repercussions for inadvertently aiding terror groups.
- creation of an oversight framework that includes an annual report by the Attorney General to Parliament and the appointment of a parliamentary officer to monitor and supervise the legislation.

Peace in a 'holding pattern,' says Goodman

"Since Arafat responded to [former Israeli prime minister Ehud] Barak with war, Arafat's credibility in Israel has dropped to below ground zero. There are not five Israelis who'd accept his signature on anything."

Goodman, founding editor of the Jerusalem Report, and a longtime correspondent for the Jerusalem Post, is senior research fellow at the Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University.

Surveying the Palestinian political scene, he suggested that Sari Nusseiba, the scion of a prominent Palestinian family, "is beginning to emerge as a prince among the Palestinians." Nusseiba has the support of part of the Palestinian security apparatus and he recently made a speech in which he conceded Israel's inability to agree to a Palestinian "right of return."

Goodman said he takes seriously Nusseiba's statement acknowledging Jews' deep connection to Jerusalem – a far cry from Arafat's contention at Camp David last year that the Jewish claim to Jerusalem and the Temple Mount is a myth.

Nusseiba is part of a new generation of Palestinian leadership that is more pragmatic than Arafat and that recognizes that, apart from gains in public relations, the intifadah has been a failure. It has not divided the people of Israel, it has not led to an international force, it has not led to irresistible international pressure on Israel and it has not prompted the dissolution of peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan, Goodman said.

While Israelis may be living in a state of petrified terror, there is no existential threat to the country, he said.

"There is no greater punishment in the world than suicide bombers and terrorists, and we [are being collectively punished] but we can sustain this situation for a long time to come," he said.

Thirteen months ago, Goodman believed the Middle East was on the road to peace. "I believed in the Oslo process, and thought that the peace process had gone so far there was nothing that could hold it back.

"Yet it broke down with tremendous viciousness in a way that I and many others had never predicted."

Arafat turned down the deal handed to him at Camp David, said Goodman, because former U.S. president Bill Clinton and Barak "tried to shove peace down his throat. They did not realize that you cannot impose peace. The entire world had Arafat in a box."

From Arafat's point of view, said Goodman, "the Messiah arrived in the form of [Israeli Prime Minister] Ariel Sharon. He visited the Temple Mount, and this gave Arafat the excuse to fight his way out of the box."

Subsequent events to Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount "put the conflict into a global dimension, and it led to a total breakdown. This was not an intifidah, it was a war. It was a carefully orchestrated military campaign by the Palestinians against the Israelis.

"Arafat had the support of the Arab world, and he had a legitimate excuse to fight his way out of the box."

Goodman said it breaks his heart to see Israeli hotels that are empty "except for solidarity missions here and there, but tourism [makes up a small percentage of our economy]."

In the past 13 months, he said, the Palestinians have suffered thousands of casualties as well as economic destruction.

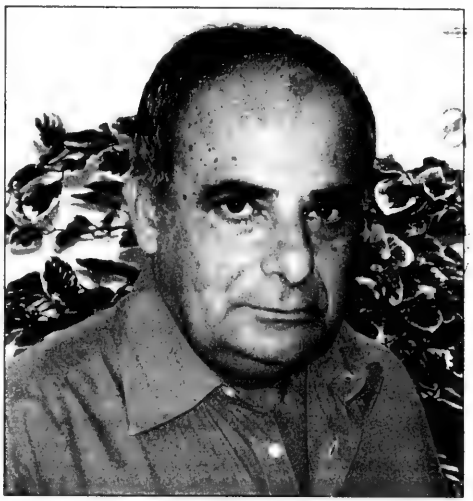
"Israel has had about 200 people killed. It has been a heavy loss, but without denigrating the importance of one life, we suffered 250 deaths every eight hours in the Yom Kippur War."

Israel can wait for the Palestinians to make peace, but "no way on earth" will it be with Arafat, said Goodman.

Israel, too, will require a change of leadership, he added. Former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu is in the wings, breathing down Sharon's neck for leadership of the Likud Party. But Goodman said he doesn't see "Bibi" as a peacemaker.

The Labour Party, for its part, is in disarray, with no obvious candidate on the horizon to replace Foreign Minister Shimon Peres. "There is a great possibility of Barak coming back," Goodman said. He suggested that like Yitzhak Rabin before him, whose first term as prime minister was less than successful, Barak will learn from his mistakes. If he comes back, expect Barak to "work the room, shmooze" and be less likely to make solitary decisions.

Barak erred at Camp David in pushing for an "end to the conflict" when instead he should have negotiated a peace treaty that left some loose ends. The treaty with Egypt, executed before the disputed Taba region was disposed of, could have been a template, he said.



Hirsh Goodman

Despite the intifadah and their distrust of Arafat, the Israeli public is psychologically ready for a deal with the Palestinians, he continued.

A Jaffee Centre survey found that 54 percent of 1,820 Israelis said they were prepared to divide Jerusalem. "Israelis want separation from the Palestinians," he said.

At the end of the day, however, the conflict will be resolved, "and the tragedy is that we all know what the solution will be."

He said the solution will be for Israel to go back to the 1967 lines, for Jerusalem to be redivided and for the Palestinians to realize that no Israeli government will ever accept the right of return of Palestinian refugees to Israel.

"We all know what the price will be, but how much blood has to flow before we get there?"

"The longer it takes [for new leaders to negotiate peace] the harder it will be. There is a very destructive dynamic in play, and the longer the dynamic is there, the harder the conflict will be to resolve," he said.

The dynamic can be changed if Arafat decides he is no longer the sole Palestinian voice,"but I do not see any resolution of the conflict in the current constellation."

Importantly, however, he said, "We must not lose our humanity and our belief in democracy. We cannot re-instate any measures against the Palestinians that do not constitute normal behaviour in this day and age."

Israelis need to move beyond Sharon's damage control and consolidate as a people.

"I am an optimist and I think it is a wonderful country," he said. "We should never lose sight of what has been achieved. When we consider that 20 percent of the country is Arabs, 20 percent of the country is [haredim], and 20 percent of the country is from the former Soviet Union, we have not done a bad job."

Sharon insists on 7-day period of absolute quiet

By ALUF BENN AND DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is sticking to his demand for a seven-day trial period of absolute quiet in the West Bank and Gaza as a first step to implementing the peace blueprint outlined by former U.S. senator George Mitchell.

Sharon voiced this view last Sunday during a meeting with a top-level European delegation, with an eye toward the major foreign policy speech by U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell scheduled for last Monday. Some reports had indicated that Powell planned to call for the immediate implementation of the Mitchell committee's recommendations, without conditioning this on a violence-free week, as Sharon demands.

At a press conference following his talks with EU leaders last Sunday in Jerusalem, the prime minister said: "In my meeting with the Americans, it was agreed that seven days were needed to see whether [Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser] Arafat implements the ceasefire… We are firm on what we agreed on with the Americans. That is our position, and it's going to be our position in the future."

Ariel Sharon

Sharon added that "it's impossible to attain peace without a complete cessation of terror and acts of hostility."

In Sharon's view, diplomatic talks based on the Mitchell plan should only begin after the following stages are complete: an absolute cessation of terror, violence and incitement; a seven-day trial period for the ceasefire; a six-week cooling-off period; and confidence building measures.

The Europeans were not persuaded. Speaking to reporters, EU security chief Javier Solana denounced Sharon's insistence on the seven-day period of quiet as "stupidity."

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres does not believe the condition of seven days of quiet is essential. According to Peres, a ceasefire could be reached as early as the end of next week, with talks to follow immediately – if Arafat takes determined action against terrorism.

Peres told the European visitors that "this is the most appropriate moment to get on the peace-making track. The Arab and Muslim world is faced with many question marks. There is a global front for the war against terror and there is a growing feeling among the Palestinians that the intifadah has not borne fruit. On the Israeli side, there is the realization that decisions must be made promptly. Otherwise, we'll leave our fate in the hands of fate.

"We need to take action to bring our positions closer together during the coming weeks, while maintaining a constructive vagueness."

The assessment in the prime minister's office last weekend was that Powell would challenge Israel's demand for a seven-day test period. One diplomatic source suggested the speech could give Arafat the support he needs to take bolder action against Palestinian terrorist organizations.

According to the source, Arafat's arrest of the Islamic Jihad militant Muhammad Tawalbe in Jenin last week was a demonstration of strength for the Europeans, but it failed to impress Israel. Powell's speech, the source added, "could give everyone a package deal and present an opportunity to implement the Mitchell plan."

Senior PA officials said Sunday that the Powell speech should include the following: a declaration of a deadline for a final status accord and the definition of a "mechanism" for implementing UN Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 in a way that would end Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza.

Palestinian cabinet minister Saeb Erekat said Sunday that this message has been communicated to Powell.

According to Erekat, if these two components are not covered in Powell's speech, "this would mean that we are going around in circles."

Erekat added that there "is an unprecedented European consensus that Israel must withdraw to the lines of June 4, 1967, stop the occupation and enable the establishment of a Palestinian state whose capital is Jerusalem – this alongside Israel. This is the formula the peace process is based upon."

Arab world must recognize Israel, says Jordan's king

By SIMON CARROLL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — In a radical new peace-making initiative, King Abdullah of Jordan has called on the Arab world to recognize Israel's right to exist.

Such a move will be necessary for the creation of a Palestinian state, Abdullah told The Times of London.

Abdullah also told the paper that the collective Arab guarantee is part of a peace plan being discussed by countries trying to forge an Israeli-Palestinian peace accord, including the United States, Russia, the European Union, Egypt and Jordan.

U.S. President George W. Bush's full endorsement of the plan would be crucial to the king of Jordan's strategy. Abdullah claimed he has received pledges from Bush to back the initiative, but only if its broad acceptance by the Arab world is assured.

If accepted, the proposal would mean that for the first time, Israel would get collective guarantees for its security from 22 Arab nations, stretching from northwest Africa to the Arabian Gulf.

It would also constitute a dramatic shift in the overall Arab position. To date, only Egypt and Jordan have recognized the legitimacy of the Jewish State through peace treaties.

In a recent briefing to foreign correspondents in London, and in a radio talk show, Abdullah outlined a strategy that would constitute the Arab world's most dramatic shift toward peace with Israel since Arab armies marched on the fledgling Jewish State in 1948.

The king's descriptions of the current Israeli-Palestinian violence appeared to distance him from the anti-Israel stances taken by other Arab leaders. They also differed from the vitriolic criticisms of Israel expressed recently by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

Abdullah dismissed any links between the Arab-Israeli conflict and the Sept. 11 terror attacks on the United States, and called on fellow Arab leaders to recognize the new global reality that now makes the Arab-Israeli dispute secondary to the fight against international terrorism.

He also took issue with the usual Arab accusation that Israel, rather than the Palestinians, is to blame for the ongoing violence that has made the possibility of an Israeli-Palestinian peace accord more remote than ever.

"We have to get the violence removed from both sides and get them back around the peace table," he said.

The two sides have become so bogged down in their cycle of violence, Abdullah added, that a bold initiative and a major Arab gesture are needed to break the stalemate.

Van tests crucial to bombing trail: prosecutor

By FLORENCIA ARBISER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — The trial of the 20 people accused of bombing Buenos Aires' main Jewish community centre six years ago remains focused on the van that carried the explosives.

Police have completed chemical testing on 20 parts of the vehicle, including the engine, that were found in the rubble of the AMIA (Argentine Israeli Mutual Association) community centre after it exploded on July 18, 1994. The test results will be given by the end of November.

The 20 on trial are accused of playing a local role in the attack, which killed 85 people and wounded 300.

Sources close to the prosecutors say the tests show the van exploded and – even seven years later – still bears residue of explosive chemicals.

Used-car dealer Carlos Alberto Telleldin is accused of supplying the van. Juan Jose Ribelli and three other former police officers are accused of loading it with some 600 pounds of explosives.

The other 15 on trial are accused of various offenses.

"The nexus for these five main defendants to the attack is the presence of the van," prosecutor Natalio Alberto Nisman said. "If there was no bombing car, they could be charged for extortion and smaller crimes, but they could walk out of court."

So far, 70 witnesses who were close to the AMIA building at the time of the explosion have testified. Lawyers for the accused hope to stress the fact that very few recalled seeing a van in the vicinity.

Prosecutors and lawyers for the victims' families, AMIA and DAIA – Delegación de Asociaciones Israelitas Argentinas, a Jewish umbrella organization located in the same building – pointed out the different recollections of people who were near AMIA on the morning of the explosion, but did not know they were about to witness a terrorist attack.

The area where AMIA was located is known as "Once," an area of town crowded with small shops. A van loading and unloading merchandise on a Monday morning in Once hardly would attract attention.

Every witness has been asked how he or she remembers the traffic on the block that morning.

Answers have ranged from "crowded as usual" to "unusually empty," from "full of vehicles" to "without any car driving or parked."

Prosecutor Nisman said the 105 people called as witnesses still carry their personal traumas from the event, yet must face defendants and cameras.

The results of the tests on the vehicle parts will be "crucial to the trial," Nisman said.

After this group of witnesses, subsequent witnesses will include members of the Argentine intelligence services, employees of a nearby lot where the van was parked and expert witnesses.

The investigative judge, Juan Jose Galeano, also is searching for information on international connections to the attack: How the decision to carry out the bombing was made, for what reasons and who was involved.

The Mossad, CIA and FBI have contributed information and technical expertise that incriminates Iran and Hezbollah in the bombing. A recent tip has led some to believe that Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda terror organization was involved.

Juan Antonio Pardo, who served as ceremonial deputy director for the Argentine chancery, testified to Galeano on Nov. 14.

Pardo said Iranian diplomatic trips increased in the days before the attack, and that Argentine intelligence was aware of the trips.

Hezbollah says it rebuffed U.S. offer

Washington also suspects Hezbollah, whose main backers are Iran and Syria, of kidnapping westerners during Lebanon's 1975 to 1990 civil war. The United States intervened in the conflict to back a government of pro-Israeli Lebanese Christian militiamen.

Lebanon has condemned the September 11 attacks on New York and Washington, but says it will not co-operate with U.S. financial sanctions against Hezbollah, which was primarily responsible for ending Israel's 22-year-long military presence in south Lebanon last year.

Hezbollah has vowed to drive Israeli troops from the Shebaa Farms, a disputed patch of land near the Lebanese border and the Golan Heights, and kidnapped three Israeli soldiers there in a raid last year.

The three soldiers – Adi Avitan, Benny Avraham and Omar Souad – were abducted in October 2000 on the Israel-Lebanon border by Lebanese-based Hezbollah guerillas believed to be disguised as UN troops. Israel has recently declared the three to be fallen in action.

Hezbollah also kidnapped Israeli businessman Elhanan Tanenbaum.

Nasrallah said Hezbollah had also rejected a U.S. offer after the Israeli withdrawal from the south that entailed quitting its campaign in Shebaa Farms in exchange for political recognition and the release of Arab prisoners in Israel.

The UN has certified Israel's pullout from Lebanon as complete, and does not recognize claims by Beirut, Damascus and Hezbollah that Shebaa Farms is Lebanese territory.

Last week, Nasrallah said that Israel had returned to negotiations regarding the three IDF soldiers kidnapped by the group, and said that his party was still ready to negotiate.

"Israel has returned to give and take [negotiations] through intermediaries. We are ready to negotiate," Nasrallah told Al-Rai Al-Am newspaper. He did not elaborate.

Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer recently told reporters that Israel had proof from an eye witness that the three soldiers were no longer alive. "Someone saw" the captured soldiers' bodies, Ben-Eliezer said.

Hezbollah has refused to disclose any information on the soldiers until Israel releases some Lebanese prisoners it has been holding for up to 23 years.

Arsonists attack Marseille Jewish school

By ANDREW DIAMOND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Jews in Marseille are in a state of shock since vandals recently burned down part of a Jewish elementary school in the southern port city.

Last month, two trailers used as classrooms at the Pardes Jewish School in Marseille were destroyed before firefighters could control the flames.

A day later, leaders of the Marseille Jewish community gathered at the charred remains to condemn the act and discuss its implications.

Speaking to journalists at the scene, Clement Yana, president of the local branch of CRIF, the umbrella group of secular French Jewish organizations, emphasized that Jewish leaders are taking the incident very seriously but believe it was the act of young delinquents from the neighbourhood.

Nobody seems to dispute this interpretation, but nonetheless, many people in the Jewish community are uneasy.

Perhaps most disquieting for some were the inscriptions the vandals sprayed on the walls of the school's main building: "Death to Jews," "Jews Faggots," and "Bin Laden Will Conquer."

"There have already been some incidents," Annick Mettoudy, a mother of one student at Pardes, told reporters at the scene, "but this time it's more serious."

The same feeling prompted the police prefect to position guards around Jewish schools throughout the city.

A wave of anti-Semitic violence – mostly arson attacks against synagogues – erupted in France after the start of the Palestinian uprising in September 2000.

Earlier this month, several anti-Semitic incidents also occurred in and around Paris.

Attackers hurled a Molotov cocktail against the wall of a synagogue in the 20th district, home to large concentrations of Jews and Muslims of North African descent. The next day, in the nearby 12th district, religious leaders discovered signs of an attempted break-in at a Jewish place of worship.

In another incident, in the suburb of Epinay-sur-Seine, vandals smashed the windows of a Jewish school.

A range of emotions swept the local community following the attack in Marseille.

There also was a collective determination not to allow the incident to undermine what the nearly 40 years of peaceful coexistence between Jews and Arabs in Frais-Vallon, the subsidized housing facility where the school is located.

Though shaken by the destruction of her child's nursery school, Mettoudy did not hesitate to add, "In the area, though, everything is going rather well between neighbours."

The local CRIF leadership echoed this view when it responded publicly to the attack.

"In Marseille, the consensus between communities has always been respected," Yana told a journalist for the regional daily La Provence.

More than a rhetorical gesture, this confidence is based on years of co-operation between the Jewish and Muslim communities of this Mediterranean city at the gateway to North Africa.

The initiative began after the 1991 Persian Gulf War, when the heads of the Christian, Muslim, Jewish and Buddhist communities formed an association called Marseille-Hope to open channels of communication between communities.

Ironically, last month's attack came at the beginning of "A Week Against Violence" that had been planned at the local community centre.

Projects likes these had Jewish and other civic leaders congratulating themselves on the relative calm that has prevailed since Sept. 11 in a city home to roughly 80,000 Jews and many more North African Muslims descent.

The "Week Against Violence" and similar events evidently are not enough to prevent anti-Semitic violence. But they have paved the way for meaningful dialogue between Jewish and Muslim leaders in responding to such acts.

Within a few days of the attack, Yana reported receiving letters of support from the leaders of several Muslim associations in Marseille.

Perhaps the most notable was from the imam of the Marseille mosque, who wrote that he was "deeply shocked by the burning of the school" and expressed his "sincere support to the Jewish community."

Yana and the nearly 10,000 members of CRIF he represents hope that such comments will help in dealing with a wave of anti-Semitic aggression that seems deeply rooted in the urban milieu of Arab youths in France.

Following the arson attack, members of the Jewish community appear ready to become more vigilant – and hope they can count on the support of their Muslim neighbours to meet the challenges ahead.

BBC eyes Holocaust denial libel case

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Holocaust denier David Irving emerges unrepentant in a BBC radio documentary exploring the legal strategy scholar Deborah Lipstadt used when he sued her for libel last year.

The 45-minute program, broadcast Nov. 8, contains interviews with all the major players in the landmark trial, which Irving lost.

Lipstadt's lawyers describe how their case rested on proving that Lipstadt had been correct to label Irving a Holocaust denier in her 1994 book, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory.

They subpoenaed his diaries and appointment books in order to demonstrate that he was an anti-Semite who spoke at neo-Nazi events. They also had an expert witness demolish his books as "falsifications" that "can only really be deliberate."

"Putting Irving's books on trial was the strategy," lawyer Anthony Julius explained.

Irving – who represented himself – tells the BBC that he never grasped that.

He describes the judge, Sir Charles Gray, as too "thick-skulled" to understand his case.

"There were occasions when I could see he was not getting the point I was extracting from the witness," he told the BBC.

There are times in the program when Irving seems to be out to prove the truth of the judge's verdict last year, when Gray labelled him a racist anti-Semite who had deliberately distorted history.

"Lipstadt is part of an international conspiracy to silence me," Irving claimed.

He also said he was "not surprised that the Jews go on about the Holocaust, because it's the only interesting thing that's happened to them in 3,000 years."

Criticizing Gray's sweeping verdict as "so over the top that it missed its effect, it's lucky the twin towers hadn't been shot down by then, or I would have been blamed for that too," Irving said.

Lawyer Richard Rampton, who represented Lipstadt, said that at first he was concerned that the program gives Irving too much air time.

But after talking to people who heard the program, he said Irving said "just enough to bury himself. Each sentence made his hole deeper."

Julius said there is no danger in letting Irving speak in a forum like the documentary.

"The people who are impressed with Irving will continue to be, and those who are not will not be," he said.

Irving, on a speaking tour in the United States, was not available for comment.

Rampton said Irving was not harmed by representing himself.

"Getting him a lawyer wouldn't have made any difference," he said. "A good lawyer would have told him he was dead in the water" and advised him to drop the case, Rampton said.

"You can't win a case if you're firing blanks. You need ammunition, and he didn't have any," he added.

Rampton described the documentary as "illuminating" and praised Lipstadt's participation in the program.

"I worry when she goes public because she's so passionate," he said. "But I thought she was extraordinarily good, intensely moving."

Lipstadt, who never took the stand herself during the trial, said she had wanted to do so: "I was sorry I couldn't go into the witness box because I could have bested" Irving.

When the verdict came down last year, Irving was ordered to pay Lipstadt's legal costs, estimated at more than $3 million. He has been denied permission to appeal.

Reports confront anti-Semitism

In a Nov. 4 New York Times Magazine article, "The Uncomfortable Question of Anti-Semitism," Jonathan Rosen writes that following the Sept. 11 attacks, the Jewish people, always history's traditional scapegoats, have been placed at the centre of the atrocities in disturbing ways. Rosen is referring to the incredulous conspiracy theories prevalent in the Arab and Muslim world which blame the attacks on Jews.

A number of important people have raised their voices against this hateful nonsense. Salman Rushdie asked, "Why the routine anti-Semitism of the much-respected Islamic slander that 'the Jews' arranged the hits on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon...?" (New York Times, Nov. 2).

Other supporting views have emerged from unexpected sources. Richard Gwyn drew attention to the extreme hatred of Israel among the one billion Muslims worldwide:

"[Israel's] citizens, and also Jews in the Diaspora, now have to endure an almost unceasing outpouring of hatred directed at them by Osama bin Laden, by the Middle East's 'street,' by many Muslim clerics, and far from the least, by so many of those... who attended the United Nations conference in Durban, South Africa, where Zionism was pronounced racism" (Toronto Star, Nov. 7).

Usually Israel's harsh critic, Gwyn concluded firmly: "But a message needs to be sent out loud and clear to the Middle East that not only is the State of Israel non-negotiable but that the acceptance there of anti-Semitism, which has almost become part of the Middle East's daily culture, is equally non-negotiable."

According to Reports

The line between valid criticism of Israel and anti-Semitic malice masquerading as anti-Zionism can sometimes be blurry. At other times it is crystal clear. Rosen himself draws attention to how notorious anti-Semitic tracts like the Protocols of the Elders of Zion have been made their way into Arab propaganda.

"By grafting ancient Christian calumnies onto modern political grievances, Arab governments have transformed Israel into an outpost of malevolent world Jewry, viewing Israelis and Jews as interchangeable emblems of cosmic evil."

This demonization extends far beyond the Middle East. It was there in Durban and is likely to appear again when signatories to the Fourth Geneva Convention will meet in early December to once again condemn alleged Israeli human rights violations.

With all attempts to delegitimize Israel, whether blatant or subtle, we should remember Abba Eban's counsel (many years ago) to those who would be defensive about Israel's legitimacy.

"Israel's 'right to exist'" he emphasized, "is independent of any recognition of it and is certainly not dependent on the decision of... non-sovereign organization[s]... Israel's judicial status became equivalent to that of the United States, the Soviet Union, France, Egypt and 150 other states by virtue of the momentous Resolution 273 (III) of the United Nations General Assembly on May 11, 1949," which admitted Israel as a Jewish State into the UN.

Prepared by Paul Michaels of the Canada-Israel Committee.

The Week in Israel

Nov. 12

• PA Chairman Yasser Arafat asked Arab and Muslim countries to support the Palestinians' uprising against Israel during Ramadan. He made the request one day after telling the UN General Assembly he would make "every possible effort" to make peace.

Nov. 13

• A program of widescale government housing subsidies in the Galilee and the Negev for soldiers who recently completed their active service was approved by the Inter-Ministerial Committee for the Development of the Negev and the Galilee.

Nov. 14

• The two candidates for leadership of Israel's Labor Party, Avraham Burg and Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, agreed to new leadership elections. The September primary was declared void amid allegations of voter fraud.

• Israel is officially in a state of economic recession. The Central Bureau of Statistics said the nation's gross domestic product dropped 2.8 percent in the third quarter of 2001, following a one percent drop in the second quarter.

Nov. 15

• Israel said it would release 30 Palestinian prisoners during Ramadan.

Nov. 16

• Israel warned the Palestinian daily Al Quds that if it does not discontinue Islamic Jihad and Hamas advertisements, authorities will shut down the newspaper. Al Quds, published in Jerusalem, is the Palestinian community's largest and most influential newspaper. Police said the decision to warn the newspaper came after a Hamas ad this week praised shaheeds (martyrs) and called for the public to follow in their footsteps.

U8TV broadcasts 'real' reality television and Web

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Zev Shalev is one of three masterminds behind U8TV.com, Canada's first Internet television channel, which broadcasts 14 reality-based programs on the Web with four of those shows simulcast on syndicated TV.

The programs – whose themes range from discussions on love and relationships to film – are hosted by eight Canadians who live together in a downtown Toronto loft that also functions as a digital TV station.

As well, the lofter's lives can be viewed on the Internet 24 hours a day care of "snoopcams," part of a range of the most up-to-date technology Shalev relies upon to bring viewers what has been dubbed "real reality TV" according to a public opinion survey.

And just as Shalev is revolutionizing the media by creating a television station that exists on the Internet, he's also helping to revolutionize reality TV by making it, well, more realistic than other so-called reality shows.

"Our programming cuts through the facades of traditional TV," he says during an interview from U8TV.com headquarters, which buzzes with activity.

"We don't ship people off to an island or to Africa. Our shows are about people's lives and the intricacies of those lives. People can relate to that better than they can to people eating elephant in Africa," says the 29-year-old, taking a jab at the hit reality game show Survivor, which, he points out, is filmed in advance and edited.

"Audiences aren't really buying what's on TV; they're demanding something new. People want to see greater realness, something with more relevance to their lives."

Shalev liked the idea of creating a personal connection between the audience and the viewer, a feat achieved because audiences can e-mail their thoughts and feelings on the issues discussed to the lofters and even question the lofters' actions. When the eight roomates respond to viewers on U8TV.com programming, they are thereby influencing the reality they see.

Launched on Jan. 15, 2000, after receiving financial backing by entertainment giant Alliance Atlantis Communications Inc., U8TV.com has rapidly gained in popularity.

The U8TV.com Web site gets over 30 million hits a month, and the hit show, The Lofters, which chronicles the lives of the eight roommates, is often the number one or two rated show on the Life Network for 18- to 49-year- olds.

"The Lofters has been very successful," says Shalev, who with his older sister Lily and another partner, Fiorella Grossi, came up with the idea and put it into motion.

"It took some time for people to understand what it is, but now, broadcasters want to licence it."

A new program, Love Shack, a talk show hosted by the female loftmates, premiered on the Life Network on Oct. 5, and more shows are scheduled to air on TV in January.

But the success of U8TV.com isn't all that surprising, considering that nearly every project Shalev touches turns to gold.

Born in Israel and raised in Johannesburg, South Africa, Shalev was politically active in high school and campaigned against apartheid.

"We lived a great life during the apartheid. We benefited from the fact that others were being persecuted, and so the suffering [of blacks] was easy to ignore. I felt this was incredibly wrong."

Shalev started an organization of students who opposed the Nationalist Party government and its laws.

At university, Shalev majored in media studies, and after graduation, worked full-time at Radio 702, South Africa's only independently run radio station, where he had his own talk show, interviewed Nelson Mandela, threw back a couple of drinks with the country's current leader, and covered the end of the apartheid era.

"We knew at the time that the end of the apartheid was the biggest story we would ever cover. But news started becoming ordinary after that and I wanted to try something different."

Shalev moved to Canada five years ago with his family and started out as a story producer at CTV's Canada AM, eventually becoming the show's youngest-ever executive producer. Sweeping changes were made under his leadership and the show's ratings reached new levels.

During that time, he also became a two-time Gemini Award nominee, and in 1999, Shalev won the Canadian Association of Broadcasters CAN-PRO Award for excellence in broadcasting for his coverage of SwissAir Flight 111. A year later, he was named one of the Globe and Mail's top 133 Canadians under 35 who are making changes across the country and around the world.

Despite this success, Shalev was ready to give it all up in pursuit of a new project.

"Fiona and I just quit our jobs at CTV," he says.

The team pitched their idea to Alliance Atlantis the morning of their last day at CTV, went back to empty the contents of their office, and by the end of the day had secured Alliance's support.

While getting funding was easy, Shalev says he and his partners were naïve.

"We didn't realize how hard it would be. The concept was new, the technology was new and nobody had ever put people on TV for this long. Every challenge was a million times harder because nobody has done it before."

Shalev and his team have just conducted a Canada-wide search for the station's second season cast.

"There will be eight new people hosting the shows and we can't wait to see them," says Shalev, who is intrigued by the idea of putting together people from different backgrounds and watching them learn to understand and accept each other.

"You can't predict their dynamics or what will happen. Every day is a surprise."

Director adds a Jewish touch to play Fully Committed

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Danny Goldstein, associate director of the first Canadian production of the hit show Fully Committed, says it was his idea to inject a Jewish element into a play set in New York during Christmastime.

For the one-man play's original New York production – about an out-of-work actor who takes reservations in an ultra-chic Manhattan restaurant – Goldstein suggested adding a chanukiyah to the set props.

"In New York during the holiday season there is a sense of Christmas, Christmas, Christmas – and oh yes, Chanukah, too. On our set are all Christmas decorations and in the middle I put an electric menorah – it just seemed very New York to me," he explains.

But finding an electric menorah in September in New York was not easy, so Goldstein called his mother, who happened to have one in the attic. The menorah was broken – only six of its eight lights worked – but it was fixed in time for opening night at the non-profit Vineyard Theater and can now be seen in all its electric splendour on the Winter Garden stage.

In Toronto, Fully Committed stars comedic actor Mark McKinney, of Kids in the Hall and Saturday Night Live fame, who plays all 39 of the shows wildly different characters.

The play was conceived by Becky Mode and its original New York star, Mark Setlock. It's based on characters they encountered when working as underlings at Bouley, a trendy Manhattan restaurant.

Goldstein, 26, served as Nicholas Martin's assistant director in New York. Martin is billed as the production's director in Toronto, but Goldstein is running the show. He has also restaged all subsequent versions of the show for Martin in San Francisco, Los Angeles and Washington, D.C.

Goldstein says the play is more than an excuse for its star to show off an ability to play multiple characters.

"For me, the character of Sam and all the other characters is secondary and a gimmick – a play that survives on a gimmick alone doesn't work," Goldstein says.

"When I direct a play, the actors and I really try to find the story. [Fully Committed] isn't really about a guy who wants to be on stage – because who cares about one more actor who wants to be a star – it is about a sweet guy who wants to go home to the Midwest to be with his dad for Christmas.

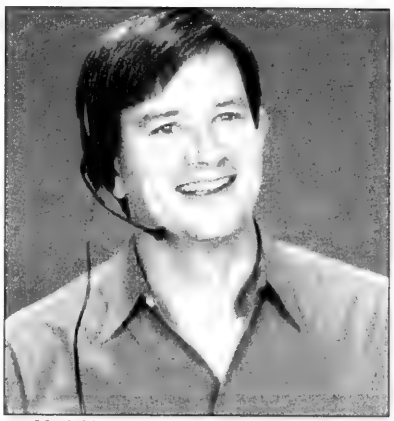
"This makes the play about something that you can really root for," says Goldstein.

Goldstein says Martin became his mentor and good friend two summers ago in Massachusetts, when he worked as Martin's assistant director on the Williamstown Theater Festival's production of [the Tennessee Williams play] Camino Real.

"He told me he was doing the first production of Fully Committed at the… Vineyard Theater," Goldstein said. "He asked me to assist him, saying there's no pay, but if the play is a hit, I'll have some work because he was never going to stage it again, so I could direct it wherever I wanted to."

The play later moved to the off-Broadway Cherry Lane Theater, where it ran for 1½ years.

In remounting the play on the road, Goldstein works within the confines of what Martin originally created. But Martin has encouraged Goldstein to leave his mark, as he has with the chanukiyah.



Mark McKinney stars in Fully Committed.

Next month, Goldstein will be credited as director in a production of Fully Committed opening in Pittsburgh, and over Chanukah, the show will be opening in Fort Lauderdale, where Goldstein says the menorah will continue to shine.

Goldstein, who changed his aspirations of becoming an actor to a director while at Northwestern University in Illinois, has a list of directing credits that include =Celebration by Josie Dickson and Ethan Sandler (who starred in Fully Committed in San Francisco) and John Ford's 'Tis Pity She's a Whore.

Goldstein is also a playwright whose plays include Winter Birds, based on the novel by Jim Grimsley, and the one-person show Bridge the Wound, both of which Goldstein directed in New York. He also co-wrote and directed a New York production of The Song of Songs, a musical based on the love story by Shalom Aleichem, along with composer Michael Friedman.

Goldstein says he hopes to shop The Song of Songs around North America to Jewish theatre companies.

PICASSO, EINSTEIN HELP TO PROMOTE DOWNTOWN JEWISH DAY SCHOOL

A performance of the Steve Martin play Picasso at the Lapin Agile, currently playing at the Bluma Appel Theatre, has been earmarked as a benefit fundraiser for the Downtown Jewish Day School, which is affiliated with the Miles S. Nadal JCC on Bloor Street.

Because the school offers an arts-enriched curriculum that combines Hebrew and Jewish subjects with a traditional public-school curriculum, school officials feel a theatrical evening is a particularly appropriate event for a fund-raiser.

It also doesn't hurt that actor Alon Nashman, who plays Albert Einstein in the play, has a child who attends the school, which has been temporarily relocated to 80 Clinton St. while the JCC undergoes renovation.

Picasso at the Lapin Agile tells the story of an imaginary meeting between the young painter and Einstein in a Paris bistro in 1904. The Toronto Star called it a "deliciously witty romp" and gave it five out of five stars. Reviewer Richard Ouzounian especially praised Nashman's "show-stopping, star-making turn" as Einstein.

Tickets for the benefit start at $100, and include a post-performance reception and a chance to win a weekend at the Inn at Manitou. Bluma Appel Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre. Saturday, Dec. 1, 8 p.m. 416-928-3537.

Sewing Visions of Peace: Almost 300 people from North America and Europe have stitched their dreams into the Middle East Peace Quilt, with each square depicting a personal vision of peace between Jew and Palestinian.

Vancouver fabric artist Sima Elizabeth Shefrin created the project, which is co-sponsored by a broad spectrum of Jewish, Arab and other community groups.

The quilt goes on view at the Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave., Sunday, Nov. 25, 2 p.m. The opening features cultural presentations from the Jewish and Arab communities, with Shefrin in attendance. It's also on view on the Sundays of Dec. 2, 9 and 16, 1 to 4 p.m., or by appointment. 416-789-5502.

Israeli Band Visits Canada: Reva L'Sheva, a top Israeli folk band, performs in Toronto and Montreal in late November. The concerts are sponsored by Hillel, Jewish Campus Services and the Israeli Consulate, and organized by students, including many participants from the March of the Living and Birthright Israel programs.

Reva L'Sheva's describes its own as a "lively mix of progressive rock 'n' roll fused with blues, country and [Rabbi Shlomo] Carlebach's Jewish spirituals, influenced by the Grateful Dead and set to an Afro-ethnic beat."

The band's love of Israel and the Jewish people, and its upbeat music and unifying message "are a perfect fit for our young people," said Sarah Zelcer, arts and culture coordinator for Toronto's Jewish Campus Services.

"At a time when Israel is under such pressure, it is so important to give our young people a way to reinforce their connection with Israel," said Ralph Lipper of Montreal, national chair of the March of the Living.

The band has performed with Arab musicians and in the settlements, and the six band members are a mix of religious and secular. "Reb Shlomo taught: the right hand joins the left, claps with the beat," said band leader Yehuda Katz. "If we can get the left and the right together from every political camp, think of the music we can make!"

Reva L'Sheva appears at Club Soda in Montreal on Nov. 27, and at Reverb in Toronto on Nov. 28. (Bais Groove opens for the band in Toronto.) For tickets, call the Toronto March of the Living office, 416-635-2883, ext. 149, or the Montreal Hillel office, 514-845-9171, ext. 224.

Any (technicolour) dream will do nicely for the Yorkminstrels

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — The reverse psychology used by his late mother Rose led Dr. Harvey Cooperberg, 51, to become a dentist instead of going into show business.

At age 21, he said, he was headed for Broadway after receiving a favourable review in a McGill University musical revue.

"It went straight to my head. There it was, in black and white. My parents wanted me to become a dentist, but my mother relented and said she would opt for Broadway. No 21-year-old in his right mind would do what a mother suggested, so I went into dentistry!"

But Cooperberg has not given up on the theatre. He has a lead role in the upcoming Yorkminstrels production of Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, at the Leah Posluns Theatre from Nov. 24 to Dec. 2.

Now, he said, he can combine his dentistry practice in Markham with the pleasure of rehearsing twice a week with the Yorkminstrels. He somehow finds the time to run his practice – in 1995, he was president of Alpha Omega, a Jewish dental fraternity in Toronto – co-chair the UJA Federation telethon and sing to his heart's content.

A tenor, Cooperberg plays the role of Reuben, the leader of Joseph's brothers who betray him.

"I enjoy working with the Yorkminstrels because they are such a dedicated group," he said. "Joseph is a happy play, full of fun and a happy ending. Audience members will be amazed by a 15-foot-high pyramid which is part of the wonderful sets."

Cooperberg had a part in the Yorkminstrels production of Kiss Me Kate when he first came to Toronto in 1981. Last year, he starred in their production of A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum.

But for 14 years, he stepped aside from his musical acting to meet his obligations to his family – his wife Maura and their children, Erin, 17, and Lorne, 20. It was not until his 10-year-old daughter was in a Yorkminstrels production of Fiddler on the Roof that Cooperberg tried out for and got a part in the same production.

Virginia Reh

Virginia Reh, another Jewish artist and a veteran of stage musicals, is artistic director of Joseph.

"One thing driving the cast is that I'm bringing a Jewish perception to the story," Reh said.

"It's also an advantage that the show is not written from a Jewish point of view. It's just an interesting, dramatic story which goes back to the roots of who we are, and how we got there.

"This Genesis story is accepted not only by Judaism, but also by Christianity and Islam as being a founding story."

Reh said she did not want the Ishmaelites who sell Joseph into slavery to be overtly Arab.

"After all, at this point in the story, they are only three generations removed; they are a very close cousin. I feel close to it right now because of the difficult times we are going through."

All 11 of Joseph's brothers appear in the play. Reh has had previous experience directing large casts (there are 98 cast members in Joseph, though they are not all onstage all the time), having directed Yorkminstrels productions of Where's Charley, Once Upon a Mattress, Anything Goes and Guys and Dolls, all of which were performed at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

For the current production, she is rehearsing separately with members of the Bach Children's Choir, 28 to 41 of whom are onstage at the same time.

Though it is a difficult play to direct, Reh said she is enjoying the experience of condensing Joseph to 18 musical and dance numbers, with no dialogue. And she is happy about working in the Leah Posluns Theatre once again.

"I like that theatre. It's a gem. We're very lucky to have it," she said. "It's got a real fly gallery, which very few community spaces have. It's got a real orchestra pit. It's small enough and intimate enough to be friendly to an audience and non-professional voices. It's big enough for us to build crazy things on stage."

For ticket information about Joseph, call 416-291-0600.

CORRECTION

In our Nov. 15 article, "For the Love of a Tenor," the accompanist's name was incorrect. It is Nathan Rosen who has been involved with music in the Jewish community for the past 40 years. The CJN regrets the error.

St.Pete's offers some cultural surprises

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — While tourists have been coming to this city for years for the sun and its fabulous beaches, it has been quietly transforming itself into a worthy cultural destination.

Snowbirds might be surprised to discover that America's fourth largest Holocaust Museum is located in the heart of downtown St. Petersburg. The museum's striking permanent exhibit brings visitors into direct contact with the past: an original rust-coloured boxcar used to transport prisoners in Poland sits squarely on the main floor. Although undeniably grim, the boxcar brings history into sharp focus.

On the opposite wall, you'll find a varied collection of family photos. Pick up one of the many speakers on the wall and you'll hear relatives' voices reminisce about the individuals and the picnics, weddings and birthdays that are pictured.

The state of Florida has made studying the Holocaust mandatory in its schools, so the museum sees a steady stream of student trips and organizes educational programs for teachers.

The museum also features excellent touring exhibits on its upper floor. The current show, which lasts until March 10, 2002, is Fragments: Portraits of Survivors, by Toronto photographer Jason Schwartz.

Fragments, by Toronto photographer Jason Schwartz, runs until March 10.

A longtime cultural presence in St. Petersburg is the well-known Salvador Dali museum, which boasts the world's most comprehensive Dali collection, amassed over 45 years by A. Reynolds Morse and Eleanor Morse.

The Spanish surrealist's work dates from 1917 to 1970 and has proven a perfect match for the city on Tampa Bay. Dali himself grew up by the sea in Spain and was fond of painting sea motifs in his canvases. And where else would be a more appropriate location for a museum dedicated to this eccentric genius, with his famous melted clocks that look as if they'd been left out too long in the tropical sun?

Florida's first tourist boom exploded in the roaring twenties, when sun-seekers arrived in droves on the new trains that made the Sunshine State a glamorous and affordable winter destination.

This was the era of lavish hotels that catered to every guest's need. Two regal hotels dating from the 1920s miraculously escaped the wrecker's ball and have been fully restored.

Scott Fitzgerald and his flapper wife Zelda were among Jazz Age celebrities who stayed at the Moorish-style Don Cesar Beach Front Resort, a flamboyant "Pink Palace" popular with showbiz types and the odd gangster.

After some sad days in the early 1970s, the Don Cesar has returned to full glory, despite the occasional sighting of the founder's ghost roaming its capacious halls.

Equal to the Don Cesar in legend and status is the Renaissance Vinoy Resort on Fifth Ave., facing Tampa Bay. This Mediterranean Revival hotel was fully restored in 1992, complete with the addition of a splendid new wing. Historical tours of the Vinoy attract thousands of people each year.

Guests used to while away the winters on vast terraces, or sunbathe in special solariums in the tropical Tea Garden. On opening night in 1925, Paul Whiteman's Orchestra headlined at the palatial Vinoy Ballroom, which is once again a hot venue for private functions. Within walking distance, you'll find the Museum of Fine Arts and the St. Petersburg Museum of History.

American history buffs shouldn't miss the Florida International Museum, an affiliate of the Smithsonian in Washington, D.C. The engrossing permanent display focuses on the life of former U.S. president John F. Kennedy, featuring objects closely identified with this ever-fascinating man.

There's a full-scale reproduction of JFK's PT-109 navy boat and a to-scale recreation of the White House Rose Garden. Other treasures include a letter from a world-weary Jack, written during World War II to a journalist friend, as well as her response, a clear attempt to cheer him up and remind him of the contributions he has still to make.

No one who has ever wondered about the famous marriage between Jack and Jackie will come away disappointed. Personal items include a letter showing it was Jackie – who later became a book editor – who urged her husband to write Profiles in Courage as he recuperated from a back injury. When the book won the Pulitzer Prize, Jack donated the prize money to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

But St. Petersburg isn't all museums. You can still spend the afternoon fishing off the old downtown pier. And St. Pete's vintage hotels are truly seductive. Both the Don Cesar and the Vinoy offer terrific dining and shady verandas for drinks or afternoon tea.

Home to American Stage, Florida's oldest theatre company – which performs Shakespeare in a park on Tampa Bay – the city also showcases the Mahaffey Theatre for the Performing Arts, a venue for everything from Tony-award winning Broadway shows to soul-stirring gospel music.

Video more than just a film about baseball

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Just recently, millions of fans were glued to their television sets to watch an underdog take on the Yankees in the annual World Series.

It was, therefore, an appropriate time for the video release of one of the best documentary films I have seen in some time— The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg.

In fact, this documentary is more than just about baseball. It is about a particular time and place – the '30s and '40s in America. It is about a folk hero who took on mythical proportions and came to represent an entire people.

Greenberg was one of the first players in the Major Leagues who was comfortable being identified as a Jew.

He did not change his name, nor did he flinch when his Jewish origins were discussed in public. In fact, he was quite proud of being Jewish and of being a hero to Jewish kids and adults throughout the United States. And he often fulfilled the hopes and dreams of his idolizing fans.

At a time when Jews were not known for their physiques, Greenberg was a muscular giant. At six foot four and weighing between 220 and 240 pounds, he was often the biggest man on the baseball diamond.

When Jews were struggling for self-esteem, Greenberg was a shining example of what Jews could accomplish in America.

The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg is a tribute to this hall of famer and was a work of love and caring by writer/director Aviva Kempner.

The film includes interviews with Greenberg and some of his teammates, and comments by such people as actor Walter Matthau, lawyer Alan Dershowitz, and Senator Carl Levin.

Kempner also uses Mandy Patinkin's Yiddish rendition of Take Me Out To The Ball Game to set the tone and atmosphere.

The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg is now available on VHS and DVD at most video stores. It is a terrific film to rent and an even better addition to anyone's video collection.

Montreal JHH Foundation feud going to court

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An internal dispute at the Jewish Eldercare Centre over who controls millions of dollars in foundation money is going to court.

The centre, the result of a merger between the Jewish Hospital of Hope (JHH) and Jewish Nursing Home (JNH) at the end of last year, is suing the JHH Foundation for not releasing to the new institution all of the income from the $4 million it holds or new money it raises, said centre president Murray Kotler.

The Eldercare Centre is also contesting the JHH Foundation's legal right to continue to use that name. Kotler said the Eldercare Centre has a "proprietary right" to the name JHH, but essentially the name has been "erased."

"This is a question of whether the foundation drives the hospital or the hospital drives the foundation," he said.

The JHH Foundation cannot continue to operate as if it the merger has not taken place, Kotler said. The board of directors of the new institution has authorized the new Jewish Eldercare Foundation to be its sole official fund-raising arm. Currently, that foundation consists mainly of the former JNH's assets, which Kotler said were considerably less than those of the JHH.

He said the JHH Foundation is raising about $125,000 a year and generating approximately $300,000 in annual income. The JHH Foundation is handing over between $125,000 and $155,000 to the Eldercare Centre, Kotler said, but its board effectively has a "veto power" over how much it gives and how the money is spent. The rest of the income is going solely to the former JHH, he said.

He said negotiations have been going on for four or five years to try to reach an agreement with the JHH Foundation, but have failed.

"It's sad it had to come to this," he said. "We have enough problems dealing with the government and a deficit. We don't need this [dispute], which absorbs time and effort."

The JHH and JNH had one board and executive director from 1995, a unification forced by the Quebec government, but they remained distinct institutions.

However, the merger that resulted in the creation of the Eldercare Centre and made the two institutions one legal entity was voluntary. The new centre continues to operate out of two buildings about 180 feet apart.

A Superior Court judge is expected to set a trial date later this month, Kotler said.

The issue became public when the Eldercare Centre placed a full-page advertisement in The CJN Oct. 18.

It read: "The purpose of this message is to inform you that the Jewish Eldercare Foundation is the only foundation that is authorized to receive and solicit donations for the Jewish Eldercare Centre and its founding partners, the Jewish Hospital of Hope and the Jewish Nursing Home."

The ad, which appears over the name of Kotler, also alleges that the JHH Foundation "continues to solicit and accept donations even though we have asked it to cease. It has ignored repeated requests to suspend fund-raising activities and work with the officially recognized Jewish Eldercare Foundation.

"Accordingly, we have undertaken legal action against the JHH Foundation asking that it cease such activities and cease using the name Jewish Hospital of Hope."

Kotler said the ad was placed because there is a lot of confusion among the public over which foundation represents the institution. That confusion, he said, is hampering fund-raising by the Eldercare Foundation.

JHH Foundation president Morris Friedman has declined to comment.

However, Cecil Labow, president of the foundation for 25 years after its founding in 1972 and a past president of the JHH, said the JHH Foundation is federally chartered and is a separate organization from the institution. Its role is to provide funds for services or projects not covered by the government.

He also added that, according to law, the merger that created the Eldercare Centre was an integration of the JNH into the JHH, the older institution.

Labow expressed a strong attachment to the JHH, an institution to which he has given over 50 years of volunteer service. He also says he is the one who persuaded the government to let it build a new facility in the West End and who led the drive to raise $25 million for the project.

At a public Eldercare Centre board meeting last week, Kotler acknowledged that the provincial health act does not authorize the board of an institution to create a foundation.

Board member Gerry Weinstein later said he is concerned the Eldercare Centre wants to use the JHH Foundation income to help it reduce a $3-million deficit.

The JHH was founded in 1942 in east-end Montreal, and the smaller JNH was opened next door in 1970 for residents who required less nursing care. Both institutions jealously guarded their separate identities for 30 years, even though their missions were similar and they were neighbours.

Both built new facilities a block apart in Côte des Neiges in 1993. Each has 160 beds, although the JHH building cost twice as much to build as the JNH, Kotler said.

The JHH went to court to try to prevent the unification of the instititutions' administrations imposed by Bill 120, but lost.

"We are extremely angry that money is being wasted on ads and lawyers," board member Avrum Dunsky, who represents the JNH users' committee, said at that public meeting. "We have to find a way to focus on the needs of the patients."

Weizmann scientists make glaucoma breakthrough

JERUSALEM — Scientists at the Weizmann Institute have succeeded in stopping the progressive loss of eyesight in animals with a glaucoma-like disease.

Their study, reported in a spring 2001 issue of the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences U.S.A., suggests that Copaxone, a drug developed at the Weizmann Institute to treat multiple sclerosis, may also stop, or at least slow, the loss of eyesight in people with chronic glaucoma.

Glaucoma, which affects one percent of the adult population, is the main cause of blindness in adults. Most sufferers have increased pressure inside the eye due to defective drainage of the transparent fluid that bathes the eye and nourishes its outer cells.

The increased pressure damages the optic nerve, causing it to degenerate.

For many years, the search for improved glaucoma therapies focused on correcting the eye's drainage system in order to reduce pressure. Eventually, however, it became clear that reducing the pressure was not enough to halt the degeneration of the optic nerve, and did not eliminate the risk of blindness. Scientists concluded that a crucial factor was being overlooked, and they set out in search of the missing link.

Approximately five years ago, Prof. Michal Schwartz of the Weizmann Institute's neurobiology department proposed a new concept to account for the degeneration of the optic nerve that occurs after the pressure in the eye had been reduced. Schwartz suggested that while the initial damage to the nerve is indeed caused by increased eye pressure, secondary factors triggered by the initial damage contribute to the nerve's ongoing degeneration.

The offending factors include chemicals that play an important role in the life of a healthy nerve, but when the nerve degenerates, their concentrations increase to a toxic level.

One of these chemicals is the neurotransmitter glutamate, which spills from damaged nerve cells and adversely affects healthy neighboring cells.

Following the success of this research, trials in human patients with glaucoma are expected to begin soon. Scientists hope that the trials will be facilitated by the fact that the U.S. Food and Drug Administration has already approved Copaxone.

Habs' draftee develops new allegiance

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For Eric Himelfarb, the dream of one day playing in the National Hockey League is at least a couple of years away from becoming a reality. But the Thornhill native recently got a glimpse of what the professional game is all about after attending the Montreal Canadiens training camp.

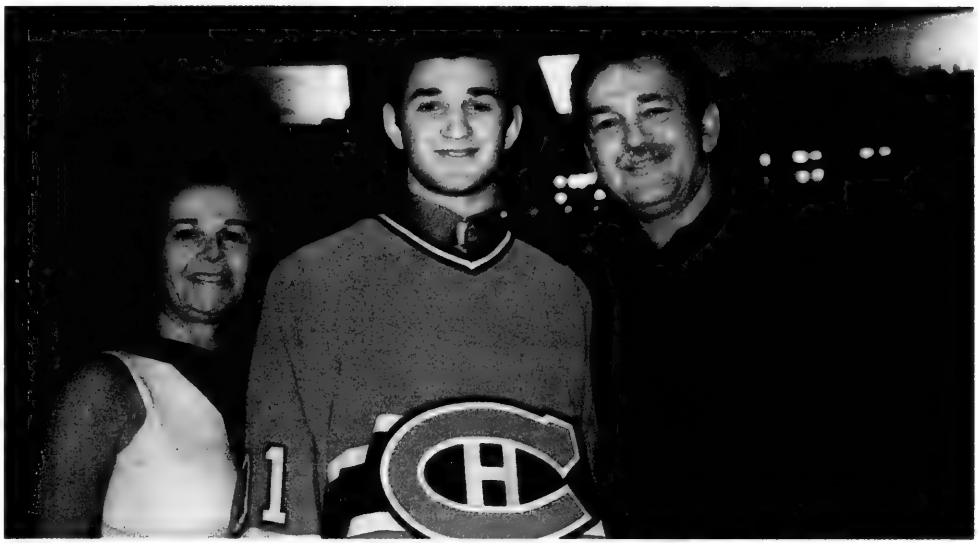
Himelfarb, a sixth-round selection (171st overall) of the bleu, blanc et rouge at June's NHL entry draft, stayed with the team until three days before the club's exhibition opener against his beloved Toronto Maple Leafs. The 18-year-old centre was then returned to junior, where he's captain of the Ontario Hockey League's Sarnia Sting.

In 23 games this year, Himelfarb has scored 13 goals and added 15 assists for 28 points. The Sting were not scheduled to play during the High Holy Days, but Himelfarb said he would not have suited up on Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur if the team had a game.

Leaf fan says he will have to cheer for the Habs now

"When you play hockey, your goal is to play in the NHL one day," he said. "Getting drafted is a big step. Granted, there is still a lot of work to do.

"I'm very excited and I was very pleased to be drafted by Montreal. I'm so used to watching the Leafs and Habs and cheering for the Leafs, because I'm a Toronto boy. I don't know what I'm going to do now. I think I'm going to have to start cheering for the team I was drafted by."



Eric Himelfarb (centre) with his parents Anne and Sam on the wings.

Prior to the draft, Himelfarb had been rated to go in the third round, but his stock dropped because of his small stature. At five-foot-nine, 160 pounds, his size was also a factor at the 1999 OHL Priority Selection when he fell to the fourth round (74th overall), the last one in which under-agers were selected. He takes it all in stride, saying that as long as one team likes you, that's all that matters.

Sarnia has been well rewarded for its late-round pick of Himelfarb, as the quick-skating playmaker was named team co-MVP in 2000-01, leading the Sting in points (75) and assists (44), despite missing 21 games in mid-season with mononucleosis.

He returned to the ice with a vengeance in the new year, posting a 10-game scoring streak (five goals, 10 assists) from Jan. 4-27. In February, he put together four consecutive four-point games, leading to both OHL Player of the Week and Player of the Month honours. Himelfarb potted eight goals and 14 assists in 10 games.

"Eric's a player that can dominate in the Ontario Hockey League this year," said Sting head coach Jeff Perry. "He's an offensive threat every time he's on the ice. He sees the ice extremely well and he is the go-to guy on our club."

A fixture on the power play, Himelfarb has excellent speed, outstanding puckhandling skills and an accurate shot with a quick release. The NHL's Central Scouting Report says he has the ability to make the players around him better, noting he's an exciting, imaginative player who plays with some bite to his game.

He certainly got noticed doing what he does best, but Himelfarb, who attended Associated Hebrew Schools, said it was a tough decision to bypass the college route. He turned down Ivy League schools such as Princeton to play junior hockey in Sarnia. In his heart, he felt playing in the OHL was the best way to get drafted.

College teams play only a 40-game season, while the OHL teams play a 70-game schedule and practise every day, a regime he felt was better for his development.

It also allowed him to stay relatively close to home. While it's still a three-hour trip from Thornhill to Sarnia, Himelfarb's parents hardly ever miss a game and visit their son nearly every weekend.

"I'm very lucky," said Himelfarb, whose brother also frequently attends his games. "They're great support. There aren't enough good things I can say about them."

DearKarilani

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I am 15 and all my friends are going to parties at different dance clubs. They are special clubs for young teenagers and they don't serve liquor. My mother won't let me join my friends. She insists that these clubs are "raves" and that there are drugs being used there. My point is, even if that is so, I have never done any drugs and I have never given my parents a reason to think that I would. I believe they should trust me to be responsible because of my past behaviour. What's your opinion?

Trust me

Dear Trust Me,

First of all, it's important to know that it is very common to feel that your parents don't give you enough freedom. Teenagers constantly feel as if their parents "baby" them. However, you should also know that your parents do have your best interests at heart. It is natural for them to feel worried about your becoming part of a bad scene.

If you want them to feel more comfortable with the idea of your going to clubs, you have a couple of options. First, simply talk to your parents and remind them how responsible you are. Reassure and promise them that you will not drink or do drugs. Second, ask your parents to allow you to go on the condition that you will call home a couple of times during the evening. If they hear your voice, they will feel more comfortable. You should also let them know exactly who you will be with. They will feel more comfortable if they are acquainted with your friends.

If they do decide to let you go, don't take advantage. Remember that they are uncomfortable with it. Clubs can be fun, but there are many other fun things to do as well, things that your parents would feel more comfortable with.

THOUSANDS ARE ANSWERING ISRAEL'S URGENT CALL. HAVE YOU?

Something huge is happening in our community. It involves 1,000 volunteers and more than 18,000 donors to date. With over $36 million pledged so far to UJA Federation Campaign 2002 and nearly $7 million in additional donations, we're well on our way to the most successful campaign in community history. But only with your help.

Israel needs us during these troubling times. The government has been forced to redirect $700 million U.S. from other vital services in order to meet mounting security costs. As a result, programs for Israel's vulnerable are threatened. Your gift increase will help to preserve services for them.

And this year, your gift increase will double on Israel's behalf, through the Challenge Fund, created by generous families in our community. The Challenge Fund will match all gift increases dollar for dollar. One million dollars from the Challenge Fund is waiting to be released. Only you can make it happen.

Please answer the call. Accept the challenge. Join the groundswell of support for Campaign 2002.

Seniors find true love

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Is it ever too late to find true love? Ask Phillip Sobel and Anita Hersh that question and the sprightly couple will answer with a resounding no. And they can prove it.

Phillip and Anita – both widowed and in their late 80s – got married recently at Terrace Gardens Retirement Lodge, in front of 125 guests who were truly moved.

"To see two people who have gone through so much feel such love at this advanced stage in life is very inspirational," said Rabbi Yoseph Oziel, of Petach Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation, who performed the ceremony. The rabbi, who hurt himself a day before the wedding and was hobbling on crutches, didn't let the injury stop him. "I would pay to be here for this one."

Anita, resplendent in her beige wedding gown and black veil and Phillip, lavishly attired in his blue suit, each walked down the aisle beaming. As Phillip stepped on the glass, the guests burst into simen tov and mazel tov and the couple danced up a storm.

It was a fitting culmination to a whirlwind courtship that started earlier this year.

Phillip, who has lived at Terrace Gardens for about 1½ years, quickly took a liking to Anita, who arrived six months after her groom-to-be.

"She's a nice, educated lady," said Phillip, explaining what prompted him to court Anita.

As the romance flourished, Phillip felt it was time to pop the question.

"I'm an open guy and when I want something, I ask for it. So I asked her to marry me and she said yes."

Although some friends and family were skeptical of the relationship at first, they quickly saw the couple was head over heels.

"Every time I would come to visit my grandmother, I would see them together, enjoying each other's company," said Dinah Akierman, Anita's granddaughter. "I think this [wedding] says that if two souls are destined for each other, then it may take a long time for them to get together, but they eventually will."

Natives of Poland, both Phillip and Anita are Holocaust survivors.

Anita and her first husband were forced to flee Poland as the Nazis invaded. They spent several years in Morocco before coming to Canada in the mid-1950s.

Phillip, a metal worker, said he witnessed several Jews being shot as the Nazis rolled into Poland, but he managed to stay alive by making SS guards beer cups and other metal objects.

He escaped to Siberia and eventually came to Canada, where he toiled as a metal worker for about 40 years.

After the ceremony, Phillip reflected on how the wedding provided a sense of closure to his difficult past.

"I think this wedding will make me forget all of the misery in my life," said the ecstatic groom. "I'll never forget seeing all of these beautiful people here."

Along with Phillip's stepson, Israeli member of Knesset Avram Ravitz, the couple now heads an extended family that includes Anita's son, three stepchildren, six grandchildren and 10 great-grandchildren.

Anita Hersh and Phillip Sobel proved to over 125 guests that it's never too late to find true love.

After September 11: Is it still OK to party?

As we discussed the planning of this supplement, we raised the question of whether, given the Sept. 11 terror attacks and subsequent events, it was right to do a supplement on parties. I was convinced that life goes on, babies are born, bar mitzvahs are celebrated, people get married. The cycle of life continues. It is my belief that changing our lifestyle now would be to succumb to the wishes of the terrorists.

I was planning to write an editorial to justify publication of this supplement when I received a call from Karen Garscadden of Up & Coming Events, who echoed my thoughts. Although, like any other business related to simchahs, Up & Coming Events stands to lose money if people stop celebrating, Garscadden seemed sincerely concerned for the same reasons I did.

The following was written by Marilyn Lazar, who works with Garscadden and her partner, Karen Jacobs.

– Joseph Serge

In the irony that pervades our times, life's darkest moments beg for a lightness of being.

"With what's going on in the world right now, our hearts are heavy and we weren't sure what to expect for the holiday season. But it seems that in the turmoil of today's political climate, people need to gather with friends and family more than ever," says Karen Jacobs.

Karen Garscadden expands on the idea: "Life cycle events take on an increased significance when people feel uneasy about the future. It's a life-affirming value."

"In uncertain times what could be more meaningful than the birth of a new baby, declaring our hope for the future?" asks Jacobs.

A bar or bat mitzvah is similarly important, representing the idea of coming of age; and everyone loves a wedding, a symbol of union, love and all that follows. Even the accoutrements of a party, like flowers, can be viewed as a celebration of nature and all life has to offer.

"Our corporate clients say they are scaling back in other ways, but they don't want to jeopardize office morale," Garscadden says. "This is uncharted territory. People want to do what's appropriate in these volatile times."

Guest Voice

In fact, research on behaviour during recessions indicates that, for the most part, employees are understanding about scaling back when it is obvious that outside forces are having an impact on their workplace. They can do without the hoped-for raise, accept the scaled-back bonus and graciously shoulder extra-heavy workloads. But don't skimp on the fringe benefits.

"You'd be surprised at the impact that little touches have," says Jacobs. "It really is the thought that counts. We help employers get creative with whatever their budget might be. Staff morale is so important in any organization. Everyone needs a pat on the back, a token of thanks or recognition for their contribution to the company."

"I see it in our personal client base as well," Garscadden adds. "The same emotions that drove people to be close to loved ones immediately after Sept. 11 continues to draw people together. People don't want to appear gaudy or go overboard, but more than ever, they want to celebrate. In an almost bittersweet way, people realize the significance of happy occasions and are determined to mark them."

Despite intifadah, lifecycle events in Israel are incomparable

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's almost accepted as a given – a sort of Jewish urban legend – that in times of difficulty, Jews cut back on their trips to Israel while Gentiles flock to the Holy Land undeterred by the violence.

It turns out that story is as accurate as other popularly accepted myths and tall tales, like Nostradamus predicting the World Trade Center bombings or alligators alive in the sewers of New York.

As it happens, statistics compiled by the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) indicate that in periods of reduced tourism, the percentage of Jewish travellers increases. Conversely, as tourism to Israel increases overall, the percentage of Jewish travellers decreases. In 1998, for example, 41 percent of the 43,000 Canadian visitors to Israel were Jewish. In 2000, a terrific year for tourism until the intifadah erupted in late September, only 22 percent of 55,000 Canadian visitors was Jewish.

Jewish travellers remain the mainstay of the Canadian tourism market, said Dani Shahal, the newly appointed director of IGTO Canada and Israel's consul for tourism. While travel to Israel in 2001 is down about 40 percent from the year before, Jewish travellers are still visiting Israel in respectable numbers. Tour operators and El Al, the country's national airline, continue to market Israel as an incomparable destination for historic, cultural and religious attractions, as well as a memorable venue for life cycle events, like Pesach pilgrimages and bar and bat mitzvahs.

Ehud Telem, president of Peerless Travel, one of, if not the largest, Canadian tour operators to Israel, said family tours present an experience of enduring cultural value and memories for a lifetime.

Bar and bat mitzvahs, of course, are important life cycle events wherever they occur, but in Israel, the experience is magnified, he said.

Visiting the historic fortress at Masada, touring an Israeli army base, enjoying a half-day desert tour complete with a traditional dinner in a Bedouin tent, participating in an archeological dig and of course, visiting Jerusalem, make coming of age in Israel a far from conventional life cycle experience, Telem said.

Families returning from celebrating a bar or bat mitzvah in Israel often refer to it as one of the best trips of their lives, said Stanley Morais, sales and marketing manager for El Al Israel Airlines.

Prior to the outbreak of the intifadah, celebrating life cycle events in Israel "was on a big upswing. There were a lot of people travelling there for a bar or bat mitzvah," Morais said. Since then, "those numbers have dropped off considerably."

That trend, however, may be changing.

"People feel the situation in Israel has been going on for more than one year, and that it may become a permanent situation. We hope it's not, but people want to celebrate a bar or bat mitzvah" and the opportunity only comes around once for each child, he said.

For others, putting aside a "sense of fear" and showing solidarity with the Jewish State is important, Morais said. As an example, he points to an Israeli woman marrying a non-Israeli who "feels it's important to show him the country. She wants to show his family the country and celebrate the wedding in Israel."

Others, too, are not letting the troubles in the region dissuade them from fulfilling long-standing plans to visit Israel. Morais points to a family of 15 from across North America who gathered recently in Jerusalem to celebrate a golden wedding anniversary.

"They wanted to go to Israel. They know going to Israel is important, that it will make an impact on their lives." As a result, they're putting their concerns about security behind them. "The emotional connection to Israel is superceding the fear factor," he said.

Faced with a drop off in travel, El Al is offering a special fare for families travelling to celebrate bar or bat mitzvahs. When parents pay the usual fare, their child travels

PARTY PLANNER

XTREMELY:
Out of the ordinary DJs

By MICHAEL SPIAR
Special to The CJN

The disc jockeys at Entertainment Xtreme (416-488-8411) pride themselves on being as out of the ordinary as possible.

From innovative special effects to pure personality, Entertainment Xtreme strives to be No. 1. Though the company is only two years old, its staff, some of whom have ten years experience, have proven to be innovative, creative and hardworking in the name of fun.

"They put personality first," DJ Jared Florence says.

Xtreme DJs interact with guests of all ages at the same time, making the party an experience for all to remember. Many clients, such as kids who have recently had a bar or bat mitzvah, often know the dancers and DJs who often double as camp counsellors, so there is already a connection with them that enhances the party experience. Adults like the amount of experience Xtreme DJs have; many of the DJs have worked anywhere from 100 to 1000 parties.

Entertainment Xtreme boasts 40 full-time DJs, including Florence, and 44 dancers. The company also provides various other forms of entertainment, such as human statues, breakdancers, fire breathers, stilt walkers, yo-yo experts and moving cocktail tables. They are always coming up with new ways of pleasing a crowd, from their newly formed party patrols (two DJs and two dancers as a single team) and two motorcycles which the clients can ride into the party as a party starter. They currently have a Harley-Davidson and a Ducati, a sports-model motorcycle. They have all this as well as the quintessential smoke, lasers, fireworks and lights.

Entertainment Xtreme crews work to keep classic party pleasers new, refreshing and fun. They are constantly reinventing dances to old songs, using re-mastered disco songs from the '70s to have a more modern beat and updating their song lists so they can cater to any audience. They go over the playlist with their clients, so they'll know what to play during the event.

To take the pressure off planning a party, Entertainment Xtreme can handle much more than the music. They can take care of decorations as well, and of nearly every other aspect of your event.

Consultants let you relax and enjoy the party

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A consultant can take away the headaches of planning a party.

Bridal consultant Tamara Temes (905-770-7977) and party consultant Jodi Sax (416-525-3470), say they specialize in making the wedding stress free for the entire family.

"I talk about the four C's when choosing a consultant," says Temes.

A consultant needs to be compatible with her clients, she says. "She should recognize their needs and understand that each wedding is different. There are no blueprints or moulds for any wedding.

"She also has to be capable, organized and professional. The third C is commitment. The consultant should be planning the wedding as if it is her own. She should be committed from beginning to end."

The fourth C, "and a very important C, is that the consultant needs to care. She has to care enough about the wedding to put all she can into it. When one of my clients says thank you, that is, for me, an immense reward."

Temes, who has been in business for about six years, has done over 40 weddings, "and has enjoyed each one."

Temes arrives at the wedding party before the other professionals, she says, "and immediately starts organizing. If the bridal party wants help dressing, I'm there to do that."

Her emergency kit contains everything from a lint brush and safety pins to needle and thread. "When a groom's button fell off just before he walked down the aisle, I was right there with my sewing kit."

Sax says the secret behind a good consultant is accumulating excellent service people.

"I have, for example, a florist who does incredible design work and centrepieces. Hiring someone who is upscale, does not necessarily mean spending more money, but it does mean adding more class and sophistication to your party."

She says she puts in a "lot of leg work in order to help a client stick to a budget. If we want a decorator to keep her price down, I'll try to do some of the work for her. I go the extra mile so my client can get what she wants.

"I don't take on a lot of clients because I want the time to do everything I can to make the party perfect."

The night of the event, Sax comes two or three hours early "wearing comfortable shoes because I have a lot of running around to do.

"I run a tight ship. I like to make sure the caterer is ready to serve hors d'oeuvres at least a few minutes early, so the guests that come in first will have them immediately.

"The pianist, if there is someone playing during the cocktail hour, also needs to start a little early. I want the guests who come in early to come into a welcoming event, not an empty room."

These are small things, she says, "but these parties are milestone events, and people want them to be perfect."

Traditional anniversary gifts

Anyone wondering what to give relatives or friends to mark a particular anniversary need look no further than the traditional symbols that represent specific years.

During the early years, useful items supply the household needs that may not have been filled by the wedding presents. However, as time passes, the couple's enduring relationship deserves to be saluted by increasingly precious gifts.

Moreover, as the family matures, more money is put aside for children entering university. Fewer dollars are available for household improvements and luxuries. By the time the couple reaches their 30th anniversary, they are usually empty nesters but their possessions have worn out or are out of style.

Despite the invention of new products, precious gems and other items that might become family heirlooms remain treasured gifts, and the symbols representing milestones remain in style. Here is a rundown of the traditional symbols:

- First (cotton);
- Second (paper);
- Third (leather);
- Fourth (silk);
- Fifth (wood);
- Sixth (iron);
- Seventh (wool);
- Eighth (bronze);
- Ninth (pottery);
- Tenth (tin);
- Fifteenth (crystal);
- Twentieth (china);
- Twenty-fifth (silver);
- Thirtieth (pearl);
- Thirty-fifth (coral);
- Fortieth (ruby);
- Forty-fifth (sapphire);
- Fiftieth (gold);
- Fifty-fifth (emerald);
- Sixtieth (diamond).

PARTY PLANNER

A full guest is a satisfied guest

Zucther Berk caters at many different venues.

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The meal you serve at your party will linger on the guests minds long after the event if the service is good, and the food is delicious and presented beautifully.

David Berk, who runs Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers (905-738-6880), is son-in-law of Max Zuchter who started the business in 1955.

"I believe the one of the secret of our success is the quality of our staff," Berk says. "We have one chef who has been with us for almost 40 years, and another for 31 years. We've had managers who have worked for us for 25 years. We surround ourselves with experienced, dedicated people."

As well as catering private parties, Berk caters at a number of venues, including Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, Adath Israel, Adath Shalom and Pride of Israel synagogues and the Embassy Suites Hotel. The current trend in cooking, he says, is toward using lots of fresh herbs and spices,"People are looking for natural food, and we can make dishes flavourful without using a lot of salt and pepper."

A Zuchter Berk favourite, he says, is Simply the Best Chicken which is stuffed with wild rice, woodland mushrooms and pine nuts, and served with red wine shiitake mushroom sauce.

"Salmon is also a favourite choice, as many people are trying to stay away from red meat," he says.

As one of his courses, says Berk, he has begun combining the appetizer, such as grilled salmon in a dijon mustard sauce, with the salad.

"By having to serve one less course, it leaves more time for the guests to party. It is also a different way for people to look at a meal."

Never forgetting that many people today are vegetarians, Berk says that among his favourite vegetarian dishes are empanada in a puff pastry, or paella. "Sometimes we get vegans, so we have to work on that. We try to please everyone."

Jared Bensky, director of business development at GMB Culinary Productions Inc. (416-789-7811), caters at Beth Sholom and Beth Tikvah synagogues as well as for private functions.

GMB Culinary Productions Inc executive chef Ashley Farnell shows his latest creaton to GMP co-owner Iain McIlveen.

He says that because a majority of his clients are health conscious, he serves a lot of fish and chicken.

Historic venues add elegance to a simchah

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The atmosphere says it all when you hold your party at an elegant and historic venue.

George Friedman, president of the Windsor Arms Hotel (416-971-9666) which was originally built in 1927, says the hotel reopened in 1999 after being completely rebuilt. It had been closed for about eight years.

"We have a brand new building, but the ambience and features reflect the old hotel. We restored the building under the supervision of the Toronto Historical Board along with a heritage consultant."

The 28-suite hotel, which can accommodate parties from 10 to 1,000 people, offers a full-service spa, a tea room for afternoon tea, a restaurant, a lounge with nightly entertainment and rooms for private functions.

Hosts who want to plan their party at the Windsor Arms have a number of choices, says Friedman.

"One party room has a natural skylight and a 50-foot-high ceiling so it appears to be a grand space. The room is decorated in warm beiges and limestone."

Those who want an outdoor party can have it on the hotel's fifth-floor patio that overlooks the city. It has also become a popular place to spend a relaxing hour before the wedding party, Friedman says.

The hotel's wedding package includes spa services, a room for the night and a chauffeur driven Bentley. "We walk people through every step of their party planning, and each client gets individual attention. We take the word customize to the next level," he says.

Gordon MacDonald, director of conference services and catering at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel (416-860-4556), says the hotel, which opened in 1929, can accommodate 150 to 500 people at a wedding or bar mitzvah.

The Imperial Room "which came to fame during the night club era, has been renovated, but has kept the style of its historic past.

"This room, located on the main lobby level, can easily accommodate about 350 guests. It is in three tiers and features marble columns, sheer window coverings and a built in stage. One of its advantages is that is is beautifully finished – no decorations are necessary."

The Ballroom, which is located on the convention floor, is also perfect for a party up to about 350 people, MacDonald says.

"It has marble columns, a hardwood floor and original mural painted ceilings."

The Concert Hall, the largest of the three rooms, can fit up to 650 people. "The west-facing windows are draped and the room is done in pale tones of beige and gold.

"Add candles and flowers and you have an elegant room for any large party," MacDonald says.

A minimum of 12 hotel departments are involved in any one party, he says.

"We have to co-ordinate such departments as the catering services, guest services, valet parking, and the engineering department. We need to make sure that all the logistics are in place. Each department is important in its own right.

"When you have a party here, it's a turn-key operation. You open the door and begin your event. Guests don't have to worry about a thing."

An elegant wedding reception at the Windsor Arms Hotel.

Plenty of Judaica gift ideas at Israel's

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

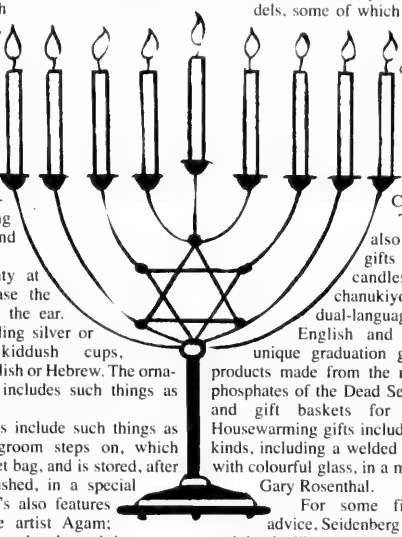
Annette Seidenberg of Israel's Judaica Centre (Phone: 416-256-1010, 905-881-1010) has a plethora of interesting Judaica gift ideas. Check out Israel's online store at www.israelsjudaica.com.

Consider a book as the ideal gift. A book travels easily, and if handled with care, it lasts for generations. It can become one of those keepsakes that helps preserve the continuity of a family – or a people.

With thousands of Judaica titles on its shelves, Israel's has books for everyone's tastes, from Hebrew poetry to traveller's guides to kosher cookbooks. You'll find works in translation, and in the original language.

Israel's also carries plenty of videos, including old Yiddish film classics. There's Judaica software, CD-ROMs to guide you through learning a language, music CDs and cassettes. If you want a child's gift, look at Searching For The Magic Yarmulka, a story on cassette by Shmuel Kunda.

Want your kids to have fun learning their heritage? The Jewish Plaster Casting Kit will occupy them for hours, as they make and paint Jewish shapes. The kit, for ages five and up, includes safety pins, magnet pieces, poster paints, brushes, reusable moulds, mixing cups, sandpaper, casting compound and paper stands.



There's plenty at Israel's to please the eye, as well as the ear. You'll find sterling silver or silver-plated kiddush cups, inscribed in English or Hebrew. The ornamental Judaica includes such things as miniature art.

Wedding gifts include such things as the glass the groom steps on, which comes in a velvet bag, and is stored, after it has been crushed, in a special mezuzah. Israel's also features chuppot by the artist Agam; after the wedding, the chuppah becomes a tallit. And there are kippot and kiddush cups with the wedding date, and the bride and groom's name.

Israel's carries a huge inventory of bar and bat mitzvah gifts. If you're planning a simchah, ask about their large selection of invitations, bentshers, kippot, decorations and other items.

Israel's tremendous array of Chanukah gifts includes chanukiyot, candles and dreidels, some of which are copied from ancient designs. Some of the dreidels have stands. The store also carries themed napkins, paper plates, and of course, chocolate Chanukah gelt.

The Judaica store also has specialty gifts such as Shabbat candles or mini-chanukiyot for travelling, dual-language certificates in English and Hebrew for a unique graduation gift, Israeli skin products made from the natural salts and phosphates of the Dead Sea, kosher candy, and gift baskets for any occasion. Housewarming gifts include mezuzot of all kinds, including a welded copper mezuzah with colourful glass, in a modern design by Gary Rosenthal.

For some final gift-giving advice, Seidenberg says to know the recipient's likes and dislikes, and decide what you want to spend. Choose a store with large, diverse inventory, helpful staff, and readiness to handle special orders. If you don't know exactly what to buy, give a gift certificate.

Say it with flowers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Flowers add colour, warmth and elegance to any room, says florist and party decorator Renee Birnbaum, owner of An Affair to Remember (905-881-6686.)

"Many people are turning to flowers to decorate a party room, rather than using themed decor. They can be dyed for a funky, bright, youthful look, or they can be arranged to look understated and sophisticated," she says.

They can also be incorporated into a theme. "We've taken star-shaped centrepieces and added flowers to give the centrepiece a touch of elegance," she says.

Birnbaum says that at her initial meeting with clients they establish a budget, and depending on the season, determine what type of flowers they would like for their party. "During the spring we use a lot of tulips, roses, lilacs and peonies. In the winter such flowers are lilies and gerberas – large daisies in orange and red – are popular."

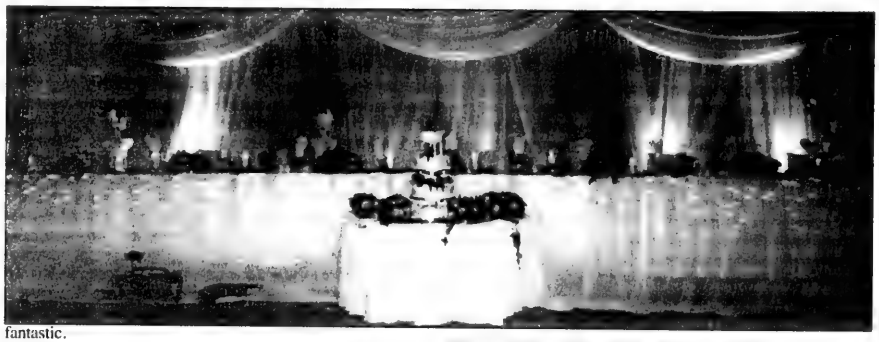
Most brides still pick roses, she says, and if they want them colourful they can choose from three shades of red, or orange. "Adding a bit of colour adds life to the wedding party. It looks very inviting."

Although most mothers-of-the bride don't wear corsages, says Birnbaum, men are wearing boutonnieres. "Many brides are wearing hand-tied grouping of roses formed into a ball, or else they may carry a grouping of three roses."

At one wedding, she says, she used roses, hydrangeas, peonies and lilies to decorate 50 tables. "We used five different stands and each stand had its own arrangement, but the colours were co-ordinated in pinks and purples.

"One stand may have had peonies and roses, and another hydrangeas, lilies and roses. We had the ceiling draped with sheer fabric, which added to the romantic look of the room. It took a whole day to put the whole room together, but the result was fantastic.

Many people are turning to flowers to decorate a party room, rather than using themed decor.



In order to stretch a budget, Birnbaum says she has combined candles and flowers. "We can go all out, or we can decorate on a smaller scale. In cases where people have had flower allergies, we have used greenery, candles and ribbons."

Paper flowers in vibrant colours are a favourite bar mitzvah decoration. "We arrange them in clay pots or add twirly pipes and put them in vases. Guests love taking them home," Birnbaum says.

"We advise people to come and see us as soon as they plan a party, and then come in closer to the date to choose whatever they want. We always make up a sample so they know exactly what they're getting. We do not want any surprises."

Art and tradition in the ketubah

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

In the simplest terms, a ketubah is a written marriage contract.

It is, of course, much more than this. It can also be a unique work of art.

Karny Rivlin Vorona (416-497-9555), an artist who creates handcrafted ketubot and haftarot, is a rich source of information on both. You can see finely coloured examples of her work at her Web site: www.ketubahbykarny.com.

According to Jewish law, every married woman must have a ketubah; a rabbi will not initiate a wedding without one. The ketubah, which belongs to the wife, not her husband, is her guarantee that he will provide for her. If lost, it must be rewritten under a rabbi's supervision.

It used to be that the husband gave the ketubah to his wife who then passed it to her mother for safekeeping. Nowadays, the wife usually keeps it herself.

Karny Vorona ascribes this change in custom to how far apart we live. At one time, most children lived near their parents and in-laws. Today, when mother and daughter may live at opposite ends of a continent, it's more convenient for the wife to keep the ketubah.

At the same time, women have become more independent, of parents as well as husbands. Is it possible that part of the reason for the change in custom is to let women keep the symbols of their major lifetime decisions in their own hands?

The Doves of Peace, a ketubah by Karny Rivlin Vorona.

The tradition of the ketubah dates back to the exile in Babylon. Until the coming of print, it was handwritten by the rabbi or chazzan. The traditional text, while written in Hebrew letters, is in Aramaic.

There are different texts as well. The traditional Orthodox version, what you usually find in a store, dates back to Babylon. Conservative and Reform texts are more modern, but within each denomination, there is standard wording.

Some couples want a ketubah in their own spoken language, such as English. This is permitted, but the Hebrew text, which is what makes the document legitimate, must be present.

Though there are fine handwritten ketubot from early times, many valid ketubot fall short of artistic quality. Before the printing press, not everyone who could write was a calligrapher.

But even the finest printing is less personal than fine handwriting. And today, there is a revived interest in the handmade ketubah as a work of art. As a document which commemorates a unique event, it should be unique and beautiful in its own right.

On first thought, it might seem the art would be mainly in the illumination, but this is not necessarily the case. An artist, for example, can write the text in colours, adding art to information. As to illumination, it can range from stylized motifs – for example, flowers – to detailed pictures.

Different communities have different kinds of pictures. In Morocco and Tunis, for example, where the stricture against graven images was very severe under Muslim influence, human figures were not used. Ashkenazi ketubot, in contrast, used them a great deal.

Today, although married couples are mindful of tradition, many do not feel as bound by it. For their illumination, they choose whatever is in good taste. At the same time, it must be emphasized that the text has to follow the tradition strictly, and be clear and legible.

Engage Karny Vorona's services two to three months ahead: fine work needs time. She will, however, make the effort to do last-minute commissions.

She also commissions anniversary ketubot, as well as haftarot in the format of illuminated documents. If your son or daughter has a bar or bat mitzvah coming up, consider an illuminated haftarah as a special gift.

Another ketubah designer advertising in this supplement is: Ketubah Ketubah (416-963-9191).

Boutique helps brides look their very best

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

Brides want to look their best on their big day, and a dress designed and handcrafted by the Tricia Cochran bridal boutique (416-964-9220) is a sure way to achieve this goal.

"We do all kinds of wedding gowns using only the finest silk," says Carol Gold, who helps run the salon, which is located off Bloor St. between Bay St. and Yonge St. across from the Manulife Centre.

Gold says the boutique also makes bridesmaid's dresses and eveningwear for mothers of the bride and for women in a bar or bat mitzvah party.

"We can design dresses that are simple, elegant, modern or Victorian, depending on the feeling you want," says Gold, adding that one of the store's gowns is on display at the Royal Ontario Museum.

They can also offer beading, rolled silk flowers and trimming with roula, or trim that matches the dress.

Right now, Gold says, A-line dresses with shoestring straps or strapless gowns are the most popular choices for brides.

"Very simple dresses are popular with the brides of today."

Clients are asked to first make an appointment because it takes over an hour to talk with the consultant about the dress they want.

After these discussions, the process of making the dress can begin.

"A lot of care is taken to make each dress. Clients will come for at least three fittings to make sure the dress is made perfectly for their body."

As the boutique makes between 150 and 200 gowns a year, Gold recommends ordering at least five months in advance.

Made-to-measure silk gowns cost from between $1,500 and $5,000, while eveningwear starts at $800.

"The quality of our dresses is unlike anybody else's," says Gold.

"And we're truly a Canadian designer. We don't buy fabrics from anywhere but Toronto. Most other bridal boutiques buy and sell from the Orient."

Also unlike many salons, Tricia Cochran dresses are made on the premises.

Gold says that the service at Tricia Cochran is excellent, too.

"We have a great reputation. We care for our clients really well."

Doo Doo is just the beginning for this party planner

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Shane Farberman puts on his nose, he becomes a different person.

Farberman, president of Farco Enterprises Ltd. (416-226-1108) is best known as Doo Doo the Clown and has been entertaining children and adults on stage, at charity functions and at parties for 21 years.

When he puts on his makeup, which takes about one hour, "I become Doo Doo. With the makeup off I become Shane: husband, father of two boys and event planner.

"I have two different characters, and it's important to separate them," says the Toronto native, who has been named Clown of the Year for the fourth year in a row by City Parent.

But Farco provides far more than Doo Doo's act. As well as other entertainment such as magicians, fortune tellers, a Dixieland Band, children's singers and jugglers, it also has balloon decorators, candy floss and popcorn machines, jumping castles and rides.

"We can make the whole party," he says.

Farberman, 38, whose family owned a travelling carnival, began clowning when a friend needed help with his own clown act.

"I discovered I could get paid for having fun. I began studying clowning and magic, and my parents encouraged me all the way."

'Its not the clown the kids love, he says, it's what the clown does'

Although his business has expanded since he first began clowning, Farberman says he still loves doing private parties.

"It's a great change from the acts I do on stage. I come in and do a full magic show and then I make balloon sculptures, paint the kids' faces and sing songs with them. My goal is to become their buddy. There is no greater feeling than to see their smiles."

It's not the clown the kids love, he says, it's what the clown does. "If a clown puts his heart into it the kids will know. I teach at a clown school and out of 100 students in my class at any one time, 10 may be putting their heart into it. The rest are just putting on an act."

Charity is an important part of his clowning, and he has performed at such events as the Sleep Disorder Walk and the Hadassah Bazaar. He has also been the mascot for Shoppers Drug Mart, which is planning a hospital tour for Doo Doo.

When clients come to Farco about giving a party, his staff specializes in creating ideas, says Farberman. "At bar mitzvahs, the kids really enjoy the fortune teller who comes and entertains for about two hours. The bar mitzvah child really gets a kick out of being led into the room by a marching band, complete with drums and horns.

"We can also help create props. If a party theme is movies, we can provide movie cameras and lights. We have about 12 decor people on staff."

Farberman says he takes his clowning very seriously. Before he hires a clown, he does a police check on him, and he supervises the clown's first 10 performances to make sure he is up to par. "We always know what everyone is doing."

Let a makeup artist help you look your best

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

Women aspire to look perfect on their special day, and that's why it can be best to leave makeup application to the experts.

"Having your makeup done by a professional makes a woman look more complete, it takes the stress away and it's fun to pamper yourself on a special day," says makeup artist Danielle Susskind (905-709-0924), who has been doing makeup for weddings, private functions, TV, commercials and film for a year now.

Makeup artist Estee Levine (905-707-5259) has similar ideas about using a professional.

"It looks better for pictures because it evens out the skin tone and gives a woman that extra glow," she says.

"There's also a calming factor involved when a woman can take an hour for herself," adds Levine, who has been giving makeup application lessons and applying makeup for weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs for about 20 years.

Both Levine and Susskind recommend having a makeup trial beforehand, because it gives the woman and the artist a chance to try out different looks and experiment with different colours and products, which makes things go smoother on the big day.

'Both Levine and Susskind recommend having a makeup trial beforehand'

At a trial, the artist takes into account what the woman wants.

"I like input as to what look the woman wants to achieve and what look they don't want," says Susskind. "I want them to feel confident."

Levine says clients can bring pictures to the trial, because her input is important. "I want them to be comfortable."

Susskind says it takes her between 30 minutes and 45 minutes to complete a woman's face, and she says her prices are "below market value."

Levine requires 30 minutes to complete a face, and she describes her prices as average. Her costs also decrease as the number of women in a party increases.

'Levine requires 30 minutes to complete a face'

Prices vary, costing $75 for one person, $65 for two and $60 to apply makeup to three people. Levine charges $75 for a 1½ hour makeup lesson.

Both estheticians will go to where ever the event is being held, and both recommend booking a makeup artist months in advance. Touch-up services are also available.

Other esthetics places advertising in this supplement are: Rob Coutts (416-861-1460); Dominion Beauty Centre (416-663-7373); Jean Macdonald Beautyworks (416-322-3010); Sherry Michaels Make-Up Artist/Face It (905-731-7586).

Travel agent sends you on your great escape

By MICHAEL SPIAR
Special to The CJN

Travelling doesn't have to be an endless mess of scheduling, reserving, calling, nerves and double-checking.

One of the larger travel agencies in the Toronto area, Peerless Travel (905-886-5610) has the resources and corporate connections to get competitive rates and to give clients the best service.

Ehud Telem has been in the travel agency business since 1983, when he was manager of El Al's Toronto office for Ontario and Western Canada. Peerless Travel, where he is currently employed, has been in business for 11 years.

Patterns for favourite travel destinations for occasions like weddings and bar or bat mitzvahs are easy to pick out and recommend, Telem says.

"Honeymooners go mainly on cruises or to all-inclusive super clubs," he says. "Bar mitzvahs go to Israel."

When asked if Israel is still a safe place to go and if he recommends it, Telem is very positive.

"Israel, as strange as it may sound, is one of the safest places in the world for tourists," he says.

Because of media portrayals of the country, travel to Israel has dropped over 80 percent, Telem says, but he has bookings for bar mitzvah groups for next year from families who hope that things will change.

The fear of travelling has affected the entire travel industry. The number of people travelling now has dropped 20 percent since the Sept. 11 attacks, and everyone from hotels to airlines have slashed prices in an effort to woo customers back.

But neither Peerless nor Telem is worried.

"Our size brings with it more clout, and we can clear space and get the suppliers to do us favours that they don't do for the average agency," Telem says.

"We service 60,000 customers every year. We are also by far the largest operator of tourism to Israel. In the year 2000, we had 9,000 passengers to Israel out of which 900 went for bar mitzvah tours. This year we will be dealing with only 3,000 passengers to Israel.

Although more than half of its customers are not Jewish, "these numbers make us the largest 'Jewish' travel agency in Canada, and one the largest independent travel companies in Canada."

Telem is also predicting stable numbers for air travel. He encourages customers to use planes, saying that "buses and trains cannot replace air travel and will stay marginal."

Part of what makes a travel company competitive is flexibility and customized trips, as well as good prices. Clients can base their vacation on cost and distance, and via Peerless' connections, they can expect to get what they want. Peerless also provides self-guided tourist trips, though the agency can hire a tour company on the spot, picking the package that best suits the client. Customized packages ar most apparent in small-market vacations like art trips, or ski ing and hiking.

Peerless Travel strives to meet and 'exceed the client' expectations. Their corporate connections make planning and transactions easier and provide lower prices, and thei customized tours and customer service contribute t Peerless' success.

Great food keeps your guests happy

"We don't mean traditional, Shabbat dinner chicken however. Some of our favourites are maple glazed chicken with roasted apple squash, grilled hoisin chicken with tan garine jalapeno salsa, or grilled breast of chicken."

One of GMB's owners, Iain McIlveen, is a European trained chef, says Bensky, and "his talents include the colourful pres entation of the meal.

"We choose colourful vegetables in season such as as paragus with multi-coloured peppers. The plating is a reflec tion of the function."

Berk says that although good food is essential, a caterer should provide a lot more. "We can help plan a party espe cially if it is off premises. If clients desire, we can arrange for rentals such as dishes, cutlery, glasses, linens and serving pieces.

"We don't just send the food. We're there to co-ordinate the event."

Bensky says that one of his event co-ordinators can help select a venue for the party and "will handle everything from a to z. People like to have a full-service company."

Other kosher caterers advertising in this supplement are: Caterers York/Sweet York Desserts (416-783-4293); Malmar Fine Foods & Catering (416-638-0091); Miriam's Table Catering (416-633-6554); TriElm Catering (416-222-1230).

For fun and convenience try one-stop shopping

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

It's worth giving party decor a lot of thought. The first thing to impress guests is a room's appearance, says Richard Winkler of Happy Days (416-789-GIFT [4438]), whose store he says focuses on "transforming a room from blah to wow."

On the other hand, you'll be too busy to visit more stores than you have to, so save trips and get your favours, tableware and paperware in one place. One-stop shopping is what Mel Grevler of Party Supply Depot (905-764-5457) calls "absolute convenience."

Browsing through a one-stop supplier also lets you know what's on the market, Grevler adds. Winkler agrees. There's no end to inventiveness in the party industry, he says, and it's fun to see what's new since you last hosted an event. Grevler says browsing will also be useful later, for other events.

Winkler, who provides personalized items, mentions balloons as an example of fun new ideas. They're used in arches, trees, sculptures and centrepieces; and they can match any theme, be it Star Wars or The Simpsons. He especially likes the new themed mylar balloons.

Winkler recommends looking for state-of-the-art product, coupled with plenty of experience. He also advises picking someone with expertise in your kind of event. Someone who has done a lot of bar mitzvahs, for instance, will know best what's in stock and what other party hosts are doing.

A good selection, Grevler says, includes items you might not immediately associate with parties, like garbage bags. After the event, you'll be glad to have a few extra on hand.

Granted, a huge variety of balloons, and other favours can be confusing; and small stores can be easier to navigate. And you expect better service and advice in a smaller store.

But you can also find it in big stores. Indeed, Grevler urges you to insist on it. Take your business where friendly, knowledgeable, mature staff greet you at the door, help find what you're looking for, and guide you to other items which may interest you.

Helpful staff, Grevler says, don't automatically try to sell the most costly items. They respect your budget, and find the most economical way to fulfil your needs. High service standards also include details like taking back unused items (provided they're unopened and saleable).

You can have quality and savings at once, Grevler assures. Even among cheaper items – styrofoam cups instead of plastic, for instance – there are different levels of quality. Insist on the best your budget can buy, both Grevler and Winkler advise.

When he hires staff, Grevler puts great emphasis on what he calls maturity. Product knowledge is essential, but maturity means enjoying people and knowing how to be helpful.

Service, for Winkler, also includes staff for the machines that make your cotton candy, mini-pretzels, etc., to ensure there are no mechanical glitches. It might even cover extras like free smash cakes, which everyone enjoys (not just kids).

Do your shopping as early as possible, Grevler advises. Good service includes last-minute help when it's feasible, but the bigger the selection, the more time you need to look it over.

Grevler also recommends choosing a warehouse-type store where space allows for volume in stock, which in turn allows for bigger discounts. Volume, he says, enabled him to be the first in Toronto to discount balloons.

Also, Grevler says, the bigger the store, the less overhead per square foot. With his landlord charging less because he rents more space, he gets a discount he can pass on to you.

Finally, Grevler recommends choosing a centrally located store, with plenty of free or cheap parking nearby. If you like what's on the shelves, you'll want loading your car to be easy.

Other one-stop-party-shop places advertising in this supplement are: Dominion Smallwares (416-665-9526); Kosher and Natural Foods (416-789-7173); Loots (416-787-5668); Tyme to Party (905-737-2789).

Choosing a venue? Think ambience and menu

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

There are a lot of party venues out there, and while some people prefer conventional halls and hotels, there's much more to look at before you make up your mind.

While a lot of these venues are new, some are not. Let Tina Katz of Casa Loma (416-923-1171) tell you about one; Machel Reeves of the Art Gallery of Ontario (416-979-6614; Web site www.ago.net) will tell you about another.

Choosing a venue? Think ambience and menu

What can be a more romantic setting for a wedding than Casa Loma? For many venues, decor means extra work for the hosts. At Casa Loma, you needn't do much decorating: the castle itself is the decor.

With grandeur and elegance, it has spacious ballrooms and banquet halls, and the towers afford a panoramic view of the city. The terrace and gardens are available from May until the end of October. Your wedding party can include a tour.

Casa Loma is great for any celebration with a medieval or fairytale feeling; likewise for themed events such as murder mysteries. You can bring in props as well as people like jesters. And the gift shop will help you customize gifts.

Casa Loma can also cater your event in-house. There are approved outside caterers, two of which are kosher. You supply your own liquor though bar services are provided; this makes for big savings and gives you a better choice of beverages.

For a dinner function, says Tina Katz, the average size is 150 to 200, but they can accommodate parties as small as 40. Casa Loma also offers exclusive booking and free parking. It's a non-smoking venue, too.

Book soon, Katz urges. Weekends go fast; already for 2002, all the Saturdays are reserved. Lots of weekdays are still open, for birthdays or sweet sixteens.

Most people don't think of partying at the Art Gallery of Ontario. Although quite different from Casa Loma, it also offers spectacular architectural spaces. And you can combine your affair with a look at fine paintings and sculptures.

The AGO is North America's tenth-largest art museum. Its Henry Moore gallery is world-famous; its European collection spans the tenth to 20th centuries; and there are Inuit, Canadian Historical and Group of Seven works, along with a prominent contemporary collection from North America and abroad.

The spacious Tanenbaum Sculpture Atrium, with its 40-foot glass wall overlooking Grange Park, is ideal for a wedding. The Agora Restaurant is located here.

Walker Court, adjacent to galleries of European art, is a fine example of Beaux Arts architecture. It is surrounded by an antique picture-frame collection ranging from the 16th to the 18th centuries.

The AGO hosts many weddings as well as bar and bat mitzvahs. About 50 percent of their party business is personal, says Reeves; and there are family programs for events like birthdays.

The other half of their functions are special events associated with corporate conferences, so visitors in town on business can sample Toronto's culture. During the recent police chiefs' conference, for example, their wives enjoyed a group visit.

The Agora Restaurant features the special culinary art of Anne Yarymowich, its executive chef since 1996. Yarymowich is known for cuisine focusing on regional tastes and seasonal ingredients; major exhibits visiting the AGO often inspire her creations.

An honours George Brown graduate, Yarymowich has worked at such restaurants as Le Select Bistro and The Parrot. As chef of the Mildred Pierce Restaurant from 1990 to 1996, she established a reputation for a style still acclaimed by media and critics.

Sweeten your party with tasty treats

The Chocolate Moose made this cake for Noah's "Bart" Mitzvah.

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The Chocolate Moose (416-784-9092) and Gerri's Eatin' Centre (416-445-5504) can help make your party a little sweeter.

Bev Kruger, who has owned The Chocolate Moose for three years, sells dairy and pareve chocolate in all shapes and sizes, as well as peanut and hazelnut brittle, and nougat.

Kruger buys chocolate in bulk from Belgium and melts it down to create her delicacies.

"One of our specialties is truffle, which is filled with such things as Irish cream, mocha, raspberry or caramel."

The dairy truffles, which are hand rolled, are "have a very creamy texture," she says.

She prepares chocolates for clients who want to give them away at their parties. "Guests love it when we place truffles in small boxes and use them as table cards. It's really a sweet beginning for the party."

Her smash cakes, she says, are a hit with kids. "These cakes are hollow blocks of chocolate which the guest of honour smashes with a hammer.

"We've done Simpsons cakes complete with five edible characters. That cake is always a hit."

Kruger also creates gift baskets in which she uses such items as chocolate-dipped fruit, nuts or peanut brittle. "If people want to bring liquor or wine, we can include them in the basket.

It's a labour-intensive business, she says, but it's happy work. "When people make a party, it is always a happy time."

Elaine Levison, who owns Gerri's Eatin' Centre with her daughter Randi Basian, specializes in kosher gift baskets, bags and boxes.

"We are often asked to prepare gift bags full of cookies, nuts, sweets and beverages for out-of-town guests staying in hotels. It's a lovely welcome when they enter their room. Also included in the bag is a schedule of party events, locations and directions."

Gift baskets are a great way to thank hosts for giving a pre-simchah party, says Levison. "We customize them according to taste, allergy and whether or not there are kids in the home. They always love getting something especially for them."

Keep your memories alive on videotape

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

If you want an affair to remember, hire a videographer to tape that special event.

Abe Salzman has been in the business for 20 years and his company, Video Affairs (www.video-affairs.com or 905-889-0909), does it all.

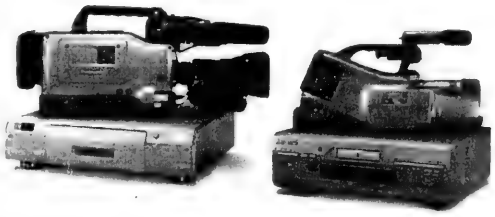
"I do weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs, anniversaries, surprise parties, tribute videos, biographies, graduations, dance recitals, music videos, sporting events and corporate and industrial videos," says Salzman, who shoots between 80 and 150 events a year.

He says Video Affairs offers digital camera work and digital non-linear editing, and he uses the latest technology.

"The latest technology is receiving your video production on DVD," he explains. "Since DVD machine prices are now under $200, and you can now rent movies on DVD for the same price as renting a VHS, more and more people are buying DVD machines or are planning to. Also, most computers now have a DVD drive build in."

Salzman says May through December is his busiest time and recommends that if clients want him to personally videotape their event, "it is best to book about 1½ years in advance."

The basic price for an edited video production starts at $1,195, and clients "can design a package that suits their style and budget."



Salzman suggests holding your event in the off-season to maximize choice and minimize costs.

"More and more events are taking place from January through May due to venue availability and price flexibility," he says.

Salzman also recommends that clients hire a videographer that is passionate about his or her job.

"Make sure that you hire a videographer that loves his work and has the personality that allows your guests to feel comfortable and be themselves. This person will also, most likely, capture your event creatively and go out of his way to never miss a detail," he says.

"If you hire someone strictly on price, you take your chances."

Other videographers advertising in this supplement are: D.M.S. Video Productions (905-470-4040); Lisa Productions (905-764-1033); Northern Memory Productions (905-881-0608); Perenia Media Inc. Let your guests eat the decor

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Using food as party decor is a classic instance of one item serving two ends: pleasuring both the eyes and the palate

We've all seen cakes which were such fine copies of houses, cars, etc., that it seemed a pity to eat them – but eat them we did, and with few regrets. While the idea of food art is ancient, specific creations tend to be short-lived.

Dorothy Harris-Gula of Candy Tables (416-330-1853) is an architect of sweets. Her specialty is the three-level kids' candy table – much more fun for a kid than your average sweet table, and much liked by adults too.

On the convenience side, Dorothy's tables save you the effort of putting together loot bags. She lays the bags and scoops out on the table, so the young guests can take what they want.

But adults like these tables too, so, if you're not careful, they may horn in on the fun. There's nothing like candy to bring out the latent kid in a grown man or woman. At mixed-age events, Dorothy advises, keep the candy table hidden or under guard until the adult sweet table opens.

Dorothy also does candy tables for adults. They're a great chance to enjoy the nostalgia sweets – Popeye candy cigarettes, candy buttons, jawbreakers, blackballs and the like – that you remember from your childhood, but don't see in many stores these days.

At the same time, Dorothy observes, you can't second-guess who will like what. Kids and adults like each other's candies. Adults like chocolate, for example, but so do kids. And while kids go for things like gummi worms, so do their parents.

Dorothy also creates candy centrepieces. Besides being popular, they're an outlet for her talent as a designer who enjoys working with themes. She also puts together huge gift baskets, the kind many people like to receive on special occasions.

Even when she's not working with a theme, Dorothy makes her creations look good. Her tables have tablecloth skirts, for example; and she decorates the edges with candy festoons.

Dorothy has been creating candy tables for about eight years. She says it's been almost like a hobby, and it hasn't stopped being fun, whether she's doing a public event or a family simchah.

She has garnered quite a reputation. Three-quarters of her business comes from referrals; and she has taken part in some major events. At the local Jerry Lewis telethon, for example, she put together a carnival in the children's area, and she decorated the Jerusalem pavilion for Caravan.

In general, when it comes to choosing among the many decor ideas that are out there, Dorothy advises picking something you've seen and liked at someone else's event. Advice from someone you trust is good, too.

Party planner books and trade shows won't give you the direct feel of how something will go over at a party, she says, but they may generate ideas.

PARTY PLANNER

For your next party, consider a DJ

By MICHAEL SPIAR
Special to The CJN

The staff at Events Toronto are no strangers to pleasing a crowd, and customer service is their priority.

"We aim to please," says DJ Elliot Kravetz.

Events Toronto is in its third year of business, but its DJs have thousands of parties under their belts. Kravetz alone has 10 years experience, and he knows how to make a party fun from start to finish.

Events staff believe the fun starts at the first phone call and doesn't stop until the party does. Their goal is to answer all of a client's questions and concerns, and, as part of the planning process, they sometimes take the family to an event so they can experience their DJ first hand.

"The most important thing is getting the DJ you're most comfortable with," says Kravetz.

"At every meeting and every consultation that I do, I bring the music book with me," says Kravetz. The music book contains roughly 10,000 songs, dating as far back as 1920. That's also an advantage of having a DJ do your party over a band, says Kravetz. "Bands have more difficult time deviating from their repertoire, while we take our whole music library with us to every party."

As well, bands take breaks, while DJ's don't. "We can work straight until 1:00 am if we have to."

The song book is a particular point of pride for Events Toronto, although Kravetz boasts it doesn't use playlists.

"During dinner, the entertainers go around to each table, introduce themselves and ask for initial requests. They get a feel for the crowd," says Kravetz. DJ's have to be flexible and respond to what the crowd is feeling, he says, because if the guests change their mood and the DJ doesn't, the party becomes less fun.

Events Toronto DJs pride themselves on being flexible, both on the fly and during planning., Kravetz says.

Events has package deals which can be modified slightly. But if a client wants something that a pre-set deal doesn't include, that's no problem either. Events will simply create a brand-new party plan from scratch.

Once the party gets going, Events' staff are truly in their element. From talking with the guests during dinner to keeping the party moving, the staff loves what they do and that transfers over to the guests, Kravetz says.

Events Toronto also has a wide variety of specialty staff, such as break-dancers, line dancers, magicians and full-theme shows. It can also work with a decorator to provide unique lighting and decor to fit a desired theme. Kravetz calls this combination of decoration and specialty staff "dinner theatre."

The company also has a unique branch of specialty staff, which Kravetz calls "camp counsellors," magicians, impersonators and the like who keep kids entertained in a separate area while adults eat.

"We bring by far the most energy and fun than anyone, we bring different stuff to the bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings, and different interactive dances, theme ideas," Kravetz says. "The camp counsellor, dinner theater aspects are all unique to Events Toronto."

To contact Events Toronto, call 416-698-5084.

At Events Toronto, the fun starts at the first phone call and doesn't end until the party's over.

Entrepeneur specializes in accessories and party favours

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Thinking about gifts like ladies' accessories? One person who plays a major role in getting fine, stylish accessories into retail display windows, is Janice O'Bright of Only Accessories (416-504-7070).

As much as any other branch of the fashion industry, the accessories field offers rich opportunities for a creative designer. Only Accessories – which is open by appointment only and does not deal directly with the public – proves it also offers scope for a creative entrepreneur.

O'Bright launched the company 15 years ago. You likely have seen many of her fine imports in your favourite stores. She travels around the world, searching for and importing the latest and finest in ladies' accessories. She sells them across Canada, supplying retailers as diverse as Holt Renfrew and Le Chateau.

Only Accessories sets trends in every category it carries, be it handbags, gloves, scarves, jewellery or belts, and O'Bright works hard to keep her business on the cutting edge. Retailers, filmmakers and the media all know this. Her imports not only make retailers look good, but also stars and movie sets.

It was through Only Accessories that O'Bright's other enterprise, Party Extras, got its start.

O'Bright launched the Swarowski Crystal Tattoo, which adheres to the body, as a ladies' accessory under the name Sparkle Plenty. One of her retail customers asked her to bring Sparkle Plenty to his daughter's bat mitzvah. Seeing this innovative tattoo at the bat mitzvah, a party planner booked her for three more events.

This, however, is just the beginning of Party Extras' story.

Boys like body art too. To please them, O'Bright allied with an airbrush artist to create striking effects that combine crystal tattoos and airbrush work. Party Extras does themes, anything from sports to Bart Simpson, and now offers a new series of glitter tattoos.

For both her businesses, O'Bright stresses the importance of travel. The idea for Party Extras, she explains, came from a trip to Korea.

With Party Extras as with accessories, O'Bright is committed to staying on the cutting edge. One of her newest ideas is hand-engraving dog tags at parties. For the girls, she adds crystals.

O'Bright's father was a fashion retailer, so her background helped prepare her for her career. Also, as a mother who has made a bar mitzvah for her now 15-year-old son, and as one who has two 11-year-old twin daughters, she knows her market from a kid's point of view.

O'Bright is also involved in the community. She has done many charity events, among them the breast cancer fund-raiser, For the Love of Breasts. And her work will be featured at the upcoming Bloor Street Entertains.

Party Planners can help you every step of the way

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Whether you are hosting an elegant dinner dance or a casual bar mitzvah, a party planner can help you every step of the way.

Charlene Goldfarb, who owns Bash Productions Inc. (416-598-9585) with partner Jodi Cohen, says that Bash has two divisions – event planning for corporate events and bar or bat mitzvahs, and a birthday party division for kids between four and 12.

"We can be there from a to z, or we can help out a la carte. We also have custom party packages which include entertainment, food, decor and prizes," says Goldfarb.

When they meet with a prospective client, she says, they work out a budget together, and then put a proposal in writing.

"We include details about the party, and give the client a good idea of what they can expect."

A Walman table setting by Bash Productions.

At a recent bat mitzvah, they produced a New York night- club theme. "We mailed her friends VIP passes to the opening of the club and when they came to the party and showed their pass, we gave them a wrist band.

"We brought in leather chairs and couches, as well as a dance cage, a full laser light show and trumpet and bongo players. We really turned the party room into a night club," says Goldfarb.

She says when planning a party, it is essential to listen carefully to both parents and kids. "We want to stick to traditions such as the candlelighting ceremony, but we should never forget it is a children's party."

She says there are no real trends in today's parties. "Some people want them simple and others want to go all out. We do try and find something different, however, because with kids going to 50 or 60 bar mitzvahs throughout the year, they've seen it all.

"We don't want cookie-cutter parties. We want fresh ideas," says Goldfarb.

Karen Garscadden, who owns Up N Coming (905-886-8148) with Karen Jacobs says they can help plan a party from its inception, or they can help out "when a client has all the pieces but can't put the puzzle together."

The two Karens from Up N Coming can help plan a party from its inception.

Before meeting with them, clients can view their Web site at www.upandcomingevents.ca for some party ideas.

At their first meeting, she says, "We ask lots of questions and try to develop a framework for the party. Sometimes we are able to make a suggestion at that meeting that really sparks their interest."

Recently, they planned a country-themed casual bar mitzvah. "The party was held at a country home in a tent, and all the decorations reflected the fall season. We offered seasonal arts and crafts such as pressed leaves and candle making and put together a square dance party. Kids did not feel like they were walking into a discotheque, but there was a disc jockey for those who wanted to dance.

"The place cards were packets of seeds and we had blankets thrown over the chairs to add to the rugged atmosphere. At the end of the night we sent everyone home with a chocolate apple. It was a huge undertaking because we had to put together the tent structure, but everyone loved it."

It is important, says Garscadden, that hosts feel that they are the "owners of the party. We take a backseat, take away all the headaches, and give the client all the credit. Our philosophy is to stay in the background and handle everything before it becomes a concern. We try to be 10 steps ahead of every problem."

Diamond pendents make great bat mitzvah gift

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

Want to give a gift people will be glad to get?

Mark Lash Designs (416-256-5229) has everything from diving watches, earrings and up-to-the-minute, custom designed engagement rings to match any budget.

"We specialize in fine jewelry, watches, diamonds, custom work and earrings," says Dalia Lash, who runs the store with her husband.

"We also have a large selection of imported Italian jewellery."

If you're shopping for a bat mitzvah girl, Lash says, the latest trends are diamond pendents and bracelets.

"They're really different and new," says Lash.

Diamond initial rings, bracelets and rings are also popular choices. She says the biggest rage right now are techno marine watches.

"They start at $180, and make great gifts for boys and girls."

If you're on a tight budget, popular items include silver bracelets, necklaces and earrings.

For boys, initial rings, Star of David and "chai" pendants are popular.

"There's something beautiful to suit any budget," says Lash.

Mark Lash Designs also has a wide selection of engagement rings.

"We have several thousand of our own designs and we can also custom designed rings. Once the couple decides on a stone, we show them different mounts."

Custom designed rings can be ready in three weeks, and settings can be done in a day.

"We also have ready-made designs."

Right now, Lash says, they're doing a lot of work in platinum, 18 karat, 14 karat and white gold.

"Pink sapphires are a new trend," she adds, explaining that pink sapphires are like diamonds but have more of a sparkle.

The store sells eternity bands and earrings to match.

Lash says they also remake designs into wearable, up-to-date jewelry.

"The staff are friendly and happy to help. We offer fabulous workmanship and are very up on the trends."

With two locations, the newest one at 9033 Leslie St., and another on 938 Eglinton Ave. W., you won't have a problem finding a ring for your fiancé, or a gift for a bar or bat mitzvah or for yourself.

Who should create your invitations?

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Before you decide who will provide your invitations, ask yourself some questions, suggests Ann Feldman of The Printed Word (416-484-4600). What are your expectations? What experience do you have in party planning? And what are you willing to spend?

The first thing to look for, says Jodi Rodness of Papers 'n Prints (905-764-7455), is a friendly working environment. A home atmosphere is ideal, where you can speak one-on-one with someone who has time for you and who'd rather deal with fewer clients and see them all satisfied.

"The less experience you have," says Feldman, "the more guidance you need. If you need your hand held, a boutique store is best; and if you're a beginner, needing your hand held is OK."

Feldman uses the example of colour symbolism. Most people know that lighter shades are less formal and deeper shades more formal, for example, in clothing, but a professional knows the colour symbolism for invitations in detail.

Likewise, Rodness points out, they know in detail which designs suit which generation. Kids usually like simpler designs while adults prefer layers, ribbons and the like. Though most people know this, a dealer who reads catalogues and frequents trade shows will know what's currently available.

Choose someone creative, says Rodness, who welcomes opportunities to create custom designs. At the same time, the dealer should be attentive to your ideas but not push you to accept things that don't suit your budget or style. She guides; you decide.

Rodness works in a wide variety of styles from psychedelic to formal, but while she's seen plenty of new trends, many people still like the older ones. And for all-ages events like weddings, it's important to please kids and grandparents both.

She suggests hiring someone who offers a personal touch, but with the knowledge and contacts to provide a range of services. Or, as she puts it, "a one-person show with a good support system."

When you look at different dealers, Feldman says, ask what services they provide. Getting invitations and place cards from the same house is common, for example, but only some companies do graphics and translations. If they do, inquire whether they charge extra, and how much.

Feldman recommends picking a company that offers extras like addressing, which saves you a trip to another company, or bentshers.

As to your budget, Feldman advises setting it after you've researched what's available. A six-layered invitation costs more than a single layer, but a good store offers an assortment of choices for any budget.

Someone operating out of her home with less overhead may offer better prices, Feldman says. On the other hand, a small operation may lack the range of stock and services of a larger company.

Another factor which affects prices, Feldman points out, is catalogue orders: the company pays more for them, and passes the added cost to you. Another factor is that most invitation paper products are U.S. imports. This also influences the time needed to finish your work.

Book your dealer as far ahead as possible, Rodness urges: four months at minimum, though some clients book her six months ahead. When you're organizing a party, the invitation dealer is one stop among many you have to make.

Feldman says allow three or four weeks to see the work done to your satisfaction. Proofs need time to go back and forth; the more details, the more time. And after this, Rodness says, invitations usually go out seven to eight weeks before the event, so be realistic in your timing.

"I'd rather say three weeks and finish in two, than say two weeks and finish in three," Feldman says. After all, a responsible dealer would rather promise less and do more.

Photographers provide an enduring memento

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

What should you bear in mind when choosing a photographer for your event? Greg Dean of Signature Photography (416-784-4488), and Vladimir Bekker of Concord Photographers (416-410-1410, Web site www.concord-photo.com), offer a wealth of helpful ideas.

Dean, who relies mainly on word of mouth for his clientele, advises you to pay attention to what your friends say about people they have worked with. Then interview a couple of photographers to see how you like their work and their personalities.

Bekker suggests you also respect what a photographer's peers think. In March 2000, his album won the Judges' Award at the Wedding Photographers' International Album Competition in Las Vegas – an award not given lightly.

Quality camera work is clearly important, but Dean ranks compatible personalities as even more vital to making your event a success. He describes his approach to his work as more relaxed than that of some studios.

"Working together should be enjoyable for all concerned," he says. If the professionals you hire look forward to your party, so can you. And he thanks his clients, whom he refers to as some of Toronto's best, for making his work a pleasure.

Bekker sees photography, especially wedding photography, as a fine art, to be approached with care. First of all, he urges, identify your goals. Is photography just a service to you, or do you want a memento to pass on to future generations?

Surely, for an event like a wedding, you want an enduring memento. In this case, Bekker points out, you need more time; and you need to be better organized.

Give careful thought to styles, as well as to your budget. You can get good quality within a wide range of budgets, Dean and Bekker agree. You do have to spend some money, though; and a larger budget can include a wider range of styles.

Bekker cites the example of having one photographer at your event do the classical shots, while another does the candid work. If it were his choice, he says, he'd want a studio that combined these two styles.

Dean also values versatility. Your photographer, he says, should be able to do "a little bit of everything, from classical to funky." At a wedding, for example, you'll want photos taken that will please a range of tastes and ages, from grandparents to kids.

It's often good, Dean adds, to hire someone with experience outside the party field – say, in magazine covers or graphics. A wider range of experience often gives a photographer a wider range of new ideas.

The new photography technologies are important; however, Dean stresses, what counts most is knowing what you can do with them. Bekker has observed a big shift to a photo-journalistic approach. This has the immediate, uncontrived feeling of candid shots, though they needn't be humorous. It may be the best way to capture a person's face in a quiet, meditative moment, for example.

A good photographer is in demand, so book yours well ahead. For both Bekker and Dean, getting bookings a year in advance is common; they have some as far ahead as two years. And though he will try to accommodate last-minute bookings, Dean points out, he does have to take first come, first served.

And choose someone who will go out of his way to be of service. Bekker, for example, has gone as far as Switzerland or Israel to shoot a wedding. Most events are closer to home; but you'd have to agree Bekker does believe in going the extra mile for the client.

Mandell continues to re-invent the industry

By JORGE KRANE
Special to The CJN

With over 10 years under the belt, Mandell Entertainment Group, is once again expanding its entertainment offering and re-inventing the way Canadians approach special event planning and production.

Scheduled highlights for 2002 include two great events at two great venues, bringing to light why Mandell continues to be regarded as one of Canada's great innovators in the special events industry.

The fun kicks off January 29 with the presentation of Bobby's Big Bar Mitzvah Bash, a live, interactive open house at the Capitol Event Theatre (2492 Yonge St.).

This elaborate annual event, which showcases the live entertainment, production and amusement divisions of Mandell is presented this year with an interesting twist. The evening presents the experiences of a fictional local family that has hired the entire Mandell Entertainment Group staff and invited the entire city in their mission to throw the ultimate bar mitzvah bash for their son Bobby.

Visitors will be the exclusive guests of the family and experience the inner workings of a real life hullabaloo, complete with horah and candle lighting.

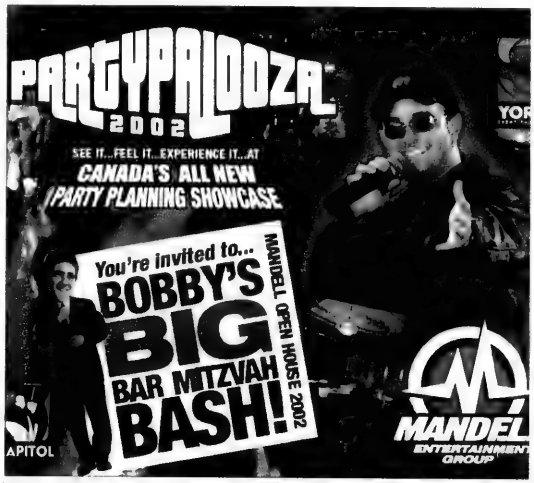
"When we sat down to begin planning," says marketing director Jeff Kahane, " we wanted to provide an entertaining, unique experience, as well as educate our clients as to what we can offer to make their simchah spectacular."

With whimsical commentary from the family and other comedic characters, the event will spotlight Mandell's finest MC's, DJ's and dance troops and feature live demonstrations of lighting, sound, special f/x and the hottest new trends in the party industry. Join the family for great music, dancing, refreshments and prizes at what is sure to be the party of the season!

Mandell's second great event of the year comes in conjunction with the launch of another re-invented space in a familiar community landmark.

In response to the success of The Capitol Event Theatre, Toronto's ultra hip party hotspot, Mandell Entertainment Group has announced the opening of the all new York Event Theatre (101 Eglinton Ave. E.), scheduled for launch in the spring of 2002. Mandell embarks on this project with the original team of investors from the Capitol Event Theatre as well as two new ones specific to this venue.

Stylized by II by IV, one of Toronto's premier design architects, this sleek new venue will offer three floors of contemporary elegance in a prime, midtown location.



And what special event venue would be complete without a worthy special event to inaugurate its launch. On April 15, 2002, Mandell Entertainment Group will host Partypalooza, Canada's all new party planning showcase, live from the York Event Theatre. Visitors will discover Toronto's elite party professionals and tour Toronto's hottest new venue at a show that promises to set the standard for superior party planning and special event education.

The event will feature revealing seminars from industry leaders, live demonstrations of cutting edge equipment, delicious refreshments and a presentation by some of Toronto's top performers, in a cavalcade of entertainment excellence you won't want to miss.

With all of this under the Mandell "hat" for 2002, one can only speculate about the next great idea. With the recent launch of a dance school for kids and adults, looking to brush up on their steps before their party, Mandell continues to stay ahead of the special event game.

For more information about Mandell Entertainment Group and its upcoming events, call (905) 886-4000 or visit their interactive website at www.mandellworld.com.

Sound advice on rental suppliers

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Mary Crothers and John Upper of Chair-man Mills (416-391-0400) think that choosing a party rental supplier is a serious matter. So does Jordan Rich of Chair Decor, etc. (905-731-9217; Web site, www.chairdecor.com).

Both firms offer sound advice on how to make your choice.

Rich considers word of mouth a good indicator. Ask friends and family.

Reputation counts: pick someone with customer service experience, advises Crothers.

Rich agrees, placing a high value on rapport between supplier and client. He urges you to choose a family-owned, family-run supplier, with a record stretching back over generations. If anything goes wrong, your supplier should go out of its way to help. Every client is important, whether you have 50 guests at your event or 5,000.

As well as working with you, your rental supplier should work with your party planner. Crothers suggests to bring him or her with you when you come in.

Clients are more particular today, Crothers says, and there are many more products available. Both Crothers and Rich insist that a firm has to upgrade continuously to keep pace with state-of-the-art supplies, whether it's chair covers or styles of drinking glass. They should handle materials with kid gloves, and be ready to advise on what quantities you need.

Rich recommends choosing a firm with a big inventory, which will be able to supply more than one large affair on any given day, so you won't lose out if someone places a large order ahead of you.

Look for a full showroom with a full selection and everything from furniture to accessories like linen, candles and charger plates, Crothers advises. Such a firm will be able to meet all your requirements of style, theme and decor.

Make sure what you see in the showroom is what you get, Rich cautions. Anyone can make one chair cover look nice; getting 1,000 right takes work. It helps even more, Crothers says, if a rental house does mockups, to show how something looks.

Choose a house with a creative staff, Crothers says. They should be ready to sit with you over coffee to look at samples, and spend hours to work out what suits you.

Rich believes in working by appointment only, so no client has to stand in line. He also believes in working with set price lists, as if from a catalogue. This means you know exactly what you're getting, and for how much. At a time when organizing your event will keep you busy enough as it is, why not save the trouble of having to bargain?

When to order your rentals, says Crothers, depends on when your party is, what kind of party it is, and what you want.

Pictures suppled by Chair Decor.

For a Pesach or a June event, come earlier: a month earlier is usually OK. For items like specialty linens, come even earlier: they're in short supply and high demand. Rich says his clients book three months to a year ahead, but at least three months is advisable.

Both rental suppliers agree, however, that a good firm will make the effort to supply your needs on short notice – for example, if you find out at the last minute that you're short of glasses. They urge you to pick someone who's open seven days a week, early and late, and offers full delivery service.

For a kosher event, advises John Upper, pick a house which is approved and held in high regard by Canadian Jewish Congress. They should have a mashgiach and keep everything under lock and key except when it's in use. And they must order kosher dishes through an approved kosher caterer.

Other rental places advertising in this supplement are: D & D D'Amato Party Rent-All (416-665-9570); Premier Linens (905-737-3497).

Ya' gotta look sharp boys

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

Finding suits for boys can be as challenging as it is to get them to sit still in shul

That's where Crawford Boys (416-782-8137 or crawfordboys@hotmail.com) and Gino's Fashions (416-654-8710 or ginofashions@hotmail.com) come to the rescue.

These clothing retailers specialize in outfitting boys of all sizes in suits and casualwear.

"We sell shirts, suits, pants, sports jackets and polo shirts for boys from size 5 to 20," says Gino Cucchi, who has been selling clothes for boys and men, as well as women, for more than 30 years at his store on St. Clair Avenue West.

Paul Spiar of Crawford Boys in Lawrence Plaza, also carries upscale casual wear for boys in regular and husky sizes.

He says there are advantages to shopping at a specialty store.

"Boys' clothing is our business. We're specialists because of what we're able to offer – larger selection and a high level of expert service," says Spiar.

"I don't believe there is another store in the city that carries only boys' clothing. We have a large inventory, and our staff know how to fit boys and get along with them."

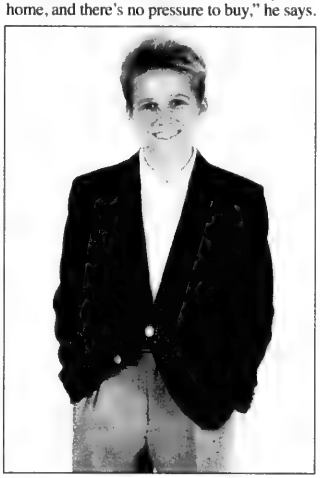
He adds that "the staff are terrific in dealing with kids. They're easygoing, there's no pressure, they're patient and know how to talk to kids at their level. They don't talk down to kids."

He says his store is also special because it has a large selection of husky sizes for larger boys.

"Most stores don't carry a great deal of this, but we carry husky sizes in 10 to 22, and size 22 is cut specially for us."

Cucchi, who also sells husky sizes, refers to the friendly service at his store, as well.

"We serve people from age five to 99 and we have the greatest respect for all of them. We make sure customers feel like they're at home, and there's no pressure to buy," he says.



Pictured (top) Gino's Fashions and (left) Crawford Boys.

"We do our best to give customers what they need."

Cucchi says the quality and workmanship of his products are outstanding.

"If you're not satisfied you can bring it back."

He says if customers visit www.fabuloussavings.com and bring in the coupon, they'll get 20 percent off anything in the store.

Alterations can be done on the premises at no charge.

"We can do it while you wait," says Cucchi.

Spiar says alterations can be done at Crawford Boys as well, with standard alterations done free of charge on regular-priced merchandise.

For the simple to the extravagant tastes

Yummy chocolate desserts

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

The following recipes run the gamut from the simple to the extravagant and can be prepared with minimal supervision. They are guaranteed to thrill the chocolate lover in all of us.

EZ CHOCOLATE RASPBERRY MOUSSE CAKE

1 package devil's food cake mix
2 2-ounce packages chocolate mousse mix
2/3 cup cold milk
1/3 cup raspberry liqueur
1-12-oz. jar raspberry fudge sauce or fudge sauce fresh raspberries or strawberries chocolate curls

Prepare and bake the cake according to package directions, turning the cake batter into two 9x1½-in. round cake pans. Split each cooled layer of cake in half horizontally. Prepare chocolate mousse mixes according to package directions, except use the 2/3 cup cold milk and the 1/3 cup liqueur for the liquid.

To assemble the cake, place the bottom layer on a serving plate. Spread a thin layer of fudge sauce (about 1/3 cup) over the cake. Spread about ½ cup of the mousse mixture over the bottom layer. Repeat layering twice with cake, fudge sauce and mousse mixture. Top with remaining cake layer. Frost top and sides with remaining mousse mixture. Decorate with fresh raspberries and chocolate curls. Store in the refrigerator. Makes 12 to 16 servings.

TRIPLE CHOCOLATY CHIP CAKE

1 package chocolate cake mix
1 4-serving-size package instant chocolate pudding mix
1 8-oz. carton dairy sour cream
1 cup water
¼ cup cooking oil
3 eggs
1 6-ounce package semisweet chocolate pieces (1 cup)
powdered sugar

Grease and flour a 10-inch fluted tube pan. Set aside. In a large bowl, combine the cake mix, pudding mix, sour cream, water, cooking oil and eggs. Beat with an electric mixer on low speed for 30 seconds. Beat on medium to high speed for 2 minutes more (the cake batter will be thick).

By hand, stir the semisweet chocolate pieces into the batter. Pour the cake batter into prepared pan. Bake in a 350 oven for about 1 hour or until a toothpick inserted near centre of the cake comes out clean. Cool cake in pan on a wire rack for 15 minutes. Remove cake from pan; cool completely on a wire rack. Sift powdered sugar over the cake. Makes 16 servings.

CHOCOLATE CHIP COFFEE CAKE

1 cup granulated sugar
½ cup butter
2 eggs
1 8-oz. carton dairy sour cream
1 tsp. vanilla
2 cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp.baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt
1 cup chopped nuts
1 6-oz. package semisweet chocolate pieces
½ cup granulated sugar
½ cup packed brown sugar
1 tsp. ground cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. In a large bowl, combine the 1 cup granulated sugar and the butter with an electric mixer until fluffy. Add eggs and beat until combined. Beat in sour cream and vanilla.

Combine the flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Add to the beaten mixture, beating until smooth. In another mixing bowl, stir together the nuts, semisweet chocolate pieces, the ½ cup granulated sugar, the brown sugar and cinnamon. Evenly spread half of the batter in a greased 13x9x2-inch baking pan. Sprinkle with half of the chocolate mixture. Top with remaining batter, then the rest of the chocolate mixture. Bake for about 40 minutes or until a toothpick inserted in the centre comes out clean. Serve warm. Makes 12 to 16 servings.

PARTY PLANNER

Like each event, each band is unique

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Paul Zurin of the Paul Zurin Band (905-770-3084), and Joe Star of the Joe Star Band (905-881-1378) recommend several different ways to find out which band best suits your party. Narrow down your choices before you book one for sure.

Start that narrowing-down process early, Zurin urges, then hire your band as far ahead as you can. Star suggests as far ahead as up to a year and a half, even before you look for the hall. And remember that some dates, like summer Sunday evenings, are in very high demand.

A demo or CD shows you the band's repertoire, and how they sound at their best. What it won't do is show you how they perform live.

"Demos and CDs lack spontaneity," Star says. And, he adds, while up to 20 musicians may be on a demo, you often get only six or eight live onstage.

Hearing a band live will give you a feel for how they'll sound at your event, but in Zurin's view, live sound has its limitations. The band may be doing a request number, for example, which isn't in their normal repertoire.

Also, Zurin and Star point out, different bands have different strengths. Star, for example, specializes in weddings. A great bar band may not do as well in the formal atmsophere of a wedding, so try to hear them at the kind of event you're planning.

The Joe Star Band.

Star recommends listening to them do different things on different occasions – and at different times in the evening. They may start with Israeli music, for instance, then shift to dinner music at about 8 p.m.

Hearing them at an event where you're a guest, or at least for a full set, is better than standing backstage for one or two songs, Zurin says. Being backstage on your feet can be uncomfortable, even if you like them, and you won't hear exactly how they sound out in the hall or on the dance floor.

Call friends who've booked the band before, both Zurin and Star advise, and get their feelings and experiences. Word of mouth won't tell you how they sound, but it will give you an idea of what they're like to work with.

Both band leaders agree that talent isn't enough: they set a high value on professionalism.

"A band can't have 'attitude,'" Zurin stresses. "They have to cater to the client."

To see how they score under this heading, you have to meet them in person.

Within the limits of maintaining a reputation for quality, musicians should be ready to do whatever is in good taste and fits the occasion. Star recalls very few times when he's had to refuse a request. If the band doesn't know one or two of your favourite songs, they should be willing to learn them.

You'll want musicians you can rely on to do their job, and at the same time put their hearts into playing. And, Star emphasizes, a good band leader is crucial. He's the band's conductor, motivator and contact with the client.

Zurin suggests not to start out with a song list. Instead, give the leader a general idea of what you want, then trust him to make the most of the specific decisions. He should have a feel for changes in mood during the event, so give him some leeway in things like shifting from waltzes to something more up-tempo.

One month before an event, Star meets his client to iron out details, notebook in hand. Zurin recommends meeting with your band leader at least twice: once when you sign the contract; and again, two to three weeks before the party, to finalize details.

Paul Zurin

"For me, every wedding is special," Star says. For him as for Zurin, professionalism is a matter of both the head and the heart. It means delivering what has been promised and treating every event as unique.

Should we celebrate Halloween?

Secular night of frivolity is not forbidden by Jewish law

By RABBI JUDY CHESSIN
The Dayton Jewish Observer

When many of our neighbours celebrated Halloween last month, many Jewish parents wondered whether they should let their kids get dressed and go door-to-door collecting candy.

What, we may wonder, could possibly be wrong with carving pumpkins or sending our children to gather free candy?

The controversy surrounds Halloween's origins. Halloween is derived from the Celtic festival that marked the official end of summer. As animals were moved into barns and pens, and the fall harvest concluded, the change of season was marked by a festival called Samhain (sow-ane,) meaning end of summer. Many superstitions became associated with this day including the belief that the spirits of the dead wandered around looking for bodies to inhabit.

Ancient Celts dressed up in costumes, making loud noises to trick and scare away the spirits. Since this was a Celtic New Year's Eve, Samhain was part of neither the previous nor the coming year and chaos ruled the day.

Around the fifth century C.E., the Roman Catholic Church gained dominance over Europe. Unable to wean the people away from their favourite pagan folk festival, the Church instead reinterpreted Nov. 1 as a day to honour the saints of the Catholic Church and renamed it All Saints Day. The evening before, Oct. 31, was called All Hallows Eve and became an auspicious night on which to pray for the dead.

A later custom arose in which people would go door-to-door requesting small cakes in exchange for reciting prayers for the deceased. The jack-o'-lantern, meanwhile, came from Irish folklore. A legendary figure named Jack once tricked the Devil into climbing a tree and then carved a cross on the trunk to trap Satan in the tree's branches.

The Devil struck a deal: if Jack would let Satan free, he would never give Jack entry into the underworld. When Jack died, however, he was ineligible for residence in heaven, and was thus forced to wander the world with a single candle to light his way. Legend has it that the candle was placed in a turnip to keep it burning longer.

Irish immigrants to America changed it to a pumpkin and bequeathed us an ever-burning remembrance of Jack's other-worldly presence.

Since Halloween's origins derive from long forgotten Celtic and early Church customs, what is wrong with Jewish children participating in America's secularized version of the festival?

To many Jews there is nothing wrong with celebrating Halloween. Jewish law does not forbid our children from participating in a secular night of frivolity alongside of their neighbours, as long as their safety is insured. Additionally, it is possible to trace pagan or early Christian elements in many American holidays and festivals including Jan. 1.

Were we to abstain from marking all seasonal holidays once observed by pagans, we would lose most American and even some Jewish festivals as well!

Wasn't the genius of Judaism its ability to take popular pagan customs and festivals and reinterpret them in the light of central Jewish events and teachings?

Yet other Jews argue that Halloween's witches, demons and ghosts are the very philosophic antitheses of Judaism. Any festival that celebrates and glorifies violence and death is diametrically opposed to the life-affirming impulse of Judaism. While magic and superstition have always played a role in Jewish folklore, normative Judaism shuns magic and its implication that humans can manipulate natural events. Jews teach that such power resides only with God.

Finally, it is argued that sending our children out to scavenge for piles of candy sends an inappropriate message of greed, gluttony and acquisitiveness. Whatever Jewish parents decide about the celebration of Halloween, our children should know that we Jews ourselves have our own wholesome day for costumes and treats: Purim. Indeed, Purim, in many ways, teaches the very opposite message from Halloween!

While Purim gives Jews permission to don costumes and enjoy tasty treats, it nonetheless teaches social responsibility as well. While we treat ourselves with sweets, we also send food packages to our neighbours (mishloach manot) and gifts to the poor (matanot la'evyonim).

Additionally, while we wear costumes, Purim's main theme is unmasking. Esther (from the Hebrew root s-t-r, or hidden) reveals her Jewish identity to save her people. Haman is unmasked as the treacherous enemy he is and suffers the consequences.

Indeed, even God, whose Name appears nowhere in the text, is nonetheless revealed through the Divine providence which is once again apparent in our history. Whether or not we choose to go door to door on Halloween, let us use the day to recall Judaism's fundamental charge: to hallow God's eternal presence day in and day out, and to proclaim the Jewish commitment to life, l'dor v' dor (from generation to generation).

Tips for honeymoon packing: Keep it light

After you pack your bag, take a second to see what you can remove. Chances are you will find something that you can do without. Usually you will be near a store to pick up something you may have forgotten. As for honeymooners roughing it out on some out-of-the-way place, they won't have to worry about dressing up, so they will probably have more room in their suitcase to begin with.

To ensure you pack according to your destination and type of trip, the following tips take an assortment of trips into consideration.

Although nobody ever suffered from taking one less bracelet or cocktail suit, there are definitely some things you cannot afford to forget. Pre-departure planning and tucking away these important items will save you trouble.

You will need these items:

- Passport – don't wait until the last minute to see if the old one has expired. Now even if you are crossing the border, you need to show this document.
- Visa (if required).
- Birth certificate.
- Copy of passport or birth certificate (leave to someone in your family).
- Credit card numbers (also leave a copy of these in a safe place or with a family member).
- Coupons for car rental, hotels and more reserved plans.
- Health documentation (check the Canadian government Web site for travellers to see what inoculations or other precautions are necessary: http:/www.hc-sc.gc.ca/hpb/lcdc/oshpub_e.html.
- Insurance (health, luggage).
- Vaccination certificates.
- Emergency information, such as the phone number of the embassy of your country.
- Traveller's checks and currency.
- International driver's licence.
- Maps and travel books.
- Language guides.

Once you have all these documents intact, see that your medical supplies are in order.

- Prescriptions (with pharmacy receipts to avoid hassles at customs).
- Travel first-aid kit.
- Insect repellent and soothing lotion to combat insect bites.
- Sunscreen and sunburn relief.
- Cold remedy.
- Seasickness medicine (boat, plane, etc.).
- Headache, heartburn and diarrhea medicine.
- Sleep-inducing pills (jet lag).
- Malaria pills (if destination warrants it).

At this stage of packing, toiletries should be attended to before you get involved with clothing decisions. Sundries such as make-up, make-up remover, moisturizer, shampoo, deodorant, hair brush and comb, toothbrush and toothpaste, soap, mirror and nail file are on everyone's list.

Other items depend on where you are heading. For example, a hair dryer is often supplied in modern hotels but e-mail or inquire before because it will save you schlepping an extra appliance.

One of the highlights of taking a holiday is being able to vicariously enjoy it by reflecting on the photos when you return home. Some people will do without an extra pair of shoes or handbag but they insist on taking their video recorder and camera. It depends on priorities. For some, a disposable camera will suffice and again, it will be one less appliance to tote.

To make beach life enjoyable, some items to remember are a beach towel, spare glasses and sunglasses. However, some hotels provide huge beach towels, so again check it out because these thick terry towels take up room in your suitcase.

No matter how crowded your luggage is, you will still need to make room for an address book, small umbrella, travelling sewing kit and facial tissues. Even though you don't have to punch a clock, you still must be aware of time, so wear a watch.

Clothing depends on your destination and season but here is a list that will get you off to a good start.

- Jacket.
- Jeans or casual pants.
- Long skirt.
- Short skirt.
- Shorts.
- Cardigan sweater.
- Raincoat with hood or rain hat.
- One nice outfit – a pant suit or skirt and jacket.
- T-shirts or turtleneck jersey (depending on season).
- Pajamas and bathrobe.
- Socks and underwear.
- Bathing suit.
- Sneakers or comfy walking shoes.
- Beach or shower sandals.
- One pair of dressy shoes.
- Sunhat, belts and accessories.

Partying in the Xtreme

But planning isn't everything, as Florence says. If something happens, they can change plans for a party – be they the playlist, decorations, dancers or specialty performers – with only a day's notice.

Though Florence recommends booking an event up to two to three years ahead, Xtreme does make exceptions to that rule; they've worked on entire parties with only a day's notice, much less changing a few details in an already thought-out plan.

Xtreme is able to be flexible because it has a few pre-set party packages ready to go for clients, starting at $500 and going as high as the client wants. Packages include dancers, lighting and prize packs. Customizations are endless.

When asked about the number-one compliment that Xtreme DJs and dancers get, Florence's answer was simple.

"Personality. The employees love what they do, and when they have fun, the clients have fun."

Indeed. Creative and innovative, the staff of Entertainment Xtreme's passion for the job is reflected in how much clients enjoy their events.

Harvey Keitel ties the knot in Jerusalem

While visiting Israel for a brief vacation and to promote his latest film at the Haifa Film Festival, actor Harvey Keitel surprised everyone when he married Dafna Kestner-Cohen, his Israeli sweetheart, in a spur-of-the-moment ceremony in Jerusalem Oct. 7.

Roni Milo, Israel's Minister of Regional Cooperation, arranged a speedy ceremony — less than 24 hours and the happy couple tied the knot while facing the floodlit golden walls of the Old City of Jerusalem. Since they did not have enough time to purchase wedding rings, a case of rings was brought to the wedding hall for their selection.

Kestner-Cohen, 40, is the daughter of a Canadian father and Israeli mother.

Keitel, who is half-Jewish and was raised in a Jewish home in Brooklyn, New York, has made more than 90 films in his 30-year career. He is usually identified with his famous mobster and tough-guy roles in such contemporary classics as Mean Streets, Taxi Driver, Reservoir Dogs and Pulp Fiction. He also earned an Oscar nomination for his part in Bugsy.

His current film, The Grey Zone, which premiered in Haifa, is the story of the 12th Sonderkommando in Auschwitz, the unit of Jewish prisoners who shepherded Jewish inmates to the gas chambers and assisted with the disposal of their bodies. This particularly difficult role may have changed his perspective on the World Trade Center tragedy for Keitel.

"I can't think of two more difficult or horrific events," he said, noting that the World Trade Center attack hit very close to home for him.

"I found myself speechless before that atrocity: 6,000 dead, and almost 20,000 children orphaned or with a single parent as a result of it. And yet..." he said while glancing out a door to children playing by the pool of his Haifa hotel, "... 20,000 is how many Jews were killed in a single day at Auschwitz.

"But I'm here," and he puts on his sunglasses and heads out into the heat of the day for a stroll around the magnificently lush terraced Bahaï Gardens in Haifa.

Hollywood star Harvey Keitel (left) poses with his Israeli-born wife Dafna after they married in Jerusalem earlier this month. Keitel is in Israel to attend the Haifa film festival screening of The Gray Zone, a movie that depicts how Jews were forced to work in the crematoria of Auschwitz death camp against their fellow Jews. Marking a boy's coming of age

A bar Mitzvah is a significant occasion in a boy's life. After the completion of the ceremony, the Torah community recognizes another full-fledged member.

Once a boy reaches 13, he assumes responsibility for keeping the many mitzvot. Indeed, the term "bar mitzvah" translates as "son of the commandments." Family and friends are invited to come to synagogue to look on proudly as the boy is called up to the Torah to recite the blessings over it.

Since the Torah is taken out Mondays, Thursdays, Saturdays, and certain Sundays, it is customary to call up the bar mitzvah boy on any one of these days. The bar mitzvah boy is well-prepared for this great day of his life. For months, he has practised how to put on tfillin, how to conduct the various prayers in the shul and how to read from the Torah. The bar mitzvah boy always devotes a lot of time and effort to studying his special Torah portion. Hence, when he gets up to read, he deserves the congregation's attention and praise.

Once the bar mitzvah ritual has taken place, the young man can complete a minyan and is capable of conducting services on behalf of the congregation.

The ceremony is accompanied by a seudat mitzvah. It may take the form of a Kiddush following Shabbat services or a melaveh malka after Shabbat is over, but many families prefer to celebrate the event later in the day or week with an elaborate party.

Yet, one must never lose sight of the reason behind the celebration.

From this day on, the bar mitzvah boy will put on tfillin, according to Jewish tradition. Tfillin consist of two small leather boxes which contain four sections of the Torah inscribed on parchment. One of the boxes is bound to the left arm so as to rest against the heart, and the other is placed on the head, above the forehead, so as to rest upon the cerebrum. Attention is thus directed to head, heart and hand, teaching us to dedicate ourselves to the service of God in all that we think, feel and perform.

According to Nathan Ausubel, author of the Book of Jewish Knowledge, the concept of marking the age of maturity at 13 predates Judaism. In many cultures, a boy was automatically considered a man when he reached puberty. Among Jews, starting with the final Second Temple period, what had formerly been a tribal rite of initiation took on a moral, spiritual tone, marking an important religious-social milestone in the life of every male Jew.

A Mishnah elaboration written during the first century C.E., makes reference to 13 years as the right age for beginning the fulfillment of all the 613 biblical mitzvot or commandments.

"Until the 13th year," observed the Tanna (sage) Eleazar, "it is the father's duty to raise his son. But after that, he must say: 'Blessed be He Who has taken from me the responsibility for this boy.'"

Ausubel relates how in antiquity, the bar mitzvah boy in Jerusalem was led by his father to the Temple priest or to the elder to receive his blessing, his moral counsel and his prayer "that he may be granted a portion in the Torah and in the performance of good deeds." Today, the rabbi performs the same function.

The bar mitzvah ceremony usually takes place at the morning prayer service in synagogue on the first Shabbat after the boy's 13th birthday. The boy is honoured by being called up for the first time to read from the Torah before the whole congregation. Upon the conclusion of the second brachah, his father steps forward to the reading desk and recites aloud the ancient formula for moral severance.

On this close-knit occasion, the bar mitzvah boy enjoys the camaraderie of his family and friends. Moreover, he is feted with compliments and gifts.

Jewelry trends for 2002

News Canada

Canadian consumers can look forward to an outstanding selection of fine jewelry trends starting this holiday season and throughout 2002.

Whether it is self-purchase or selecting that perfect gift, there are new ideas in all areas of fine jewelry that are available at the closest member store of the Canadian Jewellers Association (CJA).

Pearls continue to evolve into a very desired product for Canadian consumers. Last year was dominated by the black Tahitian pearl in strands, pendants and earrings. This year, variety is the name of the game.

Consumers should watch for:

• pearl chokers

• bracelets or strands with white or yellow gold beads interspersed for texture

• free-form brooches that use unconventional shapes to show the true beauty of the pearl

Gold jewelry changes direction in texture and size:

• big, bold pieces in rings, bracelets and pins

• yellow, white, or tri-colour gold (yellow, white and pink)
• mesh neckpieces with matching bracelets, sometimes mixed with cabochon stones

Diamonds continue to hold a strong appeal, this year watch for:

• diamond line bracelets

• continued popularity of the three stone anniversary ring

• diamond hoop earrings in a variety of shapes

Coloured stones are returning as popular anchors for brooches and pins. Starting in spring 2002, and well into 2003, colored stones will be featured prominently in earrings, pendants and necklaces.

"Throughout August, members of the CJA visited one of three retail jewelry buying shows across Canada where they selected from the latest trends in jewelry product design," says Catherine Sproule, executive director, of the association. She says that CJA members can assure their clients that they have the best product available and will guarantee fair pricing and treatment.

Party places for kids & grown-ups

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Looking for places where you can enjoy yourself while your kids do? Then talk to Stephen Abrahams about Putting Edge (1-888-544-9262) and Lorrie Chih about Rinx (416-410-7469).

Putting Edge offers what Abrahams calls an "active entertainment opportunity," at 11 locations in the Greater Toronto Area. This is 18-hole glow-in-the-dark mini-golf, played with a foursome according to regular mini-putt rules, but in a funky, unconventional environment.

The settings for the game simulate the jungle, a volcano, stars and moon, and an underwater environment. Black light causes balls, clubs and props to glow in the dark. Each Putting Edge location has a different mix of themes at different holes, so each course is unique.

Putting Edge is popular with all ages. Abrahams says the average is 24 to 27. It hosts all kinds of events, from corporate functions to bar mitzvahs. Some stores have two party rooms and some have three.

A game lasts from 45 minutes to an hour, and the total time for an event is about 1½ hours. But if your group is big enough, you can rent a facility for as long as you want. Putting Edge supplies pizza and pop, but you can also bring in food, or work with their house caterer.

Toronto-area venues include one each in Barrie and Whitby. Putting Edge also has stores in Halifax and Edmonton and one opening in Memphis, Tenn. The company is optimistic about the future and envisions further expansion in Canada and the United States.

While Rinx's target market is kids, the facility hosts many all-ages events.

Glo-in-the-Dark Cosmic Mini Golf combines golf with the danger of being captured by aliens and fighting your way through the jungle. Then there's Whirly Ball, a blend of basketball and lacrosse played in bumper cars.

Rinx has a disco roller rink with stereo surround sound, lighting effects and two large video screens, as well as an interactive video arcade, a Lazer Tag Maze, and traditional pastimes like ice hockey. And if you want something quieter while your kids are running around, you can enjoy a private game of billiards.

Rinx creates a party atmosphere with surround sound, large-screen music videos and disco ball. A dance floor and DJ are also available. And there are on-site rentals to make it easier to put together the kind of event you want.

There are private party and banquet rooms at Rinx, and on-site catering is licensed under LLBO, for everything from buffets to three-course meals. (Kosher catering is contracted out.) If you want to combine business with pleasure, there are meeting and conference rooms.

Rinx offers party packages, but events are tailored to your needs and budget. For an Orthodox bar mitzvah, for example, there are separate facilities for boys and girls. And throughout your party, your designated staff member stays with you.

And, Chih stresses, you have sole use of a given facility. All events are private. With Lazer Tag, for example, this means you'll be sure that smaller, younger kids will play safely without risking collisions with bigger kids.

Another kids' party place advertising in this supplement is: Whimz (416-656-7894).

free, providing a 33 percent cost reduction to the family. "It's our gift to the bar or bat mitzvah," Morais said.

Lowering the price on various trips helps as well. El Al is offering a package from Toronto to Tel Aviv to Eilat, including three nights in a hotel in the Red Sea resort town, for $1,129. Another package from Toronto to Tel Aviv sells for $1,159 and includes flight, five nights accommodation and breakfast in a Tel Aviv hotel, he said.

Telem points out that despite televised images of violence, life in Israel remains more or less normal. Not one tourist has been killed in the current round of troubles, he said.

Those visiting Israel will find "it is alive and vibrant."

Still, he acknowledges, "for the numbers to return [to pre-intifadah levels], it will have to become quiet in the Middle East so that Israel won't be on the news every day, with tanks and shootings and funerals. Then it will be okay."

Israeli terror victims go to Belgium

Will ask court to try Arafat

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Eight Israeli terror victims flew into Brussels last Thursday to petition a Belgian court to charge Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat with war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide.

Acting on behalf of 30 Israeli victims of terror, they were joined by the Israeli NGO Terror Victims Association (TVA), which is filing a class action law suit against Arafat on behalf of thousands of other Israeli victims of Palestinian terrorism. The group is also seeking charges against Arafat's lieutenants, Mohammed Dahlan, Marwan Barghoutti and Jibril Rajoub.

The complaint alleges Arafat ordered terrorist attacks which were carried out by members of organizations he controls, including the PLO, the Palestinian Authority police, Al Fatah, Tanzim and Force 17. The allegations also contend he violated the terms of the Oslo Agreement by permitting terrorists to operate in territories he controls and by failing to prevent incitement, rein in terrorists and jail killers, as he is obliged to do under Oslo.

The terror victims consider this a David and Goliath struggle, said Tzvi Fishman, a spokesperson for the group. Like the biblical Goliath, Arafat's home is in Gaza and he has the power of a quasi-state behind him. The complainants are acting on their own, without the sanction of the Israeli government.

The group believes Arafat is responsible for ordering the deaths of as many as 2,000 Israelis.

"He is not a freedom fighter, but the biggest killer of Jews since Adolf Eichmann and Adolf Hitler," Fishman said.

Among those filing suit in Belgium are Hanna Maoz, whose daughter, Tehilla, was killed in the Sbarro Restaurant bombing in Jerusalem; Aryeh Bozhan, who was wounded in the attack on school children in Maalot; and Tzafira Adorian, whose husband, Eli, was killed in a suicide bombing in the Mahane Yehuda market in Jerusalem.

TVA director Meir Indor said the Israelis are doing the same thing as Palestinians who have asked the Belgian court to charge Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon with war crimes connected to the 1982 massacre of Palestinians by a Lebanese Christian militia in the Sabra and Shatilla refugee camps.

Holocaust denier linked to Al Qaeda

By FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERN — A Holocaust denier has admitted having links to members of Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda terror network.

Along with his activities as a Holocaust denier, Ahmed Huber, 73, is believed to be a key figure in coordinating activities between Islamic extremists and European neo-Nazis.

In an interview, Huber admitted to having met in Beirut on several occasions with bin Laden followers, whom he described as "very intelligent and nice guys."

A well-known Holocaust denier, Huber helped plan a Holocaust revisionism conference that was slated for earlier this year in Beirut. The conference was ultimately cancelled because of international pressure.

Huber sits on the board of Al Taqwa, a financial company based in the Swiss city of Lugano. Earlier this month, U.S. President George W. Bush issued a list of individuals and firms with suspected links to Al Qaeda that included both Huber and Al Taqwa.

Huber denied that he or Al Taqwa have helped bin Laden – but Huber said he is proud to be on the list.

He also revealed that he plans to address a conference of Holocaust deniers that will be held soon in Tehran.

He added in the telephone interview that the Muslim holy war against Israel already has begun and that "no real Muslim will tolerate a Jewish state in Palestine."

After the list's publication, Swiss officials detained two Arab financiers, Youssef Nada and Ali Himat, who were identified as the managing director and executive director of Al Taqwa. The company recently changed its name to Nada Management.

Also this month, Swiss officials and prosecutors in the principality of Liechtenstein took separate action to freeze bank accounts belonging to Al Taqwa.

JERUSALEM — Israel will replace mobile homes for settlers in Hebron with permanent concrete housing. A government spokesperson said the mobile homes are being replaced because they have become unsafe since the start of the Palestinian intifadah.

HAVANA — A rabbi charges that Cuban officials placed him under house arrest for three weeks. Rabbi Brian Kent, 38, arrived in Cuba on Oct. 11 on a tourist visa. He had hoped to stay in the country permanently, even though Cuban officials denied his request for a humanitarian visa to serve as a rabbi. He returned to his home in Boca Raton, Fla., on Nov. 8.

Ex-Refuseniks Appeal to Jews

JERUSALEM — An appeal to world Jewry from several one-time Soviet Refuseniks calls on Israel to stop all contacts with Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat.

The statement has appeared in many Russian-language publications and electronic networks. Its signers include former Prisoners of Zion Ida Nudel and Yosef Mendelevich. In part, it reads:

"We, a group of Jews who repatriated to Israel during the last 30 years from different states of the former U.S.S.R., are calling upon all the Jews in the world to support our categorical demand towards the government of Israel: to stop immediately all contacts with Yasser Arafat – the most monstrous enemy of the Jewish people since Hitler.

"Such contacts constitute a crime not only against the Jewish people, but against the very foundations of universal morality, indeed, against humanity itself. Israeli politicians, who under every pretext grant Arafat international legitimacy as Israel's 'peace partner' allow him to continue, with complete impunity, the piecemeal genocide of the Jews."

Shuls, schools swept up in Vaughan sign blitz

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — A blitz by the City of Vaughan against the proliferation of public signs has raised the question of whether the municipality targeted the Jewish community exclusively.

Last week, several synagogues, day schools and Jewish organizational buildings in Thornhill received notices ordering the removal of three signs from their outdoor properties within three days, or face fines and the removal of the signs.

The notices, delivered by a bylaw enforcement officer, stated that "no person shall erect a sign without first obtaining written permission from [the] City of Vaughan's council. Also, [a] sign shall not be erected for more than 14 days maximum."

However, the city backed down just hours later, following the intervention of Canadian Jewish Congress. On the same day, the Jewish institutions received letters advising them that no further action would be taken "until the municipality has had an opportunity to further review this matter."

The signs, advertising United Jewish Appeal, State of Israel Bonds and the Jewish National Fund, appear on the grounds of synagogues and Jewish buildings in and around Toronto and other Canadian cities. The signs belong to the respective organizations, not to the buildings, and are permanent.

Reportedly, one building took in some of the signs after receiving the notice, but put them back later.

The city maintains the crackdown was aimed at unpermitted mobile signs which tout products and programs, often in brightly-coloured letters. The large, black signs have mushroomed in recent years, especially on Bathurst Street between Steeles Avenue and Major Mackenzie Drive.

"Our prime target was mobile commercial signs with no permits, not signs of non-profit

Reflections from the G.A. (2)

One of the highlights of the annual General Assembly (GA) gathering is the opportunity to hear, if not meet, some of the most outstanding personalities, thinkers, writers, teachers and leaders of the Jewish people.

At 7:00 a.m. on the last day of the assembly, I went to hear two of modern Jewry's most exciting and original thinkers, who, from their own unique and different vantages, expounded upon "the state of world Jewry." It was the highlight of the assembly for me.

A great deal has been written by and about Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz. Some people have said of him that he is as close to a Renaissance man as is possible to find today. His knowledge is vast, spanning a number of disciplines including, first and foremost, Jewish sources, as well as mathematics, science, literature and philosophy.

He speaks softly, quietly, in a slow rhythmical cadence, aphoristically, with words carefully selected and thoughts finely crafted like gems cut with delicate precision through which a great deal of light shines.

"Demographically, the Jewish people is a dying people," Rabbi Steinsaltz told the approximately 50 listeners cramming the first few rows of the large but mostly empty 3,000-seat auditorium.

"We are an endangered species."

But the diminishing numbers of Jews in the world was not the chief message he imparted. Rather, it was the diminishing number of knowledgeable Jews that evoked in him the most melancholy.

Of course the two shrinkages are inter-related, and the surest way to reverse the former, Rabbi Steinsaltz told us, was by reversing the latter.

Judaism must have content, Rabbi Steinsaltz said. The content of the religion, he urged us to understand, was inexhaustible, rich, rewarding, challenging, value-laden and life-enhancing.

From the editor's desk

A flourishing Judaism "cannot stand or live on anti-Semitism, on the Holocaust or on some of those politically correct attempts to define Judaism as merely a statement of social justice. Nor can it live in the glory of the State of Israel," he continued.

"We cannot pass on what we ourselves do not know!"

He recited a parable to illustrate the point. A parent bequeaths to the next generation a beautiful bottle of enchantingly-scented perfume. With each handing down from one generation to the next, a little bit of the perfume is spilled, until eventually all that passes from one parent to the children is an empty bottle. Finally, one of the inheritors examines the vessel and having no idea or sense of what the beautiful bottle once contained concludes, not surprisingly, that it is an empty, useless bottle. It is thrown away.

"The solution," Rabbi Steinsaltz said forcefully, "is education. And education should begin with adult education. We cannot delegate the obligation of being Jewish to our children."

As a minimum, he urged, our education should start with the aleph-bet.

He meant it literally. We understood it that way.

But we also understood it metaphorically. The aleph-bet was the introduction to Jewish knowledge, the key that unlocked the door to the treasure of Jewish content. It was the entry to the means by which to swim further, at our own progress, within the vast ocean of Judaism.

To underscore the importance of the resolve that was needed of world Jewry to become better educated, Rabbi Steinsaltz suggested, only partially tongue-in-cheek, that the minimum qualification for delegate status at the next GA should be demonstrated mastery of the aleph-bet.

"Let's at least be counted as a people that knows the aleph-bet."

Lest we were to think his suggestion regarding the aleph-bet was simply rhetorical and not to be taken seriously, Rabbi Steinsaltz concluded his presentation with another parable.

A young boy, raised in an orphanage as a non-Jew, was one day told by the orphanage director that in fact he was Jewish. It was time he knew his true identity, the kind-hearted director told him. And he gave the young lad a siddur.

"This is your heritage; this is your way to God; it belongs to you," the director said as he placed the prayerbook into the boy's hands.

The boy accepted the siddur but struggled to understand its use. Its text was strange and unfamiliar.

He decided however to go to the nearby synagogue. Once inside its modest chamber, the boy opened the siddur and lifted his eyes towards the Holy Ark.

"Dear God, I cannot read these prayers. All I know is the names and sounds of the letters. I will pronounce the letters and I beg you to ask the angels to make them into prayers."

At this point, Rabbi Steinsaltz stopped. He could not continue. He was crying. From where we sat, we could see the tears in his eyes. The vast assembly hall was absolutely silent.

Most of us were holding back our own tears.

The powerful, diminutive rabbi then gathered his emotion.

"And because there are an infinite number of prayers in heaven, it may take the angels a great deal of time to fashion the boy's prayers. But at least, he gave them the letters with which to start."

Next week, some thoughts from the second speaker I heard that morning.

Polish Web site publishes response from Jewish academic

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Polish magazine that was criticized for an article's stereotyped depictions of Jews has posted a rejoinder from a Jewish academic that Canadian Jewish Congress believes sets the record straight on Polish-Jewish relations from 1939 to 1941.

The article, by Prof. Frank Bialystok, appears on the magazine's Web site along with an editor's note explaining why the article is appearing.

The article is in response to a letter from Congress, which believed a memoir describing Janina Sulkowska-Gladun's youth, as related by her son, Chris Gladun, presented "a distorted view of the complexities of that fateful period," said Jolanta Bugajski, the editor and publisher of the magazine, Miedzy Nami (www.miedzynami.com).

Congress contends the memoir depicted Jews as collaborators, opportunists and persecutors of Poles, she added.

Bugajski met with Congress representatives during the summer and agreed to address their concerns by running Bialystok's essay on the magazine's Web site.

She told The CJN the magazine has only published one issue since July and has been sold since her meeting with Congress. The new owner has agreed to run Bialystok's article in print when he takes over the publication, she added.

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Congress' Ontario wing, said Bugajski's response satisfies Congress' concerns. "Jolanta was very upfront... and we agreed to a resolution of the issue," Rudner said.

The article by Bialystok, a native of Lodz and chair of Congress' Ontario community relations committee, provides a historical background to Polish-Jewish relations following the joint invasion of Poland by German and Soviet forces in September 1939.

Referring to the memoir, Bialystok states: "The picture that is presented is not only hurtful to Canadian Jews but presents a distorted view of the complexities of that fateful period."

Bialystok goes on to review the historical developments that affected the Polish and Jewish communities, while addressing the stereotyped depictions of Jews in the original memoir.

Terrorist loses appeal

OTTAWA — The Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) has dismissed an appeal by convicted Palestinian terrorist Mahmoud Mohammad Issa Mohammad, saying his continued presence in Canada would be "a mockery of Canadian legislation," the Ottawa Citizen reported recently.

Despite the ruling, Mohammad can still appeal to the Federal Court of Canada, ensuring his 13-year-old case continues to drag through the legal system.

Mohammad was a member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) in 1968 when he participated in the hijacking of an El Al jetliner in Athens. Terrorists sprayed machine gun fire at the plane and lobbed grenades, killing an Israeli passenger.

Mohammad was sentenced to 17 years in jail but was released a year later when the PFLP hijacked a Greek airliner and demanded his release.

After failing to disclose his involvement in the attack, he entered Canada in 1987 and since that time, he has fought government efforts to deport him.

RAISING CLIMATE CONSCIOUS CITIZENS: Toronto Heschel School grade 4 students, Sean Haber and Deborah Mazer, and Ellen Kessler, a teacher and environmental co-ordinator at the school, met with Alderman Mike Feldman at a recent ceremony held at city hall. The school was awarded a grant of $2,000 to be used towards this year's environmental projects.

Educators meet for professional development day

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish schools came together last week to participate in the largest professional development conference ever given by the Board of Jewish Education in the city.

Day school and supplementary school teachers and administrators took part in workshops and programs given by the UJA Federation BJE that focused on some of the challenges posed by increasing student enrollment. There are currently more than 17,000 students enrolled in Jewish schools in Ontario.

Seymour Epstein

"All of the affiliated schools and some of the haredi schools participated," said Seymour Epstein, executive director of the BJE. "It is a great moral booster for the teachers to be able to all get together."

The first day of the conference targeted the needs of supplementary schools, with programs ranging from Programming Jewish Family Education to New Ideas in Teaching Israel.

Workshops on the second day were divided into three locations on Atkinson Avenue – Associated Hebrew Day School, Leo Baeck and Netivot HaTorah. Classes dealt with issues relevant to early and elementary school years, as well as middle and high-school students.

Some topics focused on issues unique to Jewish schools, such as Teaching Hebrew, Sephardi Jewish History, and The Story of Eve and Lilith. Other classes dealt with aspects of general education.

Because the Ontario College of Teachers has granted the Board of Jewish Education status as a provider of professional development, Ontario certified teachers could use attendance at one of the workshops – What Accounts for Student Learning? What Matters Most? – toward a credit under provincial recertification requirements.

The Importance of Authentic Assessment, Strategies for Transforming Passive Learners into Engaged and Active Thinkers in the Classroom, and Teaching with the Brain in Mind were some of the topics discussed.

A recent report by the Canadian Council on Social Development states that more than one in five grade-school children in Canada have special needs that are not being adequately met.

A workshop on individualized planning for special needs children was given by Elaine Rubinoff, who discussed the importance of teacher role modeling.

Educators can often model appropriate responses so students can learn without realizing they are being taught, Rubinoff said.

In one of the more well-attended sessions, Understanding Difficult Behaviour, child psychotherapist Sharon Dembo discussed some strategies to address misbehaviour in school.

"Children let us know through their language – play and behaviour – who and what they are," Dembo said, adding that when kids misbehave in the classroom, they are saying they can't learn.

No education takes place without a relationship and it is important for teachers to connect with vulnerable children in a positive manner, she said.

Whether a problem manifests itself in anxiety, withdrawal, defiance or impulsiveness, the first step to creating positive relationships is listening to students. Less than a minute should then be spent responding to create a bond between teacher and pupil, Dembo said.

Teachers should also try to discern patterns in misbehaviour so they can figure out which situations are more likely to cause disruptions, Dembo said.

The day ended with the showing of Promises, a documentary about Israeli, Palestinian, and Israeli-Arab children.

A small number of teachers walked out near the beginning of the film.

"Almost everyone was incredibly moved by the movie," Epstein said. "The movie has the depth, vision and breadth of global value to be considered a potential classic."

HEARTS OF STONE!

For Jews, this past year has been the most difficult in 50. Filled with bombings, terrorism, shock, sorrow and tears in Israel and New York - perhaps no one has suffered as much as The Schevischurder family in Israel.

They lost five members in the Jerusalem "Sbarro" bombing.

The parents were with 5 of their 8 children when a suicide bomber detonated a knapsack filled with nails and explosives. The mother and two daughters A"H were killed instantly. The father and son A"H lay mortally wounded and died after reciting the Shema Yisrael together. Two young girls aged 8 and 10 were injured, one very seriously.

The 3 brothers not with the family found their sisters in the hospital. Then they came together for the five concurrent funerals which took place on Mount Menuchot in Jerusalem.

The father Mati was a Jewish studies teacher and the mother Tzirel worked with deaf children. They left a small amount of life insurance. The remaining 5 children aged 8 to 21, are destitute and facing a crisis. The youngest girl faces many surgeries and long term therapy.

WON'T YOU PLEASE HELP?

We need every Jew to help these five orphans financially. We can defeat those with hearts of stone. Charitable tax receipts will be issued for donations of $18 and up. Please give generously. In the merit of this mitzva may you and all of Israel be blessed with a year of health, happiness and peace. Thank you.

The greatest betrayal of all

One promise after another made by Yasser Arafat falls away like shrivelled, decayed straw in the wind. Whether they were the promises he made to Israel to stop the campaign of incitement against the Jewish State or to forge joint security arrangements with the IDF; or the promises he made to the United States to forever abjure violence and to resolve all Oslo disputes through negotiation; or the promises he made to the European Union to honestly manage and to distribute the hundreds of millions of dollars the European nations have given him for the development of an economic infrastructure, Yasser Arafat has betrayed them all.

Now comes a report published last week in the National Post that the school curriculum established by the Palestinian Authority (PA) violates the promise Arafat signed "to ensure that [its] educational system contribute[s] to the peace between Israel and the Palestinian people." In fact the curriculum achieves the opposite result. "The Palestinian textbooks are replete with images of violence and hatred in all contexts, reinforcing negative views of Israelis even in subjects far removed from history or politics."

The non-profit New York-based Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace recently concluded a study of 58 new textbooks and two teachers' guides published in the last two years for grades 1, 2, 6, 7 and 11. In none of these textbooks does the State of Israel appear, nor the idea of living in peace with the Jewish State. According to the Post, the new textbooks are being used throughout the 1,300 PA-controlled schools in the West Bank and Gaza.

"The PA curriculum does not teach the acceptance of Israel's existence, and instead of working to erase hateful stereotypes, it is instilling them into the next generation's consciousness," said Yohanan Manor, the centre's vice-chair.

The Post article also points out that "Canada has contributed $165 million in direct aid to Palestinian development programs including education, plus a further $10 million annually to the UN relief agency that helps run some schools for the Palestinians."

Foreign Minister John Manley recently announced the donation of a further $5 million for the enhancement of PA schools and libraries.

It is now past time for Canada to reconsider its policy toward the PA and to demand an accounting of the mendacious PA leader. For he has betrayed his promises to Canada no less than he has to Israel, the United States and the EU.

But he has also betrayed his own people. By raising Palestinian children on hatred and loathing for the Jewish State, he is consigning generation after Palestinian generation to a fate of unfulfilled aspirations, constant violence, endless misery and perpetual squalor.

This is Yasser Arafat's greatest betrayal of all.

Minister Manley responds

I wish to respond to the editorial "Manley's unworthy, problematic comments" (CJN, Nov. 1) and to question its logic.

The editorial misleads your readers by wrongly suggesting that, in my view, terrorist attacks against Israel could be more acceptable than the recent terrorist attacks against the United States. In fact, I believe that human life is sacred, be it that of an Israeli, of a Palestinian, of an American or of a Canadian. There is no justification for acts of terrorism, wherever they happen. This is the message that I recently delivered to a number of states in the Middle East, urging the leadership of those states, as well as that of the Palestinian Authority, to exercise their influence in order to bring violence to an end.

The existence of a peace process is the only distinction I made between the situation in the Middle East and the terrorist attacks against the United States. The Middle East peace process gives both Israel and the Palestinian Authority a basis for negotiations with an officially recognized counterpart. Both parties have committed themselves to resolving the conflict and they have the support of the international community. This was not the case regarding the Sept. 11 attacks against the United States, where there was no question of negotiations and no one to negotiate with.

You complain that I was obsequious in my efforts to placate "different terrorist-supporting, terrorist-training, terrorist-funding members of the U.S.-led coalition." Right. So obsequious that Beirut papers reported on my visit in a headline story – "Manley sticks to his guns" – criticizing state support for terrorist groups, and a front page editorial suggested I leave my frozen view in the North. There is none so blind as he who will not see.

You also criticize me, quoting me out of context, saying: "Mr. Arafat needs to be able to claim some progress on peace negotiations [if he is to retain his fragile grip on authority]." Unfortunately, the last part of my sentence was left out.

The Middle East peace process is an extremely delicate endeavour that aims to put an end to more than 50 years of tension and strife between Israel and the Palestinians. Both sides have suffered far too much. Both have lost too many lives. I believe my comments on the need for both sides to end the violence fully reflect the urgency of the situation.

Security is key for Birthright Israel

I am writing in response to Bryan Borzykowski's column "Should you go on Birthright?" (CJN, Nov. 15). When Mr. Borzykowski asks, "What security measures are they taking?" it is clear he did not do his homework. Birthright Israel trips are always conducted with the security and safety of the participants in mind. We work closely with Israeli officials; are in constant contact with trip organizers and with individual buses; and we carefully review, and if necessary alter, itineraries on a daily basis.

Please visit our Web site, www.birthrightisrael.com, to learn more about the extensive safety and security measures that Birthright Israel has in place.

Birthright not just any trip

As a Canadian who made aliyah over eight years ago, I check The CJN Web site every so often to find out what's happening in the Jewish community in Canada and to get a feel for the community's perspective on current events. In his recent column directed at youth (CJN, Nov. 15), Bryan Borzykowski listed the various questions he feels people should ask themselves before deciding whether to take part in a Birthright trip.

Among other questions he raised were whether Iraq is likely to send Scud missiles Israel's way during the 10-day trip and whether the Birthright itinerary includes Jerusalem.

I agree that safety concerns should be taken into account before making any kind of travel decisions. And even though it would be patriotic to declare that one should not let Yasser Arafat (or Osama bin Laden, etc.) decide one's travel plans, it is important to be realistic. Even here in Israel, people curb their activities based – in part – on the "winds of war" and where they're blowing.

But this isn't just "another trip." This is Birthright. I was present at a meeting where Deputy Foreign Minister Rabbi Michael Melchior explained that the State of Israel "had to" underwrite Birthright because "we are our brothers' keepers." So even though we could certainly use the money to deal with our own military/social/economic problems, we still subsidize these trips because, by doing so, we aren't standing idly by while entire communities get decimated by assimilation. At least young people "get a taste" of their heritage. Then they can decide whether or not to pursue it further.

No, this isn't just another trip – if it was, why would I and other Israeli taxpayers be paying for part of it? – and the question isn't whether Yasser Arafat will be able to deny a Jewish youth his/her vacation. The question is whether Arafat will will be able to deny a Jewish youth his/her birthright.

Perspectives

Yes, you should go on Birthright...

By GIL TROY

In his column of Nov. 15, Bryan Borzykowski asks, considering the complicated world situation right now, is it safe to go on Birthright Israel – or to Israel at all?

The question is a reasonable one. Despite the fact that Palestinian terrorists have been attacking Israelis sporadically since September 2000, the Sept. 11 tragedies have destabilized the world and forced North Americans to confront the ugly realities of terrorism. My students at McGill University are asking me if it is safe to visit Washington, D.C. It is certainly fair to wonder about travelling even further and into one of the eyes of the proverbial storm.

Birthright participants in Israel celebrate.

In the wake of Sept. 11, each one of us has to decide how fully we live our lives with a terrorist threat that seems ubiquitous. We all have our own theories, our own approaches. I believe in living my life to the fullest. I have flown on over half a dozen airplanes since Sept. 11, visited New York City once, and Washington twice.

Still, as the chair of the Montreal Birthright Israel steering committee, I have been struggling with this issue of Birthright and safety for over a year. The Birthright Israel Program – giving a free 10-day Israel trip to 18-to-26 year-old Jews who have never visited Israel on an organized tour – was conceived at a time of peace and prosperity. It began as a grand gesture, a gift, as one of the initiators Charles Bronfman puts it, "from one generation to another." The first Canadian excursion, back in the good old days of February 2000, was an exhilarating roots trip that was intellectually bracing, spiritually fulfilling, ideologically challenging, but also a heck of a lot of fun. It would be dishonest to pretend that travelling to Israel this December will be the exact same experience. There will be tighter security, and there will be more anxiety upfront.

As a result, I ask two questions. Not only do I wonder whether Birthright Israel can provide sufficient security. I also wonder what impact those security measures will have on the program, and whether Birthright Israel can provide what it promised – a personal journey of self-discovery, Jewish engagement, community building and great fun.

One of the many sad lessons Sept. 11 taught is that there are no guarantees in life. No one in today's world can guarantee security. Even before Sept. 11, even before the latest round of violence, everyone involved with Birthright recognized the daunting risks involved in travelling with hundreds of young people to a foreign country over 6,000 miles from home. Planes crash, buses collide, people slip and fall. Those "normal" risks are compounded by the "abnormal" risks stemming from hate-filled fanatics who perversely view the murder of innocents as some kind of victory. Moreover, the old rules no longer apply. We cannot say they won't target discos, that Tel Aviv's beaches have never been hit, that the murderers follow this pattern or that logic. For all those reasons, people involved in Birthright honestly say that there are no guarantees, and that all participants must make – and own – their own decisions.

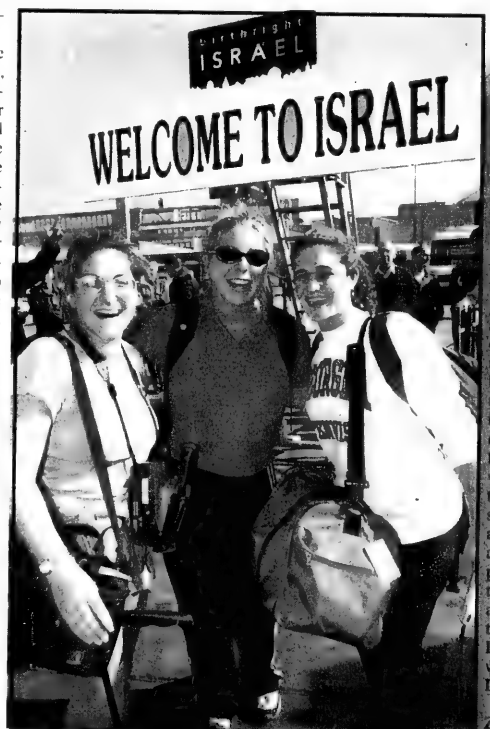
Still, it is a mistake to impute too much power to the terrorists, or to assume that security precautions will not help. For starters, no Birthright Israel programs go anywhere near the West Bank or Gaza, where the overwhelming majority of incidents have occurred. Just like those of us who grew up in New York in the 1970s minimized our risks by avoiding certain neighbourhoods, so, too, can visitors to Israel overwhelmingly minimize risks by avoiding specific areas. Especially since Sept. 11, with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat trying to prove that the Palestinians oppose terrorism, the number of incidents within the Green Line, within the pre-1967 borders, has plummeted. (I must confess to experiencing some moral discomfort with this calculus. Regardless of where you stand on the difficult questions surrounding the territories and the settlements, it is disturbing to find solace in the fact that you are much safer because other fellow Jews, and other fellow human beings, are instead serving as targets).

Even within this relatively stable situation, all Birthright Israel programs, like all Israel trips, undertake a host of security precautions. Areas that have experienced violence are avoided. Roaming around has been minimized. All trips are monitored by security experts and accompanied by armed guards – individuals, by the way, who often befriend the participants and offer yet another window into Israeli life.

These security restrictions lead to the second, and equally important, question. Having visited Israel twice last year with over 300 Birthrighters, I can testify to the fact that the security precautions do not harm the program. If anything, the deteriorating security situation over last year – and the dwindling Israeli tourist trade – has made Israelis much more welcoming of the Birthrighters, and added a whole new dimension to it. Birthright began as a one-way gift, a free trip with no strings attached. The truth is, simply by visiting Israel in the year 2001, Birthrighters reciprocate, offering the gifts of faith and friendship at a time when many Israelis feel abandoned.

I do not believe that Birthright participants should go to Israel out of guilt or out of obligation. Their parents, Jewish leaders and the rest of us should ask what our responsibility is to our Israeli brothers and sisters and whether we should visit them during this time of need. To the extent that Birthright Israel is an outreach program, it is perfectly legitimate for potential participants to ask more personal, less grandiose questions. They should go with their eyes wide open, aware of the risks, but reassured by the efforts of literally hundreds of people in North America and Israel not just to protect them but to give them the best possible experience. Birthrighters should only go on the program because they want to, not because they feel they should.

Last February, I climbed Masada early in the morning with 200 Montreal Birthright participants. It was a difficult week for the Jewish people. As we arrived at Dorval airport to go to Israel, we heard the horrifying news that a Palestinian bus driver had plowed into a group of young Israelis standing at a bus stop, murdering eight. The Israeli newspapers that greeted us on our arrival showed the picture of these eight people, the same age as our participants, with each picture bordered by a black frame. On our first Friday night in the country, American and British planes bombed Iraq. We certainly had a taste of what it was like to live the headlines of the Middle East, not just to read about them from afar.



Canadians in the Birthright program landing in Ben-Gurion airport last summer. [Isranet file photos]

Still, there we were, early in the morning, watching a beautiful sunrise spread dazzling rays of light over the expansive Judean desert. At Masada's ancient, open-air synagogue, a dozen young men and women experienced a group bar and bat mitzvah. One after the other, they spoke about the magic of Israel, the beauty of the land, the joy of discovering or rediscovering their Jewish roots, and the thrill of finding a warm Jewish community. All of us there burst into song and dance, and with tears rolling down so many of our cheeks, we sang "Am Yisrael Chai," the Jewish people live. I am tempted to say we sang and danced with a touch of defiance, showing that we were ready to stare down Arafat and his henchmen. The truth, however, is, that we were so safely ensconced in our Birthright bubble, so very comfortable, feeling so removed from all the complexities of the world, that there was no defiance, there was no edge. There was simply pure, unadulterated joy: joy at being alive, joy at being Jewish, and joy that, as the traditional prayer we all recited together said, that we had lived, thrived, and arrived at this special time. I know that I look forward to my return to Israel, and my return to Masada with a new group of students this December.

Religions in trouble

I write this column in the morning after having heard an interesting lecture the night before by Rabbi Donniel Hartman. Rabbi Hartman, along with his father, Rabbi David Hartman, runs the Sholom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem. Many readers will know of that splendid institution, which has a fair number of Canadian adults studying there each summer.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

One remarkable aspect of the lecture was its sponsorship – Holy Blossom, where the lecture took place, and Beth Tzedec, were co-sponsors, a welcome development on the Toronto religious scene. For when two large congregations, one Reform and one Conservative, can join forces for educational purposes and undertake a joint study mission to Israel, something important has happened. Such co-operation is not just a pluralistic intra-Jewish enterprise (in fact, the Orthodox Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue has also, on several occasions, been included). It is a public recognition that the participating organizations are open to different ideas and, on occasion, to self-criticism.

The lecturer felt that it is an unfortunate aspect of the way we treat religion in general, that we can criticize only ourselves. That is to say, generally Jews will not criticize Christians or Muslims, for it is considered incorrect to do so. According to Rabbi Hartman, however, it is necessary to be able to speak frankly to others about their religion, for the barriers we put up deprive us of opportunities to see ourselves in a different light, and the critique from without may cause us to change our ways, if necessary.

According to the speaker, it is fair to ask whether Islam in its present state is prone to foster or tolerate fanaticism and even terrorism. There are no true democracies in the Muslim world, for democracy means the right to criticize, which in an Islamic state appears to be considered improper or even criminal. In comparison, consider Israel, where criticism of the government, as well as of religion, is common parlance. No such freedom appears to be permissible in a theocratic state.

The world would be far better off if we would not be so polite with regard to people's religions, Rabbi Hartman says. After all, religion and religious actions are part of our daily life and influence the way the community operates. It is essential that they be open to questions and critique.

Presently, we resent it when a non-Jew speaks critically about Judaism and vice versa. It is a well-observed feature of an otherwise open western society, and if Rabbi Hartman is right, it stands in need of critical consideration.

Blood on the road

Since the Al-Aksa Intifadah erupted 14 months ago, some 200 Israelis have been killed by Palestinians. Not surprisingly, in a small country that prides itself on its reverence for life, these deaths have been devastating.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

During the same period, three times as many Israelis have been killed in car accidents. Yet for all the sorrow and tragedy of these 600 fatalities, their collective impact barely registered on the national radar screen. That's why the slaughter on the nation's roads is sometimes referred to as Israel's forgotten war.

Not all loss of life is considered equal in Israel. A soldier killed in action or a civilian slain in a terrorist attack commands the front-page of newspapers and tops TV and radio newscasts. In contrast, deaths on the road – unless the victim is famous or a spectacular multi-car collision is involved – are so routine, so expected as if to barely rate a headline. Israel's celebrated concern for life is decidedly selective.

How else to explain the lack of public outrage over the continuing carnage on the country's roads? How else to understand that despite the horrifically high toll year after year, the government and police still callously fail to deal with this scourge in a serious way? How else is it that combating road deaths is not a national priority?

If traffic accidents are an inexorable part of modern life in all countries, few compare with Israel in its shameful statistics and negligent policies. The numbers – per capita Israel is a leader in the western world in road accidents – are a scathing indictment of decades of government inertia and the homicidal behavior of Israelis at the wheel. The consequences are no accident.

To be sure, it's well known that more Israelis have died on the road since the state was founded than in all of its wars and terrorist attacks. Everyone pays lip service to the problem but few seem deeply concerned.

Otherwise, the public would not accept:

- That so many roads and intersections are designed dangerously.
- That the country lacks a well-staffed, efficient traffic police who actually enforce the law, especially speed limits.
- That drivers with previous convictions for serious traffic violations are allowed to drive large commercial trucks and tractor-trailers.
- That the road infrastructure is inadequate and poorly maintained (e.g., bad or non-existent lighting and signage; narrow roads; unprotected turns; absent barriers, etc.)
- That various road safety measures proven abroad to decrease fatalities – such as extensive electronic speed monitoring systems – have not been implemented here.
- That after 53 years, Israel still has no decent nationwide rail and public transportation systems.
- That the transportation ministry does not make the inspection of large vehicles a high priority and does not mete out severe punishments to transgressors.
- That so many people's reckless, aggressive driving and disregard for traffic laws and their fellow motorists go unchecked.
- That so much of the limited money earmarked for road safety is spent on advertising campaigns of dubious value.

But we accept it all. Sadly, this litany of neglect and ineptitude exacts a heavy price inwhich we the public and our elected officials are silent accomplices. Somehow we seem resigned to lose some 500 people every year with several thousand others seriously injured (including many crippled for life) as if all this were unfortunate but inevitable. It's as if we really couldn't give a damn.

This month, the Knesset marked its first Road Safety Day. All very nice until it was revealed that the government plans to reduce the National Road Safety Authority's budget by 25 percent. As a result, Deputy Transportation Minister Avi Yehezkel resigned in protest, accusing the cabinet of not putting its money where its mouth is vis-a-vis the epidemic of traffic accidents.

In its defence, the government insists that given the state of the economy, there's a need for widescale budget cuts. But a few weeks ago, when haredi leaders demanded – yet again – millions of dollars more for their heavily subsidized schools and religious institutions, the government found the money – yet again – to placate them. This at a time when the already insufficient education budget for overcrowded non-haredi schools is being slashed. Is it any wonder Israelis are so bitter and disillusioned with their politicians?

Islamic anti-Semitism

Jews celebrating by drinking children's blood? A conspiracy of bearded old men manipulating banks, media and governments? Jews as betrayers and spies ready to sell out their friends for money? These crude anti-Semitic images are usually associated with Christian Europe. The elites of Germany, France and other European societies frequently, conveniently used Jews as scapegoats in order to divert public hostility, and this culminated in the Holocaust.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In contrast, in Arab and Muslim countries, such vicious anti-Semitism was rare. While there were some pogroms and expulsions, the images of hatred were largely unknown in the Middle East.

This situation has now changed dramatically. The European and Christian world has acknowledged (but not eliminated) its legacy of anti-Semitism. In contrast, however, the Muslim and Arab world is moving in the opposite direction. Newspapers, television and Internet sites are filled with hatred against Jews (and not merely Israelis or "Zionists"). These are not isolated incidents, but rather part of an epidemic ranging from North Africa to Malaysia and Indonesia.

Egypt is one of the primary promoters of virulent anti-Semitism. Following the familiar pattern, the government-controlled press uses hatred of Jews as an escape valve for anger that would otherwise be directed against its own corruption. As noted by media monitoring groups such as MEMRI, Al-Akhbar, a popular government-owned Cairo daily, often publishes lurid anti-Semitic articles.

According to Al-Akhbar, "the Talmud… determines that the 'matzahs' of Atonement Day must be kneaded 'with blood' from a non-Jew. The preference is for the blood of youths after raping them!! Rabbi Moshe Abu Al-Afiah revealed this during the investigation of the disappearance of Father Toma in the Jewish quarter of Damascus in 1840." Arabs are urged to act "so that the day won't come when big bottles will be filled with Arab blood…"

The same crude anti-Semitic themes are also fostered by Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority. Friday sermons broadcast on official PA television include references to "the Jews" as "treacherous," "bloodthirsty," "greedy," "conniving," etc.

On Sept. 21, Sheikh Ibrahim Madhi declared, "…We must always remember who the Jews are, what they believe regarding Allah, …and their corruption in the world… One of the Jews' evil deeds is what has come to be called 'the Holocaust,' that is, the slaughter of the Jews by Nazism. However, revisionist [historians] have proven that this crime… was planned by the Jews' leaders…"

Palestine Media Watch reports give examples of textbooks referring to Jews as "enemies of the Prophet" and as "treacherous and disloyal." Similarly, Al-Hayat Al-Jadida, the official PA newspaper, often carries articles with a similar theme. On Sept. 6, one writer declared that "the Chosen People have learned all methods of killing, and have practiced and executed them; they have learned how to kill and how to torture…"

In Syria, the totalitarian state that's now a member of the UN Security Council, leaders and institutions from young President Bashar to educators and the clergy have all been conscripted in the campaign of vilification. Holocaust denial and "the aggression and racism of the Nazi Zionists and for apartheid in South Africa" are constant refrains in the government-controlled press. Syrian writers routinely refer to the contamination of "Zionist America and world Zionism…"

Even Abu-Dhabi, an otherwise non-descript principality in the Persian Gulf, has discovered the power of anti-Semitism. In the effort to boost its ratings during Ramadan, Abu-Dhabi television, which is broadcast by satellite throughout the region, features satires with stereotypical Jews and Israelis drinking Arab blood.

The scourge of Muslim and Arab anti-Semitism is primarily a threat to Israel and the Jewish people, but it is also a test for the rest of the world. For the United Nations and other human rights groups as well as individuals who claim to be opposed to hatred, silence in the face of this epidemic is a damning indictment. Now that the world has witnessed the horrifying result of this kind of hatred, there is no excuse for promoting or remaining passive in the face of the Islamic and Arab versions of anti-Semitism.

The Kirshner File

Feng Shan Ho - a Chinese Holocaust rescuer

Holocaust rescuers of the likes of Raoul Wallenberg, Chiune Sugihira and Carl Lutz, all of whom were diplomats or worked under diplomatic cover, saved Jews by issuing life-saving special passes or visas, sometimes in defiance of their own governments and to the detriment of their careers.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Wallenberg, a Swede labouring on behalf of the War Refugee Board, plucked approximately 100,000 Hungarian Jews in Budapest from the jaws of death. Sugihara, a Japanese diplomat stationed in Kovno (Kaunas), issued a blizzard of transit visas. Lutz, Switzerland's consul in Budapest, doled out visas, too, and is credited with saving some 62,000 Jews in Hungary.

And then there was Feng Shan Ho, whose feat of heroism has only lately emerged from the fog of obscurity. Ho, China's consul general in Vienna from 1938 to 1940, issued an average of 500 end-destination visas a month. These documents enabled Jews to leave Nazi-occupied Austria, ostensibly for Shanghai, China.

Ho's remarkable activities surfaced in Canada several years ago, when a Chinese cultural centre in Vancouver mounted an exhibit called The Shanghai Connection. It told the story of 18,000 European Jewish refugees who found a haven in Shanghai during World War II.

Last spring, the exhibition – a joint venture of the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada, the Chinese Cultural and Community Centre and the Manitoba Japanese Canadian Citizenship Association – was brought to Winnipeg.

Now, until Dec. 22, it is at the Chinese Cultural Centre of Greater Toronto (5183 Sheppard Ave. East).

Last month, on the 100th anniversary of Ho's birth, Dr. Joseph Du, a Winnipeg pediatrician who helped organize The Shanghai Connection, eulogized him at Holocaust Education Week in Toronto.

"I was impressed by his noble gesture," said Dr. Du in an interview before his talk.

Ho's daughter, Manli Ho, who accompanied Dr. Du here, told me that her father neither sought nor received recognition in his lifetime. But on July 7, 2000, Yad Vashem, the Holocaust museum in Jerusalem, bestowed upon him the title of Righteous Among the Nations, citing his "humanitarian courage."

"His reason for helping Jews was simply this," she observed. "He said: 'I thought it only natural to feel compassion and to want to help. From the standpoint of humanity, that is the way it should be.'"

Ho, she added, was a man of integrity. "He stood by his convictions and refused to renounce his principles for the sake of political expediency or even personal safety. And he bore the consequences without complaint."

Born into poverty in Yiyang, in China's Hunan province, he was raised as a Christian in the Lutheran church. A brilliant student, he graduated from the College of Yale-in-China and the University of Munich, where he earned a PhD in political economy.

"I'm not sure he knew Jews in China," said Manli. "He spent a year in Shanghai in the 1920s and may have encountered people there who were Jewish. Who knows? But he was certainly aware of the Jewish people, having grown up in the Christian-Judeo tradition."

He launched his 40-year career in China's foreign service in 1935 with a posting in Turkey. Dispatched to the Chinese legation in Vienna two years later, he was promoted to consul general in May 1938, following Germany's annexation of Austria.

As she tells it, Ho was repelled by the fanatical welcome the Viennese accorded to Adolf Hitler as he rode triumphantly into the city in the wake of the Anschluss. His impression of Hitler, whom he met at a reception, was tart: "He was an unpleasant martinet."

With the Anschluss, life for Austrian Jews turned nightmarish. But it was difficult to get out of Austria. Canada, like Switzerland, was reluctant to admit Jews. The United States' Austrian quota had been filled. Britain discouraged immigration to Palestine.

The plight of Austrian Jewry was exacerbated by a resolution at the Evian Conference closing the door to Jewish refugees clamouring to escape Nazi persecution.

Nevertheless, Jews flocked to foreign consulates in Vienna, hoping against hope to obtain precious visas.

Struck by their desperate situation, Ho gave visas to any and all who wished to try their luck in Shanghai. "My father's intent was to provide safe passage out of Austria," she explained. "Shanghai was under Japanese occupation and a visa was not needed for entry. But a visa, as proof of emigration, was required by the Nazi authorities for Jews to leave Austria. Many visa recipients did not necessarily use them for Shanghai, but to make their way to Palestine, Cuba, the Philippines and other parts of the world."

Coverage of The Shanghai Connection in Toronto's Chinese press.

Ho's superior, Chen Jie, the Chinese ambassador to Germany, was aghast by his gesture. "He wanted to maintain good relations with Germany and did not want to contravene Hitler's anti-Jewish policy," she noted.

Jie ordered Ho to desist, but he reminded him of the Chinese foreign ministry's liberal visa policy. On the pretext that Ho was "selling" visas, Jie sent a subordinate, Ding Wen Yuan, to confront Ho in Vienna.

"After a thorough investigation, Ding found no evidence of wrongdoing," she said. On April 8, 1939, however, the Chinese government punished Ho with a demerit.

Throughout this period, Nationalist China maintained close ties with Germany. Chiang Kai-shek, China's longtime president, was an admirer of Germany, used German military advisors and equipment and sent his younger son to a military academy in Germany.

Feng Shan Ho

"This son became a second lieutenant in the Wehrmacht's 98th Jaeger Regiment, which participated in Germany's march into Austria in 1938."

In May 1940, when the "phony war" phase of the war came to a crashing end with Germany's invasion of France, Ho was transferred to New York City and then to Chungking, China's wartime capital.

China closed its consulate general in Vienna in 1941 after breaking diplomatic relations with Germany.

Posted to Cairo in 1947, Ho served as China's ambassador to Egypt and seven other Arab countries until 1956. Manli, who would later become a reporter in the United States, was born in Cairo.

Ho remained loyal to the Chinese Nationalist cause in the aftermath of the 1949 Communist revolution on the mainland.

Subsequently, he was Taiwan's ambassador to Mexico, Bolivia and Colombia.

At the age 72, he retired. Afterwards, for reasons which remain unclear to his family to this day, he was censured and denied a pension by Taiwan.

Living modestly in retirement in San Francisco, he wrote his memoirs, Forty Years of My Diplomatic Life, published in 1990. He died on Sept. 28, 1997. The People's Republic of China sent a wreath to the funeral, but Taiwan ignored his passing.

Asked why his story is just coming to the fore now, Manli, a resident of Arrowsic, Maine, said, "Except for two anecdotes from the Austrian era, my father didn't talk about it much. After he left Vienna, he tried to contact some of his Jewish friends. A lot he couldn't find. They were murdered in the Holocaust."

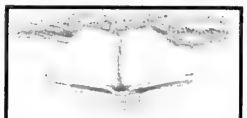
Jewish Life

God: healer of our wounds

By RABBI MICHAEL WHITMAN



Rabbinic Reflections

Important events in the Torah – such as the creation of the world, the exodus from Egypt, the Revelation at Mount Sinai – leave their imprint on Jewish life and behaviour.

But by what standard does the narrative in this week's parshah, Vayishlach, rise to that level? It concerns the wrestling between Jacob and the stranger, as it says, "Jacob remained alone. A stranger appeared and wrestled with him until just before daybreak" (Bereshit 32:25).

Jacob's struggle leaves a practical imprint on our daily life in the mitzvah of gid hanasheh [sciatic nerve]. "Therefore the Jewish People do not eat the gid hanasheh in the thigh to this day, because Jacob's thigh was injured [in this battle]" (Bereshit 32:33).

In order for meat to be kosher, the gid hanasheh must be removed. Because it is so difficult to remove this nerve, most Jewish communities simply discard the hindquarters of the animal and assume it to be non-kosher. That is the reason cuts of meat such as filet mignon and sirloin are not generally available as kosher.

Why is it necessary to remind us, in our daily choices of kosher food, of this wrestling? Why is it so important to remind us of the clash between Jewish values (represented by Jacob) and the origins of western civilization (the stranger is said to be an angel representing the Roman Empire descendants of Esau) – as if we could otherwise forget?

Furthermore, to celebrate a victory, you normally point to clear triumph. But the triumph of Jacob over the Angel was only partial – Jacob was wounded in that fight.

And lastly, why should the mitzvah itself call attention precisely to that part of the body that was wounded, that was vulnerable?

It is significant that the verse declaring the mitzvah of gid hanasheh (quoted above) is placed not after the struggle itself, where we would expect to find it, but later, after the verse that tells us, "And the sun rose for him [Jacob]... and he was limping [but not broken]. Therefore the Jewish People do not eat the gid hanasheh in the thigh to this day, because Jacob's thigh was injured [in this battle]."

The mitzvah commemorates not just the victory over Esav, but the ability to overcome such an onslaught after being wounded in the struggle. There is no promise in Jewish history that it will be easy, that all will go well. There is a promise from the Almighty, however, that no matter what happens, we will survive, even if we are limping, and that we will even flourish in the face of adversity.

It is this idea that the Torah imprints on our daily lives with the mitzvah of gid hanasheh.

The midrash states that when each of us goes to Heaven, God will look at us and ask, "Where are your wounds?" And we will answer: "But we have none."

And God will ask, "Why is that? Was there nothing to fight for?"

Our greatest heroes are not those who succeeded and excelled under easy circumstances. Our greatest heroes are those who were faced with adversity, from Rabbi Akivah to Rambam to Abarbanel to Maharal to the Yeshivah students in Shanghai during World War II. Not only were they not crushed by adversity, but they sparkled in the face of suffering. In the face of persecution and pain, both private and communal, not only did they endure, but they rose to greatness. That is the message of the mitzvah of gid hanasheh – God's promise of healing our wounds.

A primer on Islam

Children of Abraham: An Introduction to Islam for Jews*, by Khalid Duran, Ktav Publishing House, 2001

Books

Bernard Baskin

This groundbreaking book was published just a month before the acts of terrorism in New York and Washington, D.C. It is the result of a grant provided by the American Jewish Committee and is directed at Jews who want to learn more about Islam.

There are striking theological and moral resemblances between Judaism and Islam. Indeed, no two other major religions on earth are closer to each other. Of the three great monotheistic faiths, Judaism and Islam are most akin: both descend from Abraham, a common spiritual father. Knowledge of that connection has been largely lost among most Jews and Muslims, a casualty of the enmity of recent times.

The author, a Muslim, has written five books on Islam and is extremely active as teacher, journalist and political analyst in the Muslim community. He emphasizes the long, rich, and often mutually nourishing historical relations between Jews and Muslims in many lands and the extraordinary gifts to humankind that Muslim-Jewish interaction generated in advancing knowledge and culture.

This complex history seldom rose to the level of high regard some imagine to have existed in the Golden Age of Moorish Spain, but, even in its less glorious moments, it was generally far less fraught with animosity than Jewish-Christian history.

Given the understandable preoccupation with the threat of Muslim fundamentalism (generally referred to among experts as Islamism), The Children of Abraham underscores the wide gap between the great universal religion of Islam and the totalitarian political ideology of Islamism.

It also offers a candid analysis of the status of women in Muslim belief and practice, as well as an unsentimental assessment of the historical treatment of minorities within Islamic societies.

The book's publication has met with hostility and fierce antagonism. Why? Because the author is a severe critic of many aspects of Islamic society and history. He makes clear that fundamentalist or not, Arab states are not likely to embrace democracy. "Even American allies like Saudi Arabia, Jordan and the oil emirates are hard-pressed to keep up the pretence of being democratic as they pursue their anti-fundamentalist struggle, even though it is in the name of democracy that they do battle."

It is rather remarkable that the author (and remember that the book was written before Sept. 11) devotes seven pages to the importance of Osama bin Laden and lists his qualifications as a charismatic leader. These include the influence and power of his wealth, his record of personal bravery and dedication, his intelligence and inventiveness, his ability to choose loyal lieutenants and followers, his Arabian origin, his internationalism which flows from his residence in several countries and his essential pragmatism which when necessary triumphs over ideology. All in all, quite a formidable opponent.

On women's rights, the author is cautiously optimistic. "Muslim women's struggle for equal rights is dramatic and often tragic, with many setbacks, and is still beset by great obstacles. All the same, there is discernible progress and indications that the process of emancipation has become unstoppable. In Afghanistan, Algeria, Iran, Pakistan, and Sudan, the vast majority of women are adamantly opposed to the Islamists."

A companion volume to this book is available which serves as an introduction to Judaism for Muslims. Now, more than ever, there is every reason to embrace mutual understanding and reduce intolerance and hatred. Halevai.

Jewish parenting – part 3

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, a final look at Jewish parenting advice on the Internet with the best source of wisdom – other parents.

If you want to find someone who knows exactly what you are going through, try joining a parenting mailing list. You'll join a global Jewish community of people with questions, answers and discussions on practically any parenting topic.

Many of these sites even let you delve into their archives, which is very helpful, since you're probably not the first person to go through what you are experiencing. The busiest board that I came across is found on the ParentsPlace.com Web site. There were questions about naming ceremonies for newborn girls, where to buy non-dairy toppings and how to relate to that week's Torah reading [http://boards2.parentsplace.com/cgibin/boards/jewish].

You can also join the parenting list at Shamash, where there are discussions about Jewish education, intermarriage and where a nursing mother can find a shirt with a high neckline and long sleeves. (The easiest way to find this list and huge archive is to go to http://shamash.org/help/listoflists.shtml and search for the phrase: SCJ-PARENTING.) If your Web browser is set up to access newsgroups, you can also visit the Soc.Culture.Jewish.Parenting discussion group [news:soc.culture.jewish.parenting]. When I peaked in recently, there was a respectful discussion about how to deal with children who want to go out for Halloween. I was impressed that in all these sites, the tone was consistently respectful even when topics were potentially fiery.

One controversial article that drew much reaction was written by Rabbi Shraga Simmons. Rabbi Simmons says that "even an abusive parent deserves some respect in the eyes of the Torah." Although "abusive parents damage God's precious jewels and will pay a heavy price for their deeds of negligence, a child should still honor a parent for having been given their life." [http://aish.com/family/mensch/Honoring_Abusive_Parents.asp]

In Meditations on Getting, Spending and Spoiling, Shira Dicker looks at that tough and common problem. Although it is easy to say spoiling children will cause problems, Dicker has mixed feelings about her own frugal childhood: "Suffering in our Stride Rites and Irregular Danskin leotards, we were secure in our knowledge that these spoiled kids, who had everything we secretly desired, were actually going to grow up to be emotionally, intellectually, ideologically... stunted human beings... Yet even as we respected our parents' non-consumerist views... we hungered for a little spoiling." Now that she is a parent, Dicker has come to realize that spoiling has nothing to do with money. "Spoiling results when the giving is done out of an anxiety to provide or an inability to solve a problem." [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/571.html]

For more thought-provoking articles, take a look at the Jewish perspectives in How to Talk to Your Kids About Lying [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/728.html] and Jewish Values and Society's Fads [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/1519.html] and the issue of parental guilt [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/1707.html].

Totally Jewish is a British Web site with a page geared to new parents and parents-to-be. There are some articles written by new parents (e.g., Anything for a Quiet Life!), parenting tips, pregnancy information and a message board. There's also a competition where you can vote for the cutest Baby of the Month [http://www.totallyjewish.com/parenting/] Also check out the Jewish Parenting page produced by the JCC in Tempe, Ariz. [http://tricityjcc.org/family_life/].

Haviva Ner-David suggests that one important rule for parents to remember is spontaneity. In Michal and Me at the Mikvah, she describes how on the night of her ritual immersion in the mikvah, her four-year-old daughter said she wanted to go along, having no idea what a mikvah was. Instead of balking, Ner-David decided to agree and used their time to explain about menstruation, babies and God. "This was definitely a bonding experience for me and Michal... This is an experience that we can now refer back to, remember together, and always share as our exclusive memory." [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/553. html]

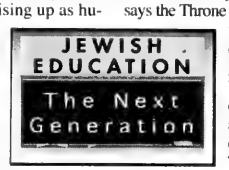
Balancing religion and science

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

The historical narrative of religion's encounter with science often reads, in its more superficial and depressing aspects, as the story of cliches held on both sides of the ledger. There is the hackneyed advertisement of science rising up as humankind's new liberator – empirical and rational and built on common sense, leaving behind the ancient world view of religious superstition and ignorance. There is the competing public relations campaign of religion, which targets science as an atheistic and amoral enterprise, bent on turning men into gods while ironically tracing our origins to the apes.



But while these gross characterizations may still hold sway in some circles, the truth is that enlightened figures from both the scientific and religious communities have drawn attention, for many years, to the education that religion and science can confer upon each other and to the parallel – as opposed to conflicting – routes that each discipline takes in trying to chart a map of a reality. The "how" of science and the "why" of faith are forever locked in a mutually dependent search to define both what we are and what is the meaning of that existence.

The biologist Robert Pollack quotes his teacher, Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, to the effect that "if you know someone who says the Throne of God is empty, and lives with that, then you should cling to that person as a good, strong friend. But be careful: almost everyone who says that has already placed something or someone else on that Throne, usually themselves."

The idea that once can simply replace religion with telescopes and test tubes, and that such a substitution has no moral implications, is arrogant and deluded in the extreme. By the same token, to act as if the traditional religious understanding of the age of the universe, for example, can defiantly reject all challenges that science can bring forward relegates Judaism to a very sad state indeed. Religion appears like a stubborn and tempestuous infant that one can attempt to placate simply to stop the crying, but for whom one cannot look to for leadership and inspiration.

I know of schools where the very word "dinosaur" is so anathema that teachers wouldn't even be allowed to use it on a spelling quiz, as though the letters themselves are perceived as part of large-scale assault on cherished doctrines. I know of other educators who smugly believe that science is all the knowledge we now need, and that religion serves as a crutch for those unable to make the shift to the post-Darwinian world.

As always, truth laughs at simple formulations.

Franklin Roosevelt's rallying cry – "we have nothing to fear but fear itself" – should be the operative credo for those who would leave Jewish education in the Dark Ages. Radical transformation of curriculum, teaching methods, professional development and overall Jewish vision are necessary, and immediately, if the actual task of bringing Jewish students to the task of negotiating their universe and their faith can be brought into convergence rather than an unnecessary conflict.

Even those schools that proclaim open-mindedness and diversity have failed to grasp the inevitable integration that must take place between God's word and God's world. To put it another way, God exists on the HMS Beagle as much as anywhere else.

Chanukah Delights

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Crostini di Spuma di Tonno, Zuppa di Pesce Passato, Dolce di Tagliatelle. Jewish food? For the Jews of Italy the answer is a resounding "yes."

In 1957, Joyce Goldstein made her first trip to Italy and instantly became what she calls a "fanatic Italophile." Daughter of Russian immigrants, this award-winning author, cooking instructor and former chef/owner of the San Francisco restaurant Square One threw herself into Italian art, architecture, language, culture… and food.

Out of her travels and study came Cucina Ebraica: Flavors of the Italian Jewish Kitchen (Chronicle Books), an exhaustively researched, beautifully photographed homage to a cuisine dating as far back as Roman times.

But what makes these recipes Jewish? As in every corner of the Diaspora, Jewish cooks throughout the ages have used their creativity to wed regional cuisine to the laws of kashrut. Sometimes a clue lies in what is missing – no besciamella (cream) sauce or cheese on meat, for instance. The names of recipes may contain a telltale ending – "alla Guidia" or "alla Mosaica," denoting "Jewish style," "per Sabato" for Sabbath dishes or "per Pesach."

"These are very regional Italian recipes," says Goldstein, "and often you can tell just by looking at them where the Jews lived.

"Sometimes what makes these recipes Jewish is the name, like Scaloppini di Tacchino Rebecca or Minestra di Esau, but a lot of times you can't tell, unless you see margarine or oil where they might have used butter."

In Sephardic Flavors: Jewish Cooking of the Mediterranean (Chronicle Books), Goldstein expands her culinary adventure into Spain, Portugal, Greece and Turkey as well as her beloved Italy. In both books what stands out is her passion for locally grown ingredients.

Despite her Ashkenazi upbringing, Goldstein claims a natural affinity for the flavours of the Mediterranean, the aromatic seasonings, the sweet and sour combinations and tart sauces and vinaigrettes.

"I have always said that if there were no lemons, I would have a hard time cooking," she says.

"The raw materials of the region are fabulous – Italian eggs with red yolks, flavourful, fresh chickens, vegetables that are picked one minute and served the next; whereas if I go to the supermarket, when was it picked? When was it put out? When did I cook it? Three days maybe have lapsed, and it's not as flavourful. Italians are totally driven by the quality of their ingredients."

While both books are thoroughly researched, Goldstein never sacrifices flavour for authenticity. Where she finds a recipe bland, she adjusts the seasoning. "Our palates today are not used to things simple and good; they're a little more stimulated. We're used to eating all kinds of food in this country, so the ante is up, and we want a little bit more flavour."

She also admits she has adjusted cooking times, since many of the oldest recipes were overcooked by today's standards. "These are people that lived without ovens. They brought things to the baker to be cooked and picked up later, and some things were cooked a very long time. Vegetables – in those days you never got a crunch in your life!"

Both books contain menu suggestions for Shabbat as well as the holidays.

"Deep frying is an old Roman Jewish tradition," notes Goldstein, and there are many appetizing choices for Chanukah. Try the Sicilian Potato Croquettes for a nice change from latkes.

"My grandchildren love them," she says. "They're round and small, and they can eat them with their fingers, just pop them in their mouth."

Of course they love latkes too, which Goldstein serves with either applesauce or her favourite topping from childhood, plain sugar.

Some form of Fritto Misto (Mixed Fry) would also be appropriate for Chanukah. "The Roba Fritta is very Jewish. It comes from the tradition in Andalusia in Spain where they had all those fry shops, and it is a classic Italian and Spanish Jewish dish, almost like tempura in a way."

Cook it in Italian

The Chanukah fritters have become another Goldstein family favourite, a Mediterranean dessert offered here with an Italian honey topping, but "as a change of pace, you could dip these briefly in a classic Middle Eastern sugar-and-water syrup seasoned with cinnamon stick and orange zest," she suggests.

Trained and educated as an artist, Goldstein is a consummate historian with an exacting palate, and in her capable hands food and art blend. "When you cook, you are organizing flavours and appearance, colours, smells, tastes. To me that's like organizing a canvas when you're painting, like the composition, choice of textures and colours. With art you don't have smell and taste, so maybe food has an advantage, although art lasts and food gets eaten up. But both make use of creative energy."

SICILIAN POTATO CROQUETTES

From Sephardic Flavors

2 lb. boiling potatoes, peeled and quartered or halved
2 eggs, separated
3 tbsp. chopped fresh flat-leaf parsley
/ cup grated parmesan or pecorino cheese
3-4 tbsp. chopped fresh mint (optional)
/ cup finely minced green onion, including tender green tops (optional)
1 clove garlic (optional)
salt and freshly ground black pepper vegetable or olive oil for deep frying all purpose flour for coating fine dried bread crumbs for coating

Place the potatoes in a saucepan with lightly salted water to cover generously. Bring to a boil and cook until tender, 15 to 20 minutes. Drain well and, while still warm, pass them through a potato ricer placed over a bowl or mash them. Add the egg yolks, parsley, cheese, mint, green onion, and garlic. Stir well to combine. Season with salt and pepper. Form in 1-inch balls or ovals.

Pour the oil to a depth of 3 inches into a saucepan or a deep saute pan, and heat to 375 on a deep-frying thermometer.

Meanwhile, in a bowl, beat the egg whites until soft peaks form. Spread a little flour on one plate and some bread crumbs on a second plate. Dip the balls or ovals first into the flour, then into the egg whites, and finally into the crumbs, coating evenly at each step. Place on racks or parchment paper-lined baking sheets. (These croquettes can be prepared up to this point a few hours ahead of serving and covered and refrigerated until you are ready to fry them.)

When oil is hot, add the croquettes, in batches, and deep-fry until golden, about five minutes. Using tongs or a slotted spoon, transfer to paper towels to drain, then keep warm in the oven preheated to 250 until all the croquettes are fried. Serve hot. Serves 6.

Note: You can also use baked russet potatoes for the croquettes, scooping the cooked flesh from the skins into a bowl, then mixing with the other ingredients as directed.

ROBA FRITTA: MIXED FRY

From Cucina Ebraica

Vegetables:
3 zucchini, sliced or cut into batons, salted, drained for 30 minutes, rinsed and dried
3 artichokes, pared to the heart, sliced or quartered and placed in lemon water until needed
1 eggplant, peeled, sliced, salted, drained for 30 minutes, rinsed and dried
1 or 2 parsnips, peeled and sliced
2 potatoes, peeled and sliced
1 small head broccoli, trimmed into florets
1 small cauliflower, trimmed into florets
1 small butternut squash, peeled, seeded and sliced
2 onions, sliced and soaked in cold water for 30 minutes to sweeten

Batter:
3½ cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. salt
pinch of baking soda
3 tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. red wine vinegar
about 3 cups water
vegetable or olive oil for deep frying

Prepare all the vegetables as directed and set aside.

To make the batter, in a bowl, combine the flour, salt, baking soda, olive oil, vinegar and enough water to make a smooth, dense batter.

In a deep-fat fryer, deep frying pan, wok, or saucepan, pour in oil to a depth of three inches. Heat the oil to 375. In batches, dip the vegetables (reserve the onion) into the batter and slip into the oil. Do not crowd pan or the oil temperature will drop and the vegetables will absorb the oil.

Fry, turning as needed, until golden brown, about 5 minutes. Using tongs, or a slotted spoon, transfer to paper towels to drain, then keep warm on a warmed platter in an oven preheated to 200. Fry the onions last and scatter the slices over the top. Serve hot with the lemon wedges. Serves 6.

Notes: Paper-thin lemon slices, halved mushrooms, and pieces of cardoon and fennel can also be dipped in batter and fried. Cook the cardoon in boiling salted water for 20 minutes and the fennel for 10 minutes before coating with batter and deep-frying.

CHANUKAH FRITTERS

2 envelopes (2½ tsp. each) active dry yeast
1 tsp. sugar
1 cup lukewarm water
3 cups all-purpose flour
1 tbsp. aniseeds
1 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. vegetable oil, plus oil for deep frying grated zest of 2 oranges
1 cup raisins

In a small bowl, dissolve the yeast and sugar in the lukewarm water and let stand until foamy, about 5 minutes. In a large bowl, stir together the flour, aniseeds and salt.

Add the yeast mixture, 2 tbsp. oil and the orange zest, and mix with a wooden spoon or a stand mixer fitted with a dough hook until the dough comes together. Transfer the dough to a floured work surface and knead until smooth and no longer sticky, 5 to 8 minutes.

Knead in the raisins, shape the dough into a ball, place in a oiled bowl, and cover the bowl with a kitchen towel. Let the dough rise in a warm place until doubled in bulk, about one hour.

Turn the dough out onto a lightly floured work surface, punch it down, and flatten it into a square or rectangle ½-inch thick. Let rest for 15 to 20 minutes, then cut into 36 diamonds or triangles.

Pour vegetable oil to a depth of 3 inches into a deep saucepan and heat to 350 on a deep-frying thermometer. Drop a handful of the cutouts into the hot oil and fry until golden, about 5 minutes. Using a wire skimmer or slotted spoon, transfer to a paper towel to drain. Arrange on a serving platter and keep warm. Fry the remaining cutouts.

When all the fritters are fried, make the glaze by stirring the lemon juice into the warmed honey. Drizzle the honey over the fritters and serve warm. Serves 8-10.

Pie, easy as 1,2,3

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Maybe it's because I'm homesick at times for America, but I've spent a lot of time searching for the perfect pie crust for the American-as-apple-pie pie. The flaky, not-too-sweet, not-too-salty piecrust oozing with cinnamon-scented apples. Baked to perfection and crying out for a scoop of vanilla ice cream.

But here's my problem: Many pie crust recipes up until the early '60s called for lard. Some still do. Or a combination of lard and butter for some scientific reason. Jewish homemakers, of course, never used lard, but substituted solid vegetable shortening. Butter was a possibility, but for those who keep the Jewish dietary laws and serve dessert mainly on Shabbat and festive occasions featuring chicken or meat, this was a limited option. Lately we have been advised to use vegetable oils to replace all or part of the butter formerly called for. Or unsalted margarine, for those not afraid of trans-fatty acids.

Then there's the unbaked-baked -crust dilemma. Many recipes assume that you know how to make a pie crust, starting off by telling you to have one ready. Some require pre-baking and some, chilling. Some crusts bake along with the filling.

Perhaps the fact that I don't use lard or butter makes my rolling-out process so daunting. I am thoroughly impressed with those bakers who can actually get the dough into the required 9- or 10-inch circle. Not to mention those who can actually execute a double crust. Where did the expression "easy as pie" come from? None of this seems easy to me!

Of course, there are the refrigerated pie crusts that come from the grocery store. All you have to do is position the rolled dough into the pie plate. This kind of dough tastes pretty good and save a lot time and energy.

But if you really do want to make your own pie crust, don't be dismayed by some of the instructions in recipes that seem to be aimed at a lab, not a kitchen. Here a few of the experts' hints.

If you use a butter, margarine or shortening based-recipe, measure the dry ingredients into a mixing bowl. To cut the fat into the flour, use a pastry blender, a fork or your fingertips.

When you add the liquid (usually ice water), add only two-thirds of what the recipe calls for. Sprinkle it evenly over the flour mixture. Mix quickly with a fork and try to gather the dough into a ball. If it crumbles and won't hold together, add more water a teaspoon at a time.

It's always a good idea to chill the dough before rolling. This trick will make the dough easier to handle, less likely to shrink and the crust will bake up flakier. Make sure that you preheat your oven when baking a crust.

Putting the crust into a hot oven causes the fat particles to explode. This process creates steam that lightens and crisps the pastry. At lower oven temperatures, the fat just softens and melts.

Both piecrusts and filled pies should be started in a hot oven (475). The oven should be preheated before the piecrust is rolled out. Pie shells should be baked about 12-15 minutes. When baked at too low a temperature, they shrink and become misshapen; when baked at too high a temperature, the edges burn before the centre of the crust is baked. A perfect pie shell is firm and dry with even golden-brown edges.

Here is a standard 9-inch one-crust piecrust recipe using shortening:

¼ tsp. salt
1 cup all-purpose flour
⅓ cup plus 1 tbsp. shortening
2 to 3 tbsp. ice water

Organic, Kosher, and irresistibly delicious — that's Crofter's!

CERTIFIED ORGANIC
COR 398

What does "Organic" Mean?

"Organic" refers to the way agricultural foods are grown and processed, signifying a dedication to practices that strive for a balance with nature, using methods and materials that have minimal impact on the environment. Organic foods are minimally processed to maintain the integrity of the foods without artificial ingredients, preservatives, or irradiation.

"Certified Organic" means the organic quality of the product has been certified by a nationally or internationally recognized authority.

Crofter's Premium Fruit Spreads are BOTH CERTIFIED ORGANIC AND KOSHER . . . your assurance of the highest possible quality, natural goodness, and a natural, freshly-picked taste.

Easy to Prepare, Hard to Resist . . .

Linzer Torte à la Crofter's

1 cup each flour, butter, sugar, and ground almonds
2 eggs
2 teaspoons each baking powder and cinnamon
1 jar CROFTER'S Premium 4 Fruit Spread (blend of strawberries, raspberries, cherries and red currants)

- Beat butter until smooth. Add eggs, sugar, almonds, flour, cinnamon and baking powder and blend well. Butter a round baking dish and put in 2/3 of the mixture. Spread the CROFTER'S 4 FRUIT evenly over dough. Place the remaining 1/3 of the dough into a piping bag with a wide decorator's tip. Squeeze the dough on top of the jam, creating a weave pattern.
- Bake at 350°F for 50-60 minutes. Use a wooden skewer or toothpick to test if the cake is ready (toothpick should come out dry).

To serve the cake as a dessert, top with a dab of real whipped cream.

For variety try substituting CROFTER'S Black Currant, Blackberry or Raspberry.

Cane juice vs. fruit juice sweetening: fact & fiction

All our fruit spreads are sweetened with organic cane sugar (dehydrated cane juice), which, after inversion, has exactly the same molecular structure as the sugars supplied by grape juice concentrate. The non-organic grapes commonly used to sweeten jams are one of the most heavily sprayed fruits due to their tendency to mould quickly. That's why we prefer organic cane sugar. Whether your concerns are health-related or environment-related, it pays you to investigate the facts.

Home made pie: not only for experts

Stir salt into flour. Cut shortening into flour with two knives or pastry blender until shortening is the size of peas. Sprinkle water a tablespoon at a time into flour, adding as much as needed. Blend with a fork to make a stiff dough; wrap with plastic wrap and chill. Press in bottom and up side of pie plate and flute edges. Bake if pre-baking is required.

Make your life easier and try a graham cracker crust. Substitute any plain wafer or cookie.

Graham Cracker Crust:

1¼ cup fine graham cracker crumbs
¼ cup sugar
⅓ stick unsalted margarine or butter, melted

Mix crumbs with sugar. Add butter and stir until butter is evenly distributed. Mixture will not hold together. Press in bottom and up side of a 9-inch glass pie plate. Press crumbs against pan to form a compact crust.

Bake at 350 for 10 minutes, then cool to room temperature while preparing filling.

Here is an intriguing idea for a chocolate crumb piecrust from Nestle.

Chocolate Crust:

Preheat oven to 350. Combine 1 cup graham cracker crumbs, ⅓ cup Nestle Toll House Baking Cocoa and ¼ cup granulated sugar in a 9-inch pie pan. Stir in ⅓ cup melted butter until all ingredients are moistened; press onto bottom and up sides of pie plate. Bake for 8 to 10 minutes. Sprinkle ½ cup morsels over bottom of hot crust; let stand for 10 minutes or until all morsels are shiny. Spread chocolate over bottom and up sides of crust. Cool to room temperature.

And if you don't want to use shortening or butter, use vegetable oil.

Vegetable Oil 9-Inch Pie Crust:

1⅓ cups all-purpose flour, sifted
⅓ cup vegetable oil
½ tsp. salt
2 tbsp. cold water

Mix flour, oil and salt until uniform. Sprinkle with water, 1 spoonful at a time, tossing with fork until all water is absorbed. Form into ball and chill until needed. Bake according to pie directions, or if a baked crust is required, bake in a preheated 475 oven for 10-12 minutes. Cool before filling.

Traditional meals for the Holiday

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Where would Chanukah be without eight days of finger-lickin' latkes! Few can resist these hot-from-the-frying-pan delicacies served with the traditional applesauce or sour cream or both!

And those of you with Israeli connections know that Chanukah is soufganiot time! (These are also known as jelly doughnuts.) Fried foods commemorate the Chanukah miracle of the oil that lasted eight days, and the Hasmoneans' victory over the Greeks.

Few people can resist latkes, and you can be assured of meeting them at your Chanukah parties. Not everyone is aware of the Chanukah custom to eat dairy products and cheese, however. This custom stems from the heroism of Yehudit, of the Hasmonean family. Yehudit went to the tent of the leader of the Syrian Greek forces. While she was with him, Yehudit fed him cheese so that he would become thirsty. She then quenched his thirst with copious amounts of wine. When he fell asleep, she took his sword and beheaded him.

She then carried his head back to Jerusalem and displayed it, so that the enemy troops would become demoralized. Her plan worked, and the troops retreated.

To celebrate God's miracles and our victory, here are two new dairy recipes to try, as well as an easy solution for those of us who are latkes-challenged: choose one or more – they burn, they come out raw, too greasy or too dry, or they fall apart.

CHANUKAH NOODLE KUGEL

1 1-lb. package wide egg noodles
2 tbsp.butter or margarine
3 eggs
¼ cup sour cream, yogurt or leben
8 oz cream cheese (regular or reduced fat)
1 tsp. vanilla
1½ tsp. ground cinnamon
½ tsp. salt
½ cup golden raisins
½ cup apricot or strawberry preserves
¼ cup chopped walnuts

For topping:
¼ cup packed brown sugar
¼ cup crushed cornflakes

Preheat oven to 375. Lightly grease a 9 x 13 x 2-inch baking pan.

Cook noodles in boiling, salted water until half done. Drain very well. Toss with butter or margarine. Set aside.

Combine eggs, sour cream, cream cheese, vanilla, cinnamon, salt and raisins in a blender or food processor. Mix very well with noodles. Place half of noodle mixture into prepared baking dish. Top with preserves, spreading gently. Sprinkle with walnuts. Pour remainder of noodle mixture into pan. Top with mixture of brown sugar and crushed cornflakes. Bake for 45 minutes. Yield: 8-10 side-dish servings.

ZUCCHINI LATKES

Latkes may be prepared out of other things besides potatoes!

2 lb. zucchini
1 medium potato
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 cup finely chopped scallions
½ cup grated mild yellow cheese
1 egg, slightly beaten
1 cup flour
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
1 tsp. garlic powder
1 tsp. sugar
oil as needed

Peel zucchini, if necessary; peel potato. Grate finely. Place in a colander and rinse with running water. Drain very well and squeeze out excess water with your hands.

Toss vegetable mixture with lemon juice, scallions, yellow cheese and egg. Stir together flour, salt, pepper, garlic powder and sugar. Combine well with vegetable mixture.

Heat ¼ inch of oil in a large skillet. Drop mixture a tablespoonful at a time into oil. Fry on both sides until golden brown. Drain well on paper towels. Serve hot. Yield: 10-12 latkes.

ROSTI

Rosti is a Swiss latke which can be cut into individual servings after cooking.
3 lb. potatoes
4-5 tbsp. oil for frying
salt to taste

Scrub potatoes. Peel and grate into thin sticks (on a grater or with grater attachment of food processor). Place in a colander, rinse with cold running water to remove excess starch, drain and squeeze out any remaining water with your hands.

Heat oil over medium-high in a large skillet. Add potatoes, sprinkle with salt and turn several times until well coated with oil. Reduce heat, cover and continue to fry for 20-30 minutes, turning twice. Uncover potatoes, increase heat to medium-high and fry an additional 20 minutes, or until crisp and brown. Serve immediately. Yield: 6 servings.

Marion Kane gets back in kitchen

By ERIN SILVER
Special to the CJN

"I adore cooking and good food and I love writing," says Marion Kane, 55, who is back in the spotlight as a food columnist for the Toronto Star after taking a much needed one-year sabbatical from her job as food editor at the paper.

"Being the food editor was a dream job," she says during a mid-morning interview in her cozy mustard and burgundy-coloured kitchen.

From 1989 to last fall, Kane assigned stories to writers, thought of creative ideas, wrote regular features and weekly columns. She also got to meet and even befriend some of the world's most notable cooks, such as Julia Child, Emeril and Sophia Loren, who came out with an Italian cookbook in 1998.

But putting recipes in the paper can be stressful.

"If the recipe isn't good, I feel I wasted people's time and money and I risk damaging my reputation. I get very nervous about recipes being accurate," she says, noting that as a columnist, she tests recipes 12 times before allowing them to be published.

"I know I get angry when I realize that recipes don't work or are just so-so."

Though Kane loved her job as food editor, some time off was just what this award-winning writer and author of the cookbook, Best of Food, needed to recharge her batteries.

"My dad died in May [2000], and I was feeling tired and stressed," she said. "I needed to get some sleep, spend more time with my daughter, cook at my leisure – which I hadn't had a chance to do in years – and I needed to reflect on what I wanted."

Now her weekly food column appears in the At Home section of the Sunday paper.

"I use my columns to write about anything that happens to me involving food. I write about interesting cooks, and feature interviews with famous chefs."

The best things about having her own column, she says is that she gets to work from home, which helps keep the pace of life slower than it used to be, and the new arrangement is more efficient.

"If I'm writing in my basement office, I can just run upstairs to the kitchen, test a recipe and go back downstairs to finish the column."

Now that Kane is at home more often, she says she has begun to research her family history. As it turns out, her grandmother was a pediatrician, and other female family members were doctors, chemists and archeologists.

Kane's mother was a biologist and a good cook on the side. Her father taught medicine and did medical research in London, England, where Kane and her two younger brothers were raised, although she was born in Montreal, her father's hometown.

It was in England that Kane developed her love of food. On Sundays, her father would take her for Indian food or smoked meat and the rest of the week, she and her brothers helped their mother prepare meals.

"It was my job to make the vinaigrette for the salad and help set and clear the table," Kane recalls.

"That's why I make such good salad dressings today."

Kane moved back to Canada in 1965 and eventually settled in the Kensington Market area in downtown Toronto, a part of town she loves because she can buy fresh ingredients just steps from her home.

Her first daughter, Esther, was born in 1971, and throughout the 1970s, Kane made money by baking pies and selling them to restaurants.

But with a degree in languages, she decided to earn her bachelor of education and taught English as a second language before she discovered a penchant for food writing.

Kane was a freelance food writer from 1976 to 1983 and wrote restaurant reviews for Toronto Life magazine and its gourmet guide – her first foray into the industry.

"I had no formal training in journalism and it turned out to be my forte."

She landed a job as the Toronto Sun's food editor in 1983 and stayed on until the Star hired her in 1989, by which time she had given birth to her second daughter, Ruth, now 13.

Kane says she it's her goal to get more people interested in cooking, which she acknowledges has become "a dying art" as a result of the fast pace of North American life.

"I want to write another cookbook," she says, adding that if she's going to get people back into the kitchen, she has to induce them with "straightforward, simple dishes – no fusion cooking or pretentious recipes."

She says she has an idea for a top-secret food book she plans to start writing soon. The only thing she's willing to divulge is that the book will be "very personal."

ROASTED BALSAMIC POTATOES

A delectable, easy way to cook Kane's favourite vegetable — the lowly spud. This works best with those small red potatoes that are best cooked in their skins. The trick is that secret ingredient no kitchen should be without: balsamic vinegar.

- 1½ lbs. small red potatoes, scrubbed and quartered
- 2 onions, peeled leaving root end intact, cut in wedges
- 2 tbsp. olive oil
- ¼ cup balsamic vinegar
- 1 tbsp. chopped fresh thyme, or ½ tsp. dried
- ½ tsp. salt
- ¼ tsp. freshly ground black pepper

In 13 inch by 9 inch baking dish, combine potatoes, onions and oil. Cover and bake in preheated 400 oven 30 minutes.

Add balsamic vinegar, thyme, salt and pepper, stirring to coat potatoes well. Increase oven temperature to 450.

Bake, uncovered, 30 to 40 minutes, stirring twice, until liquid has evaporated and potatoes are crisp at edges. Makes 4 servings.

École Polytechnique memorial set for Beth Tzedec

TORONTO — A memorial service for the 14 women murdered at l'École Polytechnique in Montreal in 1989 will be held on Dec. 6 at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

The event, which ran last year for the first time, is co-sponsored by Beth Tzedec, Holy Blossom Temple and the First Narayever Congregation.

The Canadian government declared the date as National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence Against Women in 1991. More than half of Canadian women have been victims of at least one act of physical or sexual violence, according to event organizers.

Donna Keystone, the driving force behind the memorial, said she would like to bring awareness to the Jewish community that "within our own community, this kind of thing happens."

Participants will include Rabbis Baruch Frydman-Kohl, Elyse Goldstein, Jason Rosenberg and Ed Elkin; Cantor Tobias Gabriel; and children of the Downtown Jewish Day School.

A former victim of domestic violence will share her story, and Adrienne Rosen of First Narayever and the Wildwomen project will also take part. The Wildwomen project involved a car trip from South America to Toronto to raise money for the December 6 Fund, a volunteer organization that provides interest-free loans to women fleeing domestic abuse.

For further information about the memorial service, contact Beth Tzedec at 416-781-3511, ext. 34.

CHILDREN'S BOOK WEEK: Leo Baeck Day School recently took part in a week long celebration of Canadian Children's Book Week. Kathy Kacer, author of The Secret of Gabi's Dresser, among other books, is seen above with Kailey Citron and Hartley Brown. She was one of several authors and illustrators who shared their creative process and excited children about reading and writing.

Russian artifacts on display at Baycrest

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rita Shindel couldn't stop a flood of emotions as she gazed upon a fragile and yellowed document from her youth.

Behind a glass case, covered in Cyrillic script, the pocket-sized paper appears innocuous enough to a casual observer.

To Shindel, however, it represented four years of her life, as a soldier in the Red Army fighting her way from the Volga River to Berlin.

As a young woman, Shindel operated a giant searchlight that cast its beam on German aircraft, allowing anti-aircraft fire to take them down. The document was a passport representing her army service.

The document was part of an exhibit titled, Survival & Freedom: A Tribute to the Russian Jewish Community, which opened last week at the Silverman Heritage Museum at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The display features historical memorabilia about Jewish life in Russia, items from an underground yeshiva, antique samovars, Judaica, and a mock-up of a tiny Soviet apartment from the 1950s.

A prominent part of the display focuses on the Great Patriotic War, the Russian life and death struggle against Nazi invaders.

Standing next to Shindel, Maria Waldman, a native of Tashkent, looked at the same glass case and pointed to a black and white photo of a group of Russian army veterans gathered in Kiev in 1978 to commemorate their victory over Nazism.

A translator in the Soviet forces, Waldman's past still plays a prominent role in her life today. She is a member of the Anti-Nazi Combatants and Martyrs Remembrance Committee.

Nearby is a grouping of Soviet-era service and commemorative medals as well as grainy black and white photos from the war era. Semyon Perlamutrov, who serves as vice-chair of the Association of Anti-Nazi Fighters and Veterans of World War II, points to his service photo as a junior lieutenant in the Soviet artillery. He, his brother Yakov and late father Gregory all fought the Nazis and all three survived the war, he said.

With his grandson looking on, he describes his life in Canada and notes proudly his son is an engineer and his grandson an emergency room doctor. "That's everything that I brought to Canada," the Odessa native said.

Tanya Korol's contribution to the display was a vintage photograph of her parents, Alexander and Maria, as well as handwritten letters home from the front from her father to her mother.

Her father was a doctor in the Soviet army and her mother a nurse. They met in Voronich during the war and she was born only two months before her father was killed in action in January 1945.

Rita Slutsky, who immigrated to Canada in 1948, contributed her late step-mother's framed dentistry certificate that she carried with her to Siberia during the war to prove she was indeed a Russian national. Her step-mother, she recounted, was killed by Germans in Novogrudek.

Also part of the display are prayer books and photographs from Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman's youth, when he studied at a secret yeshiva that was banned by Soviet authorities. "The exhibit shows the contrast between what we had to hide and [life] here in a free country," he said.

Museum co-ordinator Pat Dickinson said the exhibit recognizes that Russian Jews are playing an increasingly important role in Toronto and that there are "significant numbers" of Russians in the Baycrest Centre. Many participate in the centre's ambulatory day programs, she said.

Working through its contacts in the Russian community, the museum gathered artifacts dating back to the 19th century, including samovars and a unique brass menorah with a sliding top that was specially made for a Russian immigrant to safely use on board a ship.

The exhibit, which runs to the end of May, was made possible through a gift from Marty and Susan Goldberg in honour of Lois Buckstein and Rabbi Zaltzman. For more information or to arrange group tours, contact Dickinson at 416-785-2500 ext. 2802.

Rebbitzen Judy Taub gave to community

By EVELYNE KESLASSY

If you weren't one of the 3,000 attendees at Rebbitzen Judy Taub's funeral earlier this month, you probably read about it: the regal two-hour tribute, the outpouring of emotion and love and the enormous loss to the community. The filled-to-capacity shivah was equally indicative of this admiration, this closeness to a woman of accomplishment who gave on many levels to the Jewish world.

Guest Voice

I was struck by the meaning of such a tribute, such a deep connection from so many to a woman who earned herself, with no intention of course, a mark of distinction in a very complicated religious world. Not because of her position in the public eye, but rather because of her intense work in contributing to others' fulfillment and growth, Judy Taub earned her place in people's lives and hearts in the way we are called upon to earn our eternity: with real, honest giving. A person cannot be so widely loved and so largely missed, far beyond good friends and family, without having made a significant contribution.

Rebbetzin Taub kept her halachot like most religious Jews, but this was not what we heard about that Sunday in the sanctuary of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto, where the aura of her neshamah filled us all. The outpouring of words by her three rabbi sons, Shimon, Shmuel and Moishe, and other notable rabbanim, all focussed on her magnanimous hachnasat orchim (hospitality), her chesed (kindness) and the emphasis in her life on kiruv (Jewish outreach).

One of her greatest fortes was teaching taharat hamishpachah (the laws of family purity) to countless woman like myself who knew nothing of the mitzvah, and who benefited so much from her generosity in this area. As her son Shimon said in his eulogy, "On Friday nights and yom tov she wanted to be in charge of the mikvah. She didn't want to disturb anybody else to have to leave her Shabbos table to go take care of the mikvah. She wanted to do it herself and give chizuk to those who went on those nights." Indeed, on the last morning of the shivah, I heard one woman say how much she loved going on Friday nights because the rebbitzen looked after her.

Judy Taub

Her youngest son Moishe continued on this theme. "There are people who consciously make the decision to do a chesed – 'I'm going to do the right thing' – but there are other people like my mother whose true nature is this way. In the hospital, the nurses would come in to wake her up 'Mrs. Taub, have some lunch.' Her first reaction would be, still half asleep, 'Did you eat lunch?' She wasn't thinking when she said this. It was a reflex."

It may have been in her nature, but the rebbitzen worked on this reflex her whole life. Nothing special comes easily. The Shabbat table that was usually full with guests, she prepared. The pressures she took on in order that her husband, Rabbi Taub, should learn and build a community, she took on with pleasure.

I learned from the rebbitzen's life what it truly means to take one's gifts and draw on them for good. She used all her strengths for the sake of a higher purpose. "Her perception and understanding gave all those around her the ability to grow in what is important in life," remarked her son Shimon. "Her easygoing approach, the way she reached out to people, was so unique... she loved it and she loved what she was doing," Shmuel said.

Her youngest son Moishe recalled the many people she had turned on to Judaism, especially in New York over a cup of coffee, "always happy, always in good cheer. Who could forget her smile?" She used all her talents to this end.

As Rabbi Yochanan Zweig, rosh yeshiva of Talmudic University of Florida in Miami Beach and a good friend of the Taubs, commented, the genius in her aptitude for Jewish outreach was in her completely non-judgmental approach. "She accepted everybody for what they were, she understood where people were coming from. Nobody ever, ever felt she was doing them a favour with her chesed." On the contrary, Rabbi Zweig said, the rebbitzen herself was energized by the giving and always running around to help. She did it "with the wisdom and the understanding of meaning and truth," he said. "That empowered her, and she did it, and she ran, and it was always with a smile."

I remember the running, and the energy and the smile. Rebbitzen Taub was my neighbour. Very often as my car backed out of my driveway, I'd cross hers. She'd usually be scurrying with an inordinate number of shopping bags. I couldn't imagine how much company she was having. But no matter how rushed she was, she would always stop – with sincere happiness – to talk with me. This was her impact.

As Rabbi Sheftel Neuberger, menahel of Yeshivas Ner Yisrael of Baltimore, put it: "She connected with everyone. It was the essence of her being. We have lost a part of ourselves because everyone felt a kesher to her."

Pre-teen violinist chooses Shabbat over Carnegie Hall

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Twelve-year-old Ben Sanders recently faced a decision that for him wasn't anything particularly special. It was all a matter of priorities.

The talented violinist, who has been playing since he was three, was given an opportunity that few get – to play at New York's Carnegie Hall.

Ben said he was "very happy. I knew how important it was."

The only problem was that the concert was scheduled for a Saturday, and Ben and his family are shomer Shabbat.

Although he confesses he was disappointed, "I just accepted it," he said.

When Rabbi Aron Hoch, spiritual leader of the Village Shul, heard about it, he called the decision a kiddush HaShem – a sanctification of God's name. And when Zale Newman, a stalwart of Toronto's Jewish music scene, heard about it, he asked Ben to play at the annual NCSY concert, to be held Dec. 3 at Roy Thomson Hall.

Ben spoke to The CJN at his home during the filming of a video to be shown at the concert.

He started playing the violin when a number of musicians playing different instruments, came to his preschool. "My mother asked me which instrument I would like to play, and I said the violin," he said.

His mother, who plays the piano, is a firm believer in music lessons for children, saying that it builds self-esteem, and helps develop both social and academic skills.

Four of the family's five children also play instruments – three play the violin and one plays the cello.

Ben Sanders

Ben, like his brother and sisters, studies by the Suzuki method, which initially teaches children to play by listening and watching and only later teaches them to sight-read music.

It also presupposes that every child has the potential to play an instrument, provided they are exposed to it and their environment and parents are supportive.

This is certainly the case in the Sanders family, where their mother takes them to lessons and practises diligently with them at home.

Ben, a grade 7 student at Eitz Chaim, said he practises about 12 hours a week. The rest of the time, he said, "When I'm not playing the violin, I'm doing homework. When I'm not doing homework, I watch TV."

He also likes in-line skating, basketball and surfing the Internet.

Ben especially likes music by Bach, Mozart, and Vivaldi, he said, although he also likes playing Jewish music.

While his friends think his playing is "cool," and he finds it "fun" and something he wouldn't stop doing, Ben said he doesn't think he would play professionally when he grows up.

The 21st annual NCSY Festival of Lights Concert will also feature popular Jewish music star Avraham Fried, accompanied by the Toronto Kol Chaverim Choir, as well as Yaakov Shweke and the Nafshenu Orchestra.

For more information, call NCSY at 905-761-6279.

Vaughan sign blitz

or religious groups," explains Vaughan's Ward 5 councillor, Susan Kadis. "We have to distinguish between illegal commercial signage and those used by religious groups."

Kadis said that extending the crackdown from commercial signs to those at synagogues and Jewish buildings was the result of "some type of misunderstanding."

She said the reprieve was issued to give the city time to reconsider. "I'm confident we'll find a way to accommodate religious institutions. In some ways, this is positive because it could put an exemption in place."

Vaughan's bylaw is intended to curb illegal signs and "eyesores," Kadis said, adding it's her understanding that the city can enforce the law even on private property.

Vaughan issued the same order to Jewish organizations two years ago, but nothing came of it. Institutions that received the notices this time included Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, Aish HaTorah, Associated Hebrew Day School, Reena, the Joseph and Faye Tanenbaum Residential Centre, Leo Baeck Day School and Netivot HaTorah.

But the Ontario region of CJC believes most synagogues and Jewish facilities in Vaughan received the citations.

Bernie Farber, the region's executive director, says he knows of no other religious groups that received the notices.

"We can't be certain, but there was the appearance that Jewish institutions were visited almost exclusively," Farber said.

For CJC Ontario region chair Ed Morgan, a law professor, Vaughan's short-lived move presents a clash between freedom of expression and the right of governments to enforce laws.

The signs in question "present both a fundraising pitch and a political message," Morgan feels. He cited a 1995 Supreme Court of Canada ruling which found that the City of Peterborough could not remove electoral signs from private lawns.

The UJA, Bonds and JNF signs are "close enough to protected speech that there would be a pretty good challenge [to Vaughan] if we went ahead."

Beth Radom welcomes new rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Steven Schonblum may be the only rabbi in town who floods his backyard every winter to make an old-fashioned skating rink – and invites congregants for an evening of skating and hot chocolate.

He began the tradition as ritual director of Pride of Israel Synagogue, where he served for 15 years before earning his smichah last April.

In August, the 40-year-old father of three became spiritual leader of the 350-family Beth Radom Congregation, replacing Rabbi (and Cantor) David Bagley, who retired due to ill health. York University student Rudy Bromberg now serves as the congregation's chazzan.

Rabbi Steven Schonblum

Beth Radom, like Pride of Israel, is unaffiliated but traditional Conservative in practice. (Beth Radom used to be affiliated with the Conservative movement's umbrella, United Synagogue.)

The late Rabbi Harold Lerner, former spiritual leader of Pride of Israel, encouraged his then ritual director to consider a career in the rabbinate.

Rabbi Schonblum studied for a decade in a program run by Tifereth Yisrael Rabbinical Yeshiva in Long Island, N.Y. for people already involved in a career and possibly living at a distance. Most of his studying was done in Toronto, much of it with a chevruta partner.

Coincidentally, he was able to gain practical experience as a ritual director, and served, in effect, as acting spiritual leader on three occasions – giving sermons and presiding at life cycle events – when the congregation was between rabbis.

Despite the long haul, Rabbi Schonblum is glad he waited to get his smichah. "At the age I am, I feel I have the maturity and experience. I'm more comfortable now. There's something to be said for taking your time."

He particularly enjoys the interaction with people, he said.

Originally trained as a respiratory therapist, Rabbi Schonblum realized within a year that wasn't the career for him. He spent a few years working in his family's retail business before finding a career in synagogue life.

In his spare time, he enjoys woodworking, and his children play on a 1,000-square-foot jungle gym that he constructed.

Rabbi Schonblum, a graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, grew up at Clanton Park Synagogue and still studies daf yomi there on a regular basis.

He made his first foray into the Jewish career world as a high school student, when he served as a bar mitzvah teacher at the now-defunct weekly North York Community Hebrew School.

He said he wants children to feel that the shul is their second home (he noted that youngsters are welcome on the bimah during Shabbat and that little ones can attend story hour downstairs), and he also hopes to increase Beth Radom's membership.

Computer hook-ups to connect to other congregations with the name Beth Radom, as well as other synagogues, are in the works, he said.

Among his early initiatives are Hebrew reading classes and a father-son tallit and tfillin club, which includes a round of ball hockey after davening.

The skating parties at his home are generally held on Saturday nights, preceded by Minchah services. It's another way to get people to come to shul, he said.

Symposium explores stolen Holocaust-era art

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the Canadian Museums Association (CMA) recently hosted a groundbreaking symposium on Holocaust-era cultural property.

Over 75 delegates from across Canada, the U.S. and overseas representing public institutions, museums and art galleries, as well as Sotheby's and Christie's, gathered to discuss the issues surrounding identification and restitution of cultural property stolen by the Nazis between 1933 and 1945.

Experts on provenance research and its legal and historical aspects met at the National Gallery of Canada in mid-November.

In his keynote address to open the conference, Neal Sher of the International Commission on Holocaust-era Insurance Claims implored delegates to keep in mind the aims of the process.

"It is important to look at things from a historical and moral perspective," he said. "The objective is to do what is just and fundamentally fair, as difficult as that may be.

"Never can one achieve full justice in any arena involving the Holocaust; it simply is not possible," Sher said. "There will never be perfect justice, but the pursuit of justice, the pursuit of fairness, is in and of itself a worthy and a noble cause."

He urged delegates to remember that "no one, no person, no institution, should reap either profit or benefit to the detriment of the victims."

CJC President Keith Landy praised the CMA for its partnership in organizing the symposium.

"There is no shortage of controversy surrounding the issue of Nazi-looted art, but the CMA did not shrink from their responsibility to deal with this topic in such an effective manner," he said. "It is a demonstration of true leadership."

The results of the deliberations, as well as a plan of action for future consideration, will be compiled and distributed to participants.

Birthright hosts Israeli educators

OTTAWA — A delegation of six Israeli educators recently spent two weeks in Canada on behalf of the Birthright Israel program.

The six, all of whom had worked with Birthright groups in Israel, visited a number of Canadian cities where they initiated programming to reinforce the Israeli experience of Birthright participants.

"One of the main objectives of the Birthright Israel program is to have the young people who go on the program become involved in their local communities afterwards and to provide them with follow-up programming," said Adam Minsky, director of Israel and overseas programs for UIA Federations Canada.

While in Canada, the educators split up and visited Toronto, Ottawa; Winnipeg; Calgary and Vancouver, as well as smaller communities in Ontario. The Ottawa portion of the trip was organized by Birthright Israel local co-ordinator Howie Osterer. The two educators who came to Ottawa visited Yitzhak Rabin High School, Hillel Academy and the University of Ottawa. "They were also very fortunate to be the guests of Canada's deputy prime minister" Osterer said.

The two-week program, which ran to Nov. 5, ended with a retreat at Geneva Park, near Orillia, Ont., for program staff and volunteers from across Canada. During the 3-day training session, the educators worked on leadership skills so Canadian staff will be as prepared as Israelis to lead the trips. – D.K.

Winnipeg Jewish community seeks to expand

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This city's Jewish community, which has been slowly declining for 40 years, has unveiled a new three-pronged strategy community leaders hope will attract new residents and keep Jews in the city.

The plan to increase the city's Jewish population beyond its current 14,000 people was unveiled at a federation meeting last month. At that time the federation board approved $118,000 of a projected $168,000 for its first year. The rest of the funding will be sought from government, foundations and other sources.

"We think now...is the time to do something about it and we think that aiming to grow our population to 18,000 by 2010 is doable," says Bob Freedman, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal. "If we don't take a proactive approach, we will continue to slide backwards."

The plan – called Grow Winnipeg – seeks to build on the increasingly successful recruitment of Argentinian Jewish families.

The federation began promoting Winnipeg as a destination for distressed and anxious Argentinian Jewish families five years ago. So far, about 20 families have immigrated here from Argentina and dozens more are waiting to clear immigration.

Grow Winnipeg also calls for stepped-up efforts to attract Jewish immigrants from regions such as South Africa and the former Soviet Union.

But the plan also emphasizes efforts to lure back former Winnipeggers and to encourage younger members of the community to put down roots here by helping them find employment.

Grow Winnipeg will be officially launched in the spring.

At its peak around 1960, Winnipeg's Jews numbered about 19,000. While there was always an outflow, the Jewish community was able to look to new immigrants and, more importantly, large number of Jews from small towns on the Prairies as a source of new members.

But by the mid-1960s, that latter source had all but dried up and the city's Jewish population has since dropped, with a quarter now over 65.

"We are not being Pollyannaish is our expectations. We live in a mobile society. People move for different reasons," says Freedman.

"The reality is that we are a mid-sized centre and there will always be people leaving for larger cities. Still, with the 25-60 cohort shrinking, if we don't try to do something, we will eventually be in a position where we don't have the critical mass to support all our community programs."

Toronto rabbi now in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Congregation Beth-El's new rabbi believes people are looking for spirituality more than ever in these uncertain times.

Rabbi Ronnie Cahana, who was born in Sweden and grew up in Texas, comes to the 50-year-old congregation in the Town of Mount Royal after three years at the Lodzer Centre Congregation in Toronto.

"Judaism is so spiritual," he says. "It teaches that there is spirituality in every aspect of living. I want people to know what a treasure they have."

Religious leaders must be available "to speak about what matters in life, to ask the bigger questions, even to introduce a sense of the magic of life, and to restore a sense of calm," Rabbi Cahana, 47, says.

After graduating from the University of Texas with a degree in philosophy, Rabbi Cahana went to Israel where he worked in development towns as a social worker for a Young Judea leadership course and studied at Ohr Somayach.

In 1985, he received his ordination from the Academy for Jewish Religion in New York.

"I came to realize that being a rabbi is a privilege," he says. "It's a privilege to be involved in people's life-cycle events and to interpret God's presence in their lives."

Rabbi Cahana hopes to make Beth-El's more than 500 members feel they are entering a place of holiness and beauty where they can be close to God.

"We are very vulnerable when we pray," he says. "A community allows that kind of vulnerability because there is a real trust among each other."

Rabbi Cahana spent the first two years of his rabbinate travelling with his wife, Karen Knie-Cahana, through Mexico and South America.

"Along the way we stopped at Jewish communities and asked if they needed my services," he says. "I [came] without knowing Spanish but by the end was able to give sermons in the language."

Since then, Rabbi Cahana has served congregations in Galveston, Tex., Miami Beach, Fla., Vancouver, B.C. and Gothenburg, Sweden. The synagogue he led in Gothenburg, the only shul within a large area, catered to a wide range of customs.

"We had a mechitzah and an organ," he says.

He toured Sarajevo during the war with a Swedish minister and an imam, preaching religious tolerance in a synagogue, mosque and at Orthodox and Catholic churches.

His time at the Lodzer shul in Toronto, whose membership is primarily made up of Holocaust survivors, was especially rewarding, he says, because it deepened his knowledge of that generation.

Rabbi Cahana, who, along with his wife, has five children, aged four to 14, will be officially installed Dec. 1.

Strategic Action Committee plan launched

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Several major Jewish organizations here are mobilizing the Jewish community to counter what they see as extraordinary efforts to undermine Israel's legitimacy.

FEDERATION CJA and the Quebec regions of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC-Q) and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC-Q) have launched an unprecedented action plan to arm the Jewish community with the tools needed.

"In the aftermath of the Sept. 11 tragedy, the already challenging task of explaining the integrity and the current actions of the State of Israel has only increased," says a Strategic Action Committee (SAC) document detailing the plan.

"There's a sense that the Jewish community has not been doing enough of what it should be doing," said federation president Steven Cummings, "that we're not getting across a powerful and potent message."

At the same time, the Palestinians have appeared to be winning the public relations war, he added.

To be in effect from now to the end of the federation's fiscal year next March, the tripartite effort will be based on the work of four SAC subcommittees: for students, synagogues, community liaison and media monitoring/public affairs.

Each will be devoted entirely to advocating for the Jewish State in the Jewish and wider communities.

Special federation funding, the amount of which was not disclosed, has also been allocated for the plan.

Leaders of the three organizations, said last week at a press conference that the SAC plan was extraordinary in scope and was taken as a response to cumulative events dating back to September 2000 that have put "intense pressure" on Israel, including the intifadah, the Durban conference on racism in late August and the Sept. 11 tragedy.

Sept. 11, the SAC document says, resulted in the U.S. government's exerting "intense pressure" on Israel to resolve the conflict with the Palestinian Authority, in an effort to solidify "moderate" Arab support in the international coalition against terrorism.

"The fact that acts of Palestinian terrorism have not abated since Sept. 11 has failed to elicit – in Canada, Europe or America – meaningful recognition of Israel's right to defend itself," the document says.

"Consequently, the job of explaining Israel's legitimacy to the larger world is now more crucial than ever."

The students' committee will be given the highest priority. Its work will include organizing a weekend retreat, arranging campus-based Israel Days at three CEGEPs and three universities, planning rallies, and using "student-friendly" materials, Web sites and newspaper ads to reach "less affiliated" and non-Jewish students.

"This is doubly important," the SAC documents says, "in light of constant and aggressive Palestinian student activity."

The synagogue committee's work will include developing a rapid response team to deal with media coverage; organizing a teach-in at synagogues, planned for Jan. 22, 2002; and preparing timely correspondence to government officials.

The community liaison committee will work on simultaneous teach-ins at Jewish schools and other Jewish institutions across the Jewish community, as part of a one-day "blitz."

The teach-ins of both committees "will offer a clear and focused and brief message on the basic right of Israel to exist, explain its need for security and rebuff falsehoods about its history and current policies."

The community liaison committee will also provide senior leadership briefings and outreach to other religious and ethnocultural communities.

The activities of the media monitoring/public affairs committee will include preparation of a speakers' bureau, arranging leadership news conferences and briefings and the publication of an Israeli action guide.

The SAC also plans to hire a temporary staff to work on the teach-in project and guide.

Those attending the meeting with the media included Cummings, federation executive vice-president Danyael Cantor, CJC-Q president Joseph Gabay and CIC-Q chair Thomas Hecht.

"This can no longer be the affair of the CIC-Q, CJC or federation," Gabay said, "but of everybody."

Hecht said the "number of synergies" related to the plan also augurs well.

"We want to have an engaged community in the media struggle of deciding whether Israel is the victim or 'victimizer,'" he said. "Jewish history cannot be made into a myth."

Cummings said the plan presented is short term, as its funding runs only until the end of the federation's fiscal year. But a longer-term plan with attached funding is expected for the 2002-2003 year.

The plan grew out of Jewish community activities dating back to the start of the intifadah, he added.

In October 2000, he said, a crisis committee met on an ad hoc basis to develop a community response to the intifadah. This led to more regular, bi-weekly meetings and to the formation of the SAC and a "summit meeting" Oct. 30 that put the SAC plan into place.

Cummings said he was pleased with the "content, depth and reach" of the plan.

Those involved with the SAC were optimistic that the activities of the plan would serve as important "building blocks" for future community action, he said.

"In the post-Durban environment," he said, "the basic legitimacy of the Jewish nation and the legitimacy of the Jewish people have been called into question. And it's all been ratcheted up by our enemies.

"Since Sept. 11, some people have been saying that 'if there were no Israel, there would be no problem.'

"That's why we felt there was a compelling reason to do more than we've been doing."

And the Darkness was Swept Away

An old rabbi was asked by his students, how do we banish darkness from the world? The rabbi answered, "Go into the cellar of the shul and beat the darkness with sticks." But that did not work. "Then yell at the darkness." This too failed. "So curse the darkness!" This also proved fruitless. "Then light a candle,' he said quietly. And behold the darkness was swept away.

Interfaith conference draws over 80 participants

By JENNIFER PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

BRAMPTON, Ont. — The Brampton Multifaith Council's recent Unity in Diversity conference drew more than 80 participants, including clergy from nine Christian denominations and Islam.

They all wore badges identifying themselves by name and with a symbol of their faith: a cross, a crescent, or a Star of David. But during a keynote speech delivered by Richard Landau, executive producer of balanced programming for Crossroads Television (CTS), there were only two wearing Stars of David.

Landau said that left many participants wondering why more Jews weren't at the conference.

After being burned by past experiences, he said, Jews typically limit interfaith exchanges to one-on-one encounters with specific faiths – such as Jewish-Christian or Jewish-Muslim exchanges, or programs run by Jewish organizations like B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, rather than venturing into arenas where diversity itself is on the agenda.

Historically, interfaith groups including Jews have usually either degenerated into what Landau calls "a let's bash Israel party" or "there are people trawling for converts; people are going to target you, say 'There's a Jew' and 'Let's get that Jew'... so why would you want to get involved?"

But he remains optimistic, and said he is working to right past wrongs in his role with CTS.

CTS's original application to be an all-Christian broadcaster was rejected by the CRTC in 1996. It was later granted a licence on the condition that it provide 20 hours a week of "balance programming," including 12 hours during prime time.

In his address, Landau said the public misjudges religions based on sensationalized news reports. To illustrate the point, he asked rhetorically what non-Muslim participants knew about Islam before Sept. 11.

He said the goal of interfaith groups such as the Brampton Multifaith Council is to see other faiths at their best, rather than judging them at their worst.

Landau used the analogy of a car broken down on the highway. When someone stops to help you, he asked, "do you ask what religion they are, before accepting their help?"

Interfaith dialogue, with its aim of mending rifts between groups within our diverse society, must go beyond looking at labels to "looking at how [people] live their lives," he said.

Sept. 11 has increased the need for good interfaith dialogue towards shared goals, Landau said.

Even before, Landau said he had noticed "a real hunger for public prayer... for genuine spiritual devotion," but now "things have accelerated" and he sees a real "opportunity for people of faith to heal one another."

Jews in particular, Landau said, stand to benefit from interfaith encounters, "as long as... the forum is fair."

His said his role at CTS, through such things as his weekly interfaith newscast and his Israel Today program, is to offer that forum, bringing together good people of all religions to share their unique beliefs.

Landau outlined a plan of action for conference attendees, practical points to inspire interfaith programs in their own communities.

Rather than just dialogue, he said, groups must take on large tasks in their communities, such as meaningfully executed peace garden projects, as well as small ones, like working with local school boards.

Interfaith work – however insignificant it may seem – can change the world, Landau said. "Some tasks may be thankless, but we do them because they are holy things to do."

Landau concluded his speech with a challenge to participants and their faith communities. Although he said he can't promise an entire program, he vowed to dedicate one or two eight-minute segments to any worthwhile faith groups (he doesn't offer airtime to "messianic" Jews, for instance) willing to discuss their activities on the air.

The Bloc's Jewish bipolarity

Historically, Jewish relations with the forces of extreme nationalism have always been uneasy and, at various times, Quebec nationalism has revealed disquieting anti-Semitic tendencies. One would therefore expect that Quebec nationalism's proxy in federal politics – itself a paradox worthy of lengthy study – the Bloc Quebecois, would not be a likely source of support for Jewish concerns.

However, like their senior partners in the "sovereignty project," the Parti Quebecois, the Bloc caucus is home to some of the most supportive MPs on the hill. In Quebec, Parti Quebecois governments, both past and present, have been substantially more generous and supportive of Jewish education, for example, than any Liberal government over the past 40 years. In Ottawa, some Bloc MPs – including some of the most influential within the party – are counted among the closest allies of the pro-Israel community.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Conversely, the Bloc is also home to a handful of the most outspoken critics of Israel, individuals who, not coincidentally, would prefer to see a "pur laine" francophone population in la belle province. How can we make sense of this?

Perhaps an important clue rests in an examination of what common traits are to be found in the friendly Bloc MPs that set them apart from their less friendly caucus colleagues. In fact, such an examination reveals a startling dichotomy within the nationalist movement in general.

A close inspection exposes two nationalist types within the Bloc. The first represents the old-time, "fought-in-the-trenches" separatists. These are the Quebec union activists whose political identities were formed during the Quiet Revolution. In their worldview, there is little room for consideration of others or their needs. "Either you are with us in our quest, or your are against us." Jews, identified for the most part as opposed to Quebec sovereignty, do not merit support or consideration.

But the second type within the Bloc – equally as passionate regarding Quebec nationalism – is anchored in an entirely different era. This group is younger and grew up in a Quebec where the francophone population had already achieved primacy – in language, political power and social standing. For them, the struggle for independence is not an existential enterprise so much as a logical means to protect the gains made over the last few decades. Not only are they not threatened by the presence of minorities, they see in minorities a validation of their cause.

The greatest irony here is that there is a parallel within the Jewish community. There still exists a component of Jewish leadership in Quebec that eschews any interaction with the separatists. However, a younger, more progressive leadership has emerged that has fostered relationships with the likes of Gilles Duceppe and Yvan Loubier.

Quebec's Jewish community should be grateful that they have!

Tension at York University being addressed

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Recent pro-Palestinian and anti-Israel articles in York University's Atkinsonian newspaper have "not helped" the atmosphere in the halls and classrooms on that campus, according to Shayna Allen, director of the Centre for Jewish Campus Life at York University (JSF).

Anti-Semitic and anti-Israel comments have been made to Jewish students by their non-Jewish peers, and anti-Semitic graffiti has appeared in an elevator, said Nikki Greenspan, JSF president. Some students don't feel comfortable wearing a Magen David or a kippah, she said.

In the past, York's campus has been "very welcoming," said Greenspan, a third-year student. Recently, however, it's become "a little tense" for anyone seen to be a visible adherent of a religion, she added.

She believes the comments result from ignorance, and tries to educate others when the opportunity presents itself. In January, to that end, she will join students from other religious groups at an interfaith council table.

A JSF delegation consisting of Allen, three of her colleagues, Greenspan and one other student met with Stephen Kerr, editor of the Atkinsonian, and two of the paper's writers last week to discuss the implications of articles that appeared in the October issue.

The JSF took particular exception to a photograph of three haredi rabbis wearing shtreimls and holding anti-Zionist signs. An article by Angela Aujla, who attended the UN World Conference Against Racism that took place in Durban, states that "Chassidic Jewish rabbis were among [the Palestinians'] most noticeable supporters, wearing placards which read 'Authentic Rabbis have always opposed Zionism and the State of Israel.'"

Those particular rabbis happen to represent a very small sect of Judaism, noted Allen. "I said that that is poor reporting. They need to get their facts straight. They are swaying their readers to believe what they believe."

"If [representatives of the Atkinsonian] say they're an organization that helps people society deems as in conflict, they need to recognize the Jewish students on this campus are having problems," Allen told The CJN.

"Being Jewish is a bit of a problem on campus. People do associate us with what is happening in the Middle East [and see] Jews as being the cause of the problems in the Middle East."

At the meeting, the JSF agreed to stop circulating a petition to shut down the paper. In return, the paper will interview both Jewish and Muslim students for future articles, said Allen.

Atkinsonian editor-in-chief Stephen Kerr was not reachable before this paper's deadline; however, according to an article in the Nov. 21 Excalibur (also a York University newspaper) he said that the Atkinsonian is an anti-racist newspaper. "We're against anti-Semitism. We're against racism. The state is not the same thing as the people," he was quoted as saying.

Although the meeting was "reasonably cordial," there were certain points – among them, whether Jewish students should even associate themselves with Israel – on which JSF and the Atkinsonian would never meet, said Allen.

"They only thing I'm really disappointed about was that they do not understand that Jewish people relate themselves to the State of Israel, and they feel strongly that we shouldnt.'"

Jewish students were also distressed about an "anti-racism" rally Nov. 8 during which posters and pictures offensive to Jews and Israel were distributed, said Allen.

"While we agree with messages such as Stop the Killing, the images that informed this were very selective," said Len Rudner, director of community relations, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, who met with the JSF about their concerns.

The JSF has followed up with the university's office of student affairs, and a complaint has been filed by a student.

At the request of students, the JSF has inaugurated an advocacy group, which now has 25 members to write articles, work on posters and staff tables two to three times a week to hand out literature about the JSF and Israel in a high-traffic area.

York University is not Concordia University, stressed Rudner, referring to controversy over extreme pro-Palestinian, anti-Israel activity on that campus. However, he added, the situation in Montreal "weighs on people's minds. People now have an image in their head of how a bad situation can get worse if not properly managed."

Birthright inspires twins to plan BGU fund-raiser

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — York University students Hannah and Rebecca Wortzman have never planned a party for more than about a dozen people, but they're now organizing a fund-raiser for up to 800 that they hope will raise between $8,000 and $10,000.

Hannah, left, and Rebecca Wortzman are excited about the upcoming BGU fund-raiser they are planning. [Frances Kraft photo]

The event, being billed as Mayim (Hebrew for water), will be held at Inside Nightclub & Lounge, 218 Richmond St. W., on Dec. 16, from 10 p.m. Tickets are $10 in advance, $15 at the door. There will be dancing, as well as a separate lounge where people can talk. Funds raised will support water research at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

The 22-year-old twin sisters were inspired to do something to help Israel after returning from Birthright Israel trips earlier this year (Rebecca in January; Hannah in June). The 10-day trips are free to young Jewish adults, age 18 to 26, who have never been on an educational trip to Israel.

For Rebecca, Birthright Israel played a major role in her decision to enter York's Jewish Teacher Education Program instead of becoming an art teacher. Her artistic eye is evident in the photo she took at Ein Gedi, which appears on the Mayim flyer.

Hannah is in the same program, a year ahead of her sister. Both are alumnae of Or Haemet Sephardic School and Vaughan Secondary School.

Hannah followed up her Birthright trip with a visit to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, to find opportunities to help Israel as a volunteer.

Coincidentally, Janice Freedman, executive director, Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University, Ontario region, had just sent the Federation a letter seeking volunteers for the New Ben-Gurion Associates, the organization's young leadership division.

The letter read in part, "Commitment to supporting Israel, BGU's growing student body of over 15,500 students, faculty and research is all that is required."

It sounded like just what Hannah was looking for. There was an added appeal, too, because Hannah and Rebecca had worked on a kibbutz in the Negev in 1997.

Their guide on the Birthright trips (by coincidence, the same one for both of them) "made it clear that not enough attention was paid to water research because of the political situation in Israel [taking precedence]," said Hannah.

Some of the BGU water research has to do with reusing and purifying water for agricultural or other purposes, she said.

The research will help alleviate hunger and malnutrition in desert areas around the world, Freedman told The CJN.

Speaking for the university, she said she was "more than thrilled" by the new exposure the university has to students, noting that BGU has an overseas students program.

When Hannah attended her first New Associates committee meeting, she realized – and said – that for university students to support or attend fund-raising events, tickets would have to be priced much lower than they were for BGU's most recent fund-raiser (a gala screening of Simcha Jacobovici's The Struma), which also raised money for water research.

Next thing she knew, she and Rebecca (now the nucleus of a new, university chapter of the New Associates) were planning a fund-raiser.

Although they had no experience, they did have some contacts – a disc jockey and promoter who was also a Birthright madrich (leader), and a friend's brother-in-law who is in the printing business, for starters.

They also made new contacts, bringing on board Jewish fraternity AEPi, Jewish sorority Delta Pi, Aish HaTorah, Giving Opportunities (a small student group), Canada Israel Experience and the Jewish student organizations at both York University and the University of Toronto. Neither sister had been involved with York's Jewish Student Federation previously.

They arranged to have most of the services donated, so that the maximum amount possible would go to the university, and they are encouraging people who cannot attend to buy tickets, for tzedakah.

Hannah said she is also spreading the word about Birthright, which she credits for making her into an activist for Israel. "I think everyone should go."

OBITUARY

DONALD BERMAN

He brought joy to thousands of children, young and old, at carnivals, Expo '67 and La Ronde.

On Saturday, November 17, 2001, after a lengthy illness, Donald Berman died peacefully at the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal. He was in his 75th year.

Born in Fort Erie, Manitoba on November 25, 1926, Mr. Berman was only 14 when his father died. He was forced to leave school and started working to support his family. He joined a travelling carnival at age 15, tried his hand at selling dry goods, but soon returned to the carnival and fanfare circuit. A man of energy and vision, he was an early believer in the potential of Montreal's World Fair, Expo '67, and a became a major concessionaire there. The fair was a huge success and Mr. Berman stayed on at La Ronde operating some twenty rides and games there until the mid 1980's.

Mr. Berman was President and C.E.O. of several other companies including Maple Leaf Toys and Donald Berman Enterprises, a major Canadian importer of toys, games, and giftware.

Mr. Berman never forgot the difficult time of his teenage years and was well known for his generosity. At Expo and La Ronde, he regularly sponsored visits by the children from the city's orphanages and poor neighbourhoods. Mr. Berman was a large benefactor to the Jewish General Hospital and numerous children's organizations.

Self-made and self-taught, Mr. Berman served twice as president of the Canadian Chapter of the Showmen's League of America, and was twice chosen by that group as Showman of the Year.

He is survived by his brother Lawrence (Larry) Berman, of Winnipeg. He will be sadly missed by his cousins, many close friends, and colleagues in the carnival and importing industries.

Funeral took place at Paperman & Sons, 3888 Jean Talon St. W. on Tuesday, November 20th, at 10:00 a.m. A graveside service and burial at the Hebrew Sick Benefit Cemetery in Winnipeg on Wednesday November 21st at noon. (204) 582-2353. Shiva at the home of Lawrence Berman, 680 Niagara St., Winnipeg.

In lieu of flowers, donations can be made to the Jewish General Hospital Department of Hematology. (514) 340-8251.

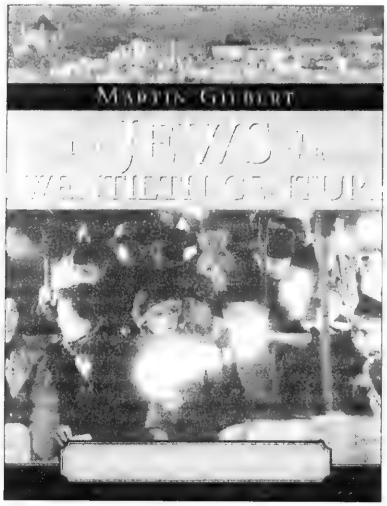
Chanukah Gifts

A history book that focuses on ordinary men and women

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The Jews in the Twentieth Century: An Illustrated History, by Sir Martin Gilbert, is a beguiling marriage of photographs and text. Many of the photographs in this coffee-table volume are rare, and most are so interesting that perusers may first flip through every one of the 376 pages before turning to the balanced history by the distinguished British historian.

Gilbert is the official biographer of Winston Churchill and a foremost chronicler of the Holocaust. As a writer, he seems in full control of the vast sweep of Jewish history, both the tears and the triumphs, in the turbulent century just past.



The photos and text are equally adept at bringing the saga of the Jewish people to life, especially around those two central pillars of destruction and redemption, the Holocaust and the birth of Israel. The photos seem particularly dramatic: for instance, the wonderful 1909 photo of a group of Zionist pioneers on a sand dune north of Jaffa, holding a discussion about the city (Tel Aviv) they planned to build on the spot. The editors are to be commended for their fine choice of visuals, and for treating them as narrative historical documents in their own right.

This is a people's history that focuses on the ordinary men and women as well as on the leaders. It also includes the myriad of brilliantly creative Jewish writers, composers, actors, scientists, judges and other achievers who helped shape the modern era. Although the roughly 500 photographs are all in "glorious" black and white, the story they tell is rich in colour.

The Jews in the Twentieth Century is published by Key Porter Books.

Sampler of Modern Jewish Writing: There is a profusion of worthy Jewish writing of all sorts streaming forth continuously from our vibrant culture: fiction and non-fiction, spiritual and secular, politically left and politically right. How do we acquire a sampling of the many good things that might otherwise pass by unnoticed?

One method is to read Best Contemporary Jewish Writing, a surprisingly inclusive collection edited by Michael Lerner. These 434 pages are packed with a diverse assortment of worthwhile poetry, fiction, memoirs and essays.

Chapters on Israel and the Holocaust include penetrating pieces by Daniel Pipes, Aharon Appelfeld, Jonathan Rosen and others, as well as poetry by Yehuda Amichai. Nathan Englander, Anita Diamant, Marge Piercy, Philip Roth, William Safire, Rebecca Goldstein and Norman Podhoretz are also represented.

Lerner explains that he sought as wide a cross-section of voices as possible. The sole criterion for inclusion was that each writer had to "transcend the cynicism and narcissistic self-indulgence of contemporary culture and contribute to the kabbalistic vision of a world that has been shattered but can be healed."

Some pieces focus on the healing of the self, others on the world; some aim to increase our personal sense of holiness and connectedness to our ancient traditions. There's a ton of good reading in this inviting softcover collection (John Wiley & Sons).

New and Noteworthy

• Harold S. Kushner, whose popular work When Bad Things Happen to Good People recently appeared in a 20th anniversary edition, has come out with a new work, Living A Life That Matters: Resolving the Conflict Between Conscience and Success (Knopf). In doing good for others, we can make a difference in the world and prove that we do in fact matter, Kushner explains.

• The Inextinguishable Symphony, by Martin Goldsmith, is a true story of music and love in Nazi Germany. The author tells the extraordinary story of his parents, members of an all-Jewish orchestra, during the Holocaust era (John Wiley & Sons).

• Literary neurologist Oliver Sacks, who has written fascinatingly about the human brain and consciousness in books like An Anthropologist on Mars and The Man Who Mistook His Wife for a Hat, now turns to explicating his own original mental processes in the autobiographical work Uncle Tungsten (Knopf).

• New in paperback is The Storyteller: Memory, Secrets, Magic and Lies (Anchor). Toronto publisher Anna Porter's award-winning memoir of her family's experiences in her native Hungary. Quit kvetching and shlep over to your bookstore right away

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

You may ask: What is a shlimazl?

A chronically unlucky person. A born loser. A shlimazl never gets it right. When he winds a clock, it stops. When he sells umbrellas, the sun suddenly shines.

Clearly, only a shlimazl believes in mazel.

In case you were wondering, shlimazl is an amalgam of German and Hebrew words: schlimm (bad) from German and mazel (luck) from Hebrew.

Shlimazl comes from Yiddish – a melange of Middle High German and Old German, with smatterings of Old French and Old Italian thrown in, leavened by fragments of Hebrew and eastern European languages such as Polish and Czech.

Informational nuggets like these, served with a dash of wit and a dollop of erudition, are what readers can expect to find in The New Joys of Yiddish (Random House, 2001).

Leo Rosten's beloved classic, originally published in 1968, has been skilfully revised by Lawrence Bush, the editor of Reconstructionism Today.

What is more, the text is now peppered with R.O. Bechman's adorably looney illustrations.

The New Joys of Yiddish, like its mordant forerunner, is thorough, glints with originality, and is pure, unadulterated fun.

When Rosten, a lebn af dayn kop, wrote his lexicon, he was really mapping out the Yiddish genome.

He was trying to show how Yiddish, vital and earthy, had influenced English.

In essence, Rosten's book was an amusing and enlightening examination of words and phrases that have gradually seeped into English.

It was not, as he hastened to point out, a dictionary of or guide to Yiddish.

And, perish the thought, it was not written for experts in, or students of, Yiddish.

In its steady march toward expropriating Yiddishisms, English has snapped up expressive Yiddish words like chutzpah, shlep, kvetch, ganef and shlemiel.

English has also adopted a myriad of Yiddish-tinged phrases, from "You should live so long" to "He knows from nothing."

For all its thoroughness, The Joys of Yiddish was incomplete. Rosten left out Yiddish literature and poetry as well as Yiddish political rhetoric and social criticism.

And, as Bush observes, he ignored most of the non-American strains of Yiddish culture.

In the new edition, which runs to 458 pages, Bush not only remedies these omissions, but also takes note of major changes in the Jewish world.

When Rosten put pen to paper more than 30 years ago, Israel was united by its Six Day War victory and Jewish identity was stirring in the Soviet Union.

In addition, women had not yet been ordained as rabbis, and discriminatory barriers that had kept Jews out of elite circles were just beginning to erode in the United States, the goldene medine.

Faithful to the nuances of Rosten's masterpiece and perennial bestseller, Bush has successfuly brought The Joys of Yiddish up to date.

As Rosten himself might have put it, he's a regular genius.

Tapestries: They're not just for royalty anymore

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

If you're looking for an unusual gift for the discriminating individual, consider a tapestry.

For centuries, only royalty and the very rich could afford the luxury of hangings, rugs, throws and other tapestries.

Not anymore, says Suzanne Benchimol of Le Bouquet, the exclusive Canadian distributor for CSI Creations de France tapestries and chenilles, which are sold worldwide.

Benchimol, who was born and raised in Morocco, came to Canada in 1964. She established Le Bouquet 14 years ago as a company that created floral designs.

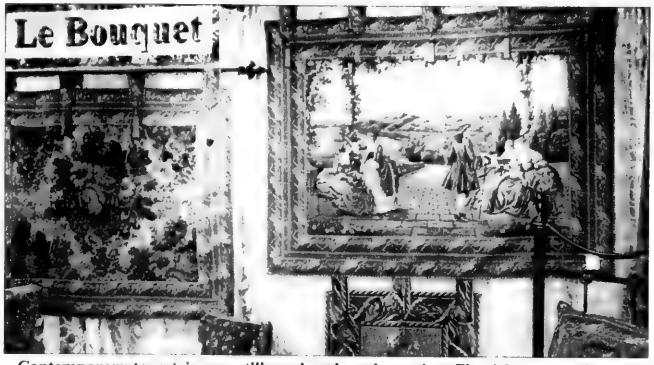
Two years ago her son Eric joined her in Le Bouquet and they established a full line of imported French tapestries and chenilles that symbolize tradition.

"I love the look and warmth of these fabrics," says Benchimol. "We help designers and decorators choose the colours and styles they need to complete their projects. It is the new look for Canadian consumers."

There is a mystique to tapestries, she says. It is an ancient art that can be traced back to before the Middle Ages and many current designs depict historical scenes.

Contemporary tapestries are still produced on the ancient Flemish tapestry looms, which are the key to CSI Creations' success.

"But, today there are also machine-made tapestries manufactured on mechanical looms that can achieve a high-quality reproduction at a fraction of the cost," Benshimol says.



Contemporary tapestries are still produced on the ancient Flemish tapestry looms.

She has more than 200 patterns to choose from – including Victorian, Byzantine, natural flowers, French Versailles, African safari, fruits and fleurs de Provence, the manor, sceneries, and many more.

They can be incorporated into pillows, bell pulls, tablecloths, table runners, benches, throws, bedcovers, wall hangings and other products.

She says the pieces often become treasured family heirlooms.

The tapestries and chenille items are available at high-end stores across Canada.

For more information on where to view or purchase them, call Le Bouquet, 905-660-0512.

Photographer captures the beauty of Israel at night

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"I am drawn towards the horizon and to the stars we meet at the human edge of the cosmos," writes Neil Folberg in his handsome coffee-table book, Celestial Nights: Visions of an Ancient Land (Aperture, 2001).

In this extraordinary volume, Folberg captures exquisite images of Israel – and of the Sinai Peninsula – against the backdrop of an awesome night sky flecked with the eternal spectacle of twinkling stars.

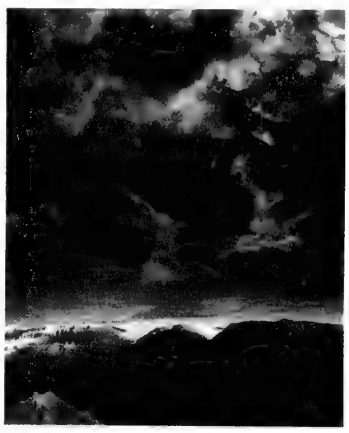
A student of Ansel Adams, Folberg is best known for his colour photography of Middle East and Mediterranean landscapes. Readers may recall his previous works: And I Shall Dwell Among Them: Historic Synagogues of the World (Aperture, 1995) and In A Desert Land (Abbeville Press, 1987).

In Celestial Nights, a compendium of stirring black and white photos, Folberg, a resident of Jerusalem, returns to a region that moves his spirit and heart.

It opens, in dramatic fashion, with a two-page spread of nocturnal heavens.

Having whetted your appetite, Folberg offers up striking photographs of, among other Israeli sights, the Sea of Galilee and Nahal Nativ.

There are also views of the Temple Mount and ancient shuls in Gush Halav and on the Golan Heights.



Clouds hover over the Negev Desert.

The pièce de resistance of this collection is an unimaginably beautiful picture of the Dead Sea, its opaque waters illuminated by a full moon. It takes the breath away.

There are just a few photographs of the Sinai, still a favourite destination of Israeli campers and backpackers since its handover to Egypt.

The finest one is of Wadi Zawatin at first light.

You may ask how Folberg manages to take these technically difficult photographs.

He reveals his secret: he uses infrared and high-speed film in tandem with the time-honoured technique of double exposure.

The formula is prosaic. The result is magical.

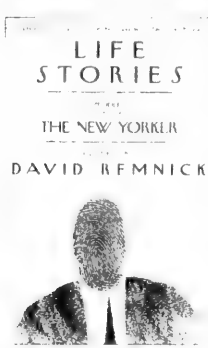
Rich collections for magazine lovers

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The New Yorker or Maclean's magazine: which has perfected the art of the magazine profile?

Magazine lovers will recognize that the question doesn't require an answer. After all, it was The New Yorker that invented, about 1927, the modern, intimate journalistic essay we recognize as a magazine profile. The format quickly gained such a hallowed place in the magazine that it actually tried to trademark the word "profile" in the 1930s.

As a recent paperback edition of Life Stories: Profiles from The New Yorker easily demonstrates, nobody does it better than The New Yorker. However, a recent anthology from Maclean's – Maclean's People: A Gallery of Canadian Greats – offers persuasive evidence that the art of the magazine profile has some worthy practitioners in Canada, too.



An inviting collection edited by David Remnick, Life Stories contains pieces that steadfast New Yorker readers will be glad to revisit. Kenneth Tynan's lengthy and masterful study of Johnny Carson first appeared in 1978: the writing holds up exceptionally well, even if the topicality does not. Ditto for John McPhee's immortal study of a geologist (Travels in Georgia) and Calvin Tomkins's take on Philippe Petit, the man who once held the world's attention by walking a tightrope across the twin towers of the World Trade Center.

Many other treasures await: Lillian Ross on Ernest Hemingway, Truman Capote on Marlon Brando, Nicholas Lemann on George W. Bush, and John Lahr on Roseanne Barr – whom he called "the radical feminist disguised as a faux naif who would become an iconoclast the like of which had never been seen before on TV." Hyperbole? Certainly, but irresistible nonetheless.

Remnick's personal favourite is Mr. Hunter's Grave, an obscure and charming word-portrait from 1956 of an obscure and charming man, George F. Hunter, by an obscure and charming writer, Joseph Mitchell.

That piece is a wonderful reminder of the essential eccentricity and creativity of The New Yorker profile, which often seems to snub our high-falutin' notions of what and who is most deserving of attention. In condescending to focus upon obscure and seemingly commonplace subjects, such pen portraits often elevate themselves into true literature. The country-bumpkin slowness of some of the pieces stands in delicious contrast to the hectic pace of city life.

Wonderfully readable, Life Stories (Modern Library, 2001) should deliver hours of joy to any inveterate reader.

Not surprisingly, Maclean's People: A Gallery of Canadian Greats (edited by Michael Benedict, Viking/Penguin, 2001) is much more structured. It sequentially offers essays on political leaders, sports heroes, tycoons, entertainers, artists and writers. Only in the last category – "rogues, royals, heroes and heroines" – does it seem to allow a touch of genuine creative quirkiness to creep in.

That's not to deny that many of the pieces are very good. Who can resist Mordecai Richler on Mordecai Richler, or Robert Fulford on Lester Pearson, or Judith Krantz's early profile of Norman Jewison? Krantz later became a best-selling novelist; pity is, she caught Jewison at an equally incipient phase of his career. In journalism, as in life, timing is everything; and Maclean's spotlight does not always land upon its subject at the most propitious moment.

Many of the recent pieces are written in the newsmagazine's colourful, adjective-heavy house style. In most cases, the subject matter carries the day.

The book delivers enticing introductory portraits of Queen Elizabeth II (1953) by Pierre Berton, Margaret Trudeau (1974) by June Callwood, and Princess Di (1981) by Carol Kennedy.

Pieces on historic figures like Nellie McClung, Billy Bishop and the Dionne quints are neatly counterbalanced with more recent figures like Margaret Atwood, Conrad Black and Shania Twain.

Profiles of Irving Layton, Wayne and Shuster, Gordon Sinclair, Prince Charles, Wayne Gretzky, Gordon Lightfoot and Morley Callaghan further demonstrate the variety of the collection. With a foreword by Fulford, Maclean's People is available in hardcover.

Speaking of profiles, Knopf has published the first full-scale biography of a legendary "prince of Broadway." Dazzler: The Life and Times of Moss Hart, by Steven Bach, tells the story of the Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright-director who gave us You Can't Take It With You, The Man Who Came to Dinner, Gentleman's Agreement, A Star Is Born and, in his later years, My Fair Lady and Camelot.

Hart, whose autobiography Act One told only of his impoverished youth and his early success on Broadway, was part of the Algonquin Round Table and a confrere to the Gershwins, Irving Berlin, Noel Coward, Cole Porter and the Hollywood moguls. Despite his many triumphs, he was tormented by debilitating mood swings of what was known then as manic depression.

He died in 1961, at age 57. Bach's intriguing account of his life should appeal to any devoted fan of American show business and theatre.

The Holocaust from a child's eyes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Georgy Halpern was a Jewish boy in France who was sucked into the maelstrom of the Holocaust.

Torn from his parents' grasp in 1943, he spent the last year of his abbreviated life in a children's home in Izieu before being shipped to Auschwitz and gassed.

One of approximately one million Jewish children devoured by Hitler's Final Solution, Georgy regularly wrote letters and sent drawings to his parents describing his life, dreams and sorrows.

Thanks to Nazi hunter Serge Klarsfeld, his collection of letters and drawings, now permanently exhibited in the Holocaust section at the Imperial War Museum in London, have been memorialized in Remembering Georgy (Aperture, 2001).

Klarsfeld, an expert on the Holocaust in France, found the cache while doing research on the fate of several thousand French Jewish children.

The letters are simple and suffused with a love of nature and an attachment to family.

"There are big mountains and the village is very beautiful," he observes. "There are many flowers and trees and farms where we take walks."

In another letter, he writes: "Thank you very much for the package you sent for my birthday. It gave me great pleasure."

The drawings, mainly of ships, presumably speak to his longing to be reunited with his parents.

Lamentably, Georgy never saw them again.

He was nine years old when he was taken away.

Remembering Georgy not only preserves his memory, but reminds us, yet again, of the countless lives snuffed out by the Nazis and their collaborators in a mindless orgy of hatred and violence.

Books for fans of Mordecai Richler

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Thirty years after it won a Governor General's Award for fiction, Mordecai Richler's deliciously satirical novel St. Urbain's Horseman is back on prominent display in Canadian bookstores, courtesy of a handsome new trade paperback edition published earlier this year by McClelland and Stewart of Toronto.

Soon after Richler's seventh novel appeared in 1971, the New York Times called it "nastily witty, scatalogically outrageous, sometimes poignantly moving and deeply serious in a defensively light-hearted way." It was also nominated for a Booker prize (it lost out to In A Free State, by V.S. Naipaul).

One of three Richler novels that M&S reprinted this year – the others are The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz and Joshua Then and Now – St. Urbain's Horseman shows the Montreal writer at or near the top of his form. In rereading it, we are reminded of the author's hilarious irreverence and his affinities to both Philip Roth and Franz Kafka as he paints a picaresque, guilt-ridden, and sometimes tortured court jester of an anti-hero.

The book focuses on Jake Hersh, a 37-year-old film director with a young family, undergoing a trial for scandalous misdeeds in London. As his troubles deepen, Jake increasingly idolizes his cousin Joey, a Nazi hunter, adventurer and war hero who was a horseman on St. Urbain St. in Montreal.

Richler's pen is robust, exuberant and wickedly funny. The novel is worth revisiting. It stands as a worthy reminder of the powers of a much-loved scribe cut down before his time.

Among the many passions Richler shared with Ernest Hemingway were his love of fine cigars, good liquor, and sports. Whereas Hemingway favoured bull fights and boxing and deep-sea fishing, Richler was a devotee of snooker from his youthful days at Baron Byng High School, when he would skip class to be a poolroom hustler.

Richler left an elegant, wide-ranging memoir, On Snooker, which Knopf Canada published last summer. The book was well into production when its author died last July; it appeared posthumously.

"Obviously snooker was a hell of a lot more fun than Talmud classes with Mr. Yalofsky in a back room of the Young Israel Synagogue," he wrote.

Even when writing on a subject lacking universal appeal, Richler rarely miscued and almost never scratched.

Richler figures prominently in another recent title – Getting Started: A Memoir of the 1950s, by William (Why Rock the Boat?) Weintraub. As a young print and radio journalist stationed in Europe, Weintraub kept up a lively correspondence with Richler, Mavis Gallant and Brian Moore during a period of heightened literary creativity for all of them.

Published by M&S in October, Getting Started is an immensely readable memoir about friendship and the craft of writing, and delivers many fresh glimpses and revelations. Regarding his first novel The Acrobats (1954), which Richler himself later regarded as flawed, he wrote to Weintraub that the Liverpool Jewish Gazette had chosen not to review it.

"They've returned a copy of my book with a letter. They said their reviewer could only review the [book] in the most scathing terms. So perhaps they'd better just give the [book] back. Honest."

As Weintraub notes, it was one of many instances in which the Jewish press would remain unappreciative of Richler's comic compulsion to wash dirty Jewish laundry in public.

* * *

Another worthy Richler book appeared earlier this year – Sister Crazy, by Mordecai's daughter, Emma Richler. This first novel, which focuses on a young woman as she grows up in an eccentric family, reveals that biting comic wit may be hereditary after all. Published by Knopf Canada.

U.S. Mideast envoys face challenge

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The two peace envoys U.S. President George W. Bush has dispatched to the Middle East have their work cut out for them.

Violence continued unabated for days before the slated arrival Monday of the envoys, former Gen. Anthony Zinni and the assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, William Burns.

Last weekend, Israel and the Palestinians engaged in tit-for-tat strikes that have been a familiar part of their more than 14 months of violence.

On Saturday night, an Israeli soldier was killed in a Palestinian mortar attack in the Gaza Strip.

Hamas claimed responsibility for the attack near the Israeli settlement of Kfar Darom. Hamas officials said they were avenging last Friday's slaying of Hamas leader Mahmoud Abu Hanoud in an Israeli helicopter attack.

Hanoud, killed along with his deputy and another man, topped Israel's most-wanted list for allegedly planning terror attacks that killed dozens of Israelis.

Israel said Hanoud was behind the June suicide bombing outside the Dolphinarium disco in Tel Aviv and another suicide attack in August at the Sbarro pizzeria in Jerusalem.

Hanoud, the No. 1 Hamas fugitive, had evaded two earlier Israeli attempts on his life. A Palestinian court sentenced him to 12 years in prison for his involvement in Hamas' military wing, but he escaped from jail last May.

His funeral Saturday in the West Bank, attended by 50,000, was punctuated by vows to avenge his death.

Israel retaliated for the Saturday mortar attack with missile strikes that reportedly demolished intelligence, navy and police positions of the Palestinian Authority, as well as offices used by PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's Fatah faction.

Hanoud was killed a day after an incident that created yet more Palestinian anger and prompted Israel to call for an investigation.

On Nov. 22, five Palestinian children were killed in Gaza when an Israeli tank shell exploded. Palestinian police report that one of the children kicked the shell, causing it to explode, but Palestinian leaders charged that Israel had deliberately planted the shell as a booby trap.

The children, ages six to 14, were from the same Palestinian family.

After much criticism from abroad, including from the United States, Israel said it would investigate the incident.

In a speech last week, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell set forth a vision for Israeli-Palestinian peace and announced the envoys were being sent.

Powell told Palestinians to "end violence and to end terror" and said Israel must be willing to end its occupation and stop settlement activity.

Both sides said the success of the U.S. mission was up to the other party.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Sunday, that "this is a test of Arafat and of the Palestinian leadership to demonstrate if indeed they intend to advance the peace process."

Palestinian Information Minister Yasser Abed Rabbo said he could not "forecast whether these efforts will succeed because Sharon is trying to drown these efforts in a sea of blood."

Iraqi-sponsored terror cell uncovered

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Shin Bet security service has arrested a group of 15 Palestinians who were funded, trained and run by Iraq, through the Palestine Liberation Front (PLF), which is based in Iraq and headed by Mohammed Abass, also known as Abu Abas, a member of the Palestinian National Council.

The PLF was behind the 1985 hijacking of the Italian cruise ship Achille Lauro in the Mediterranean during which a wheelchair-bound American, Leon Klinghoffer, was killed. Shin Bet also claims the group was responsible for the kidnapping and murder last July of Yuri Guschin of Jerusalem.

According to a statement issued by the Prime Minister's Office, the group was funded through Iraqi intelligence and Jordanian banks, with the money then transferred into Palestinian banks or smuggled into the country. One of the vehicles used to smuggle weapons was owned by Palestinian Authority official Abdel Razik Ihiya, whose car was not checked at the border because he enjoyed VIP status.

The cell was uncovered about three months ago.

According to the Shin Bet, the group planned "spectacular" terror attacks at Ben-Gurion International Airport, as well as in Tel Aviv and in Jerusalem.

Group seeks to charge Arafat

Fishman, whose son and daughter were almost killed in a shooting attack on an Israeli bus last year, said the Israeli terror victims have a much stronger case than those seeking Sharon's conviction. Arafat, he said, is directly responsible for the murder of thousands of Israelis, whereas Sharon's accusers acknowledge that at best, Sharon was indirectly responsible for the attacks in Lebanon.

Though the Israelis have a team of international lawyers acting on their behalf, Fishman is not optimistic about their success.

"I'm not expecting miracles from the Belgian court." The Belgian press is "anti-Israel" as is the public mood in the European nation, he said.

The suit in Belgium is only one part of the work done by TVA, said Indor, who was wounded in two terrorist attacks, including a 1985 stabbing in the streets of East Jerusalem.

In addition to tending to the emotional needs of terror terror victims, TVA also gives them a public voice and lobbies on their behalf.

Over the last 50 years, the Israeli government has developed generous economic support systems to subsidize the families of terror victims who may have lost their only breadwinner, Indor said. TVA (on the Internet at www.terrorvictims.com) steps in to supplement that effort with social programs to ease the pain of loss. On Jewish holidays, for instance, the absence of family members is acutely felt, so TVA sponsors events like Chanukah outings and Purim gift-giving.

Phone hotline launched

This week, TVA is launching a telephone hotline in which volunteers will provide a sympathetic ear to people dealing with grief.

Other programs include home visits; emergency teams to help organize funerals; organization of special memorial services; and transportation services.

Political advocacy is also on TVA's agenda, and, in fact, led to the group's formation.

In 1986, Indor explained, Israel released 1,160 terrorists in exchange for four captured Israeli soldiers held by a Palestinian group linked to Syria.

"We terror victims decided to speak out in the Knesset and in public against releasing the terrorists," Indor said.

Half a year later, the first intifadah erupted, organized by 600 of the released prisoners."We got back four soldiers and we suffered hundreds of dead and wounded in the intifadah," he said.

Still in 1986, Azriel Barak appealed to the Supreme Court of Israel to prevent the release of terrorists who had killed his son and daughter-in-law. Although his petition was turned down – the court ruled the release was a political matter, not a legal one – that case spurred formal creation of the group.

Indor said TVA serves as a counterweight to those pressing the government of Israel, such as the Palestinian Authority and European countries, who push Israel to release convicted terrorists.

On one occasion, when former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin deported 420 Hamas operatives to Lebanon, he was challenged in court by groups seeking to reverse that order. TVA mobilized and brought to court a family that had suffered from Hamas terror. Their presence countered the one-sided depiction of Hamas offered by its representatives, changed the atmosphere in the court and the deportations were allowed, Indor said.

TVA remains a small, grass-roots organization that relies on donations from 12,750 supporters, most of them in Israel. TVA provides services to about 1,000 people, he said.

The Week in Israel

Nov. 19

• Israel captured a Hamas leader who was on its most-wanted list. Abed Rabbo Abu Husa was nabbed near his home in the Gaza Strip. Abu Husa is accused in the kidnappings and killings of Avi Sasportas, Ilan Sa'adon and Nissim Toledano.

• The IDF reported that it had thwarted 16 terrorist attacks in the last month, eight of which were intended suicide bombings.

Nov. 20

• Tourist arrivals in Israel fell in October to their lowest monthly level since August 1991. The Central Bureau of Statistics reported that 69,800 visitors came to Israel in October, compared to 151,300 in the same month a year earlier.

Nov. 21

• A poll of Palestinians shows growing dissatisfaction with the violence against Israel. Last month, 75 percent of respondents supported the violence, while 18 percent were opposed. This month the figures were 59 percent and 30 percent, respectively.

Nov. 22

• Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein recommended that the Antiquities Authority's supervision of work carried out on the Temple Mount be reinstated. Ever since the start of the intifadah 14 months ago, the Wakf (Muslim religious trust) has blocked the Antiquities Authority from unofficially supervising the holy site as the authority has done since the end of the Six-Day War.

Nov. 23

• A record 234,500 Israelis were unemployed in the third quarter of the year, as the unemployment rate soared to 9.3 percent from the previous quarter's 8.1 percent, the Central Bureau of Statistics reported.

Corrupting language's integrity

The following is part one of two. Part two will be published next week.

"A thing is what it is and not another thing" – Joseph Butler

The BBC World Service is the latest news outlet to make it a policy to ban the word "terrorism" in reference to the Sept. 11 atrocities in the United States.

BBC thus joins London-based Reuters, the world's largest foreign news service, which made the same decision in late September. Reuters' head of news, Stephen Jukes, explained his decision in an internal memo: "We all know that one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter and that Reuters upholds the principle that we do not use the word 'terrorist'... To be frank, it adds little to call the attack on the World Trade Center a terrorist attack." To which U.S. media analyst Howard Kurtz sardonically added: "Except for the little detail that a terrorist assault is what it was."

According to Reports

Small wonder that George Will, the conservative ABC commentator, invoked George Orwell, the famous liberal essayist, to rebuke Reuters for its Orwellian debasement of language. Orwell famously railed against euphemisms, the refusal to call something what it is. As Will put it: "It's often been said that in war the first casualty is truth, and one of the ways you attack truth is by corrupting the integrity of language, which I suggest Reuters News Service has done by saying that they will not use the word 'terrorist.'"

Reuters argues that the term "terrorist" is a loaded, judgmental term and that more "neutral" terms like "attackers" and "bombers" should be used instead. Will's answer: "'Loaded term?' Certainly 'terrorist' has a pejorative connotation – so does 'rapist,' 'fascist,' 'assassin,' murderer.' So what?... Well 'terrorist' is a noun that denotes something very specific: someone who inflicts violence... randomly against civilians."

In his Oct. 3 report "Who is a Terrorist?" for CBC's The National, Mideast correspondent Neil Macdonald interviewed Boaz Ganor of the Herzliyah Institute for Counter-Terrorism. Ganor, responding to the charge that one man's terrorist is another's freedom fighter, said: "It does not matter what is your aim... Even if you have a holy aim, there is one measure that you are not allowed to use. And this is the use of violence directed against civilians, meaning terrorism" (emphasis added).

What's more revealing is that the same Middle East correspondents who insist on using the term "assassination" in place of "targeted killing" when describing Israel's policy of going after Palestinain terrorists, refuse to use the term "terrorism" to describe groups like Hamas and Islamic Jihad that deliberately target civilians including women and children.

Some journalists draw a moral equivalence between Israel's policy of retaliating for terrorism (restrained as it is) – buying the Arab line that it's "state-sponsored terrorism" – and the terrorist act itself. More on this next week.

Prepared by Paul Michaels of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Israel's nuclear plan focus of L.A. smuggling trial

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LOS ANGELES — Israel's nuclear program will come under scrutiny in a trial that opened last week in a U.S. federal court in Los Angeles, where Richard Kelly Smith stands accused of smuggling components for the manufacture of nuclear weapons to Israel.

Smith was extradited from Spain to the United States to face the 30-count indictment against him. Smith, 72, is accused of selling 810 electronic switches to the Israeli defence ministry between 1980 and 1982. The switches are used as detonators in nuclear bombs, and American investigators suspect the switches were purchased for Israel's nuclear program.

Israel denied this when the affair first came to light in 1985, saying the switches were for use in the pharmaceutical industry.

Smith was first arrested by U.S. authorities in May 1985 on suspicion of selling the switches to the defence ministry without an export license. At the time, he was serving as president of Milco, a microchip and spaceflight research company in Los Angeles.

American investigators discovered that since 1973, 80 percent of Milco's business had been with Israel, causing them to suspect the company had actually been set up by Israel as a front, enabling the defence ministry to purchase American technology that it could not acquire legally.

The investigators found Milco also sold switches to Taiwan. Neither Taiwan nor Israel could have acquired a permit from the U.S. government to buy the switches legally, since neither has signed the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

After Smith's arrest, he was released on $100,000 bail pending trial, and was indicted in a Los Angeles court on 15 counts of forgery and exporting technology without a licence. His trial was due to begin in August 1985, but Smith fled the country with his wife, Emily.

The FBI spent the next 16 years looking for him. At various times, he was reportedly sighted in Israel and Britain, but he was finally picked up in Malaga, Spain last July. Smith was extradited to face an expanded indictment, including charges such as flight from justice and failing to answer a court summons.

In the meantime, Israel officially apologized to the U.S. for the affair and agreed to return the unused switches. It is not known how many were returned.

Study finds genetic connection between Jews and Kurds

By TAMARA TRAUBMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The people genetically closest to the Jews may be the Kurds, according to a new study at Hebrew University.

Scientists who participated in the research said the findings seem to indicate both peoples had common ancestors who lived in the northern half of the fertile crescent, where northern Iraq and Turkey are today. Some of them, it is assumed, wandered south in prehistoric times and settled on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean Sea.

Prof. Ariella Oppenheim and Dr. Marina Feirman, who carried out the research at Hebrew University, said they were surprised to find a closer genetic connection between Jews and the populations of the fertile crescent than between Jews and their Arab neighbours.

Oppenheim said previous DNA research on Jews, including her own work, had revealed great genetic similarity between Jews and Arabs, particularly Palestinians from Israel and the West Bank and Gaza.

The new study, however, involved more detailed and thorough examinations than previous research. In addition, this was the first comparison of the DNA of Jews and Kurds.

Genetic similarity between peoples is measured by comparing the frequency of genetic mutations among them. This information makes it possible to reconstruct their paths of migration and to discover their unwritten history.

But the Hebrew University study reveals only part of the story, since it is based on mutations of the Y chromosome. Since this chromosome, which determines male gender, is passed only from father to son, it does not contain information about maternal contributions to the genetic reservoir under study.

The study's findings are published in the current issue of The American Journal of Human Genetics.

The researchers used the DNA of 1,847 Jewish men of Ashkenazi, Sephardi and Kurdish descent, as well as Muslims and Christians of Kurdish, Turkish and Armenian descent, various Arab populations, and Russians, Poles and residents of Belarus.

Rifts surface with new Moscow Jewish centre

Main problem is reaching the majority of Jews

By LEV GORODETSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — The dedication of a new Jewish cultural centre here two weeks ago was part of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee's new strategy in the former Soviet Union.

Yet the opening of the centre in a $3.5 million mansion also brought rifts in the Russian Jewish community to the surface.

When the JDC first returned to the region in 1991, it focused its efforts – and the lion's share of its $60 million – on basic needs and basic community revival efforts.

Now it seems that most of those problems have been solved, particularly in Russia.

Hundreds of thousands of elderly and poor Jews across the region have been fed through the system of JDC-run Chesed welfare centres, and the 160 JDC-supported Jewish community centres have helped revive Jewish communal life in many cities and towns.

The main problem today, JDC leaders say, is reaching the majority of Jews.

"Apart from the 25,000 elderly people supported by our Chesed centres, we – together with the Jewish Agency for Israel, Israeli cultural centres and other Jewish organizations combined – are reaching only thousands of the roughly 250,000-strong Moscow Jewish population," said Joel Golovensky, the head of the JDC's Moscow office.

The goal, according to JDC officials, is to reach out to the Jewish professional classes, estimated at more than 40 percent of Moscow's Jewish community.

"The particular needs of this group have remained unaddressed by Jewish organizations. The new centre will fill this gap," said Mikhail Kunin, the centre's director.

Organizers say the new centre will be a gathering place for artists, writers and scientists, as well as film, theatre and dance enthusiasts and will serve as a venue for their creations.

"It is in fact a pioneering and unexpected project, showing that the JDC is amazingly flexible in its ability to adapt to a new situation in the Jewish community," Leonid Nevzlin, head of the umbrella Russian Jewish Congress, said at the dedication ceremony.

The new centre is part of a two-centre project in Russia's capital supported by the JDC.

The second, larger centre will be built in the next several years near Russia's Choral Synagogue and will provide sports facilities and educational programs.

The projects will cost $10 million to $20 million, said Michael Schneider, the JDC's executive vice president.

But the buildings are not making everyone happy.

The leadership of the Federation of Jewish Communities of Russia is displeased with the lack of financial support the JDC gives to the recently built Marina Roscha Jewish centre and other federation-supported projects.

Leaders of the federation – Russia's largest umbrella Jewish group, with a strong Chabad Lubavitch representation – and the JDC expressed discontent at a recent meeting.

And at an annual meeting of the federation last Monday, Valery Engel, the CEO of the federation called the JDC "a foreign organization, which doesn't take into account the real interests of the Russian Jewish community," and which in many places actually undermines Jewish communities that belong to the federation.

Engel demanded that any JDC project costing more than $50,000 be co-ordinated with all major Russian Jewish organizations.

After returning to New York, a JDC official said he is puzzled by the federation's reaction because there is enough room for both centres.

Moscow is one of the few cities of its size that "doesn't have adequate Jewish community centres to attract Jewish life and to enable Jews to meet," Schneider said.

Schneider added that the JDC and the federation work together on many projects in the Soviet Union and around the world.

The dispute is the latest in the nearly 18-month struggle for primacy within the Russian Jewish community, which until now has played out primarily between the federation and the RJC.

But for many Russian Jews, the dispute is less important than the Jewish activities planned for the new centre.

"I am not against Chabad and of course not against Judaism, but their place is too religious for me," said surgeon and Jewish activist Alexander Kirson. "We need to create a prestigious and secular Jewish place. We have to try."

TORONTO — Lena Shugar, artist, designer and teacher recalls that as far back as she can remember, she was always sketching.

As a child in Russia during World War II, she would draw on the edges of newspapers because there was no drawing paper.

Today, her mystical paintings in watercolour, acrylic, oil and mixed media can be found in numerous private collections.

Shugar has exhibited in group shows in Canada, Israel and Sweden. She will be featured at a one-woman show at the Kodiak Gallery, 10176 Yonge St., Richmond Hill, (905-770-5381) from Dec. 1 to 16. The exhibition will feature her mixed media works covering a wide spectrum of subjects, as well as paintings from a series called Living with the Past.

She was born Lena Bienstock in Stanislav, Poland, in 1938. When she was two years old, she, her parents and her brother, along with other Jews, had to escape Poland. On the crowded train, she developed measles and the other passengers insisted the her family leave the train.

They went to a remote farmhouse in Russia where they were taken in by a Russian family and were allowed to remain for the duration of the war.

"I got medical help and this saved my life. And I believe being forced off the train saved our lives," Shugar says. "It is doubtful if the others made it."

After the war, they made their way to a displaced persons camp in West Berlin, and a year later, the Norwegian government took them in.

When the family arrived at Union Station in Toronto four years later, Shugar recalls, they did not know anyone.

Artist, Lena Shugar with her painting, Sound the Great Shofar.

Reflecting on her childhood, she says, "Those early years, travelling around, created my passion for colour, fantasy and imagery."

Shortly after her arrival in Toronto, the teenager came under the tutelage of one of Canada's foremost artists and teachers, Doris McCarthy.

Shugar became the head of the Canadian Industries Limited Color Studio (CIL) and later became an independent design consultant.

Experimenting with a series of progressive techniques designed for art instruction, she created methods that allow students to liberate themselves from the constraints of conventional approaches to painting.

"This encourages the expression of individuality in their work," she says.

The mother of three, when Shugar's youngest child entered school, she volunteered in the arts and crafts department at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and slowly went back into professional art work.

Her first major exhibition was at Ramat Gan, Israel, in 1990; her works were later on display at the Kawartha Arts Festival in Ontario. Shugar has also exhibited at the Koffler Gallery, the Robert Mede Gallery, the Peterson Fine Art Gallery, and in her first juried show this year, she won the Award of Excellence at the Lindsay Art Gallery.

Her paintings can be found on the Magnotta Winery's wine labels and the donation cards of the Israel Tennis Centres, and she has been featured on the cover of Enoteca Wine and Food magazine.

"I enjoy putting on paper or canvas my thoughts and feelings and the experiences at that moment in my life," Shugar says.

She believes that her art expresses her emotions. "I think an artist's work is best when one can infuse the work with oneself – it is important to be true to yourself – to be original."

Designer revisits the elegance of a bygone era

TORONTO — Russian, Ukrainian and Hungarian music, dance and drama will come together in a new musical at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The Elegance and Splendor of a Bygone Era, presented by Masquerade Theatre International, will be performed at the Leah Posluns Theatre at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre on Sunday, Dec. 9, at 8 p.m.

The production will include music by Mozart, Bach, Mussorgsky and Tchaikovsky and will feature costumes created by costume designer Maria Vinogradova.

Maria Vinogradova has created costumes for many productions throughout the world.

The founder of Masquerade Theatre International, the first Canadian professional performing arts company focusing on traditional Russian culture, Vinogradova has created costumes for numerous productions throughout the world, including a 1995 production of the Snow Maiden at the Royal Alexandra Theatre in Toronto.

Vinogradova, who worked as a tour guide in the Kremlin, said this concert is "a showcase for the performers – they are the most outstanding artists and when they come here to Canada, they have to begin again to establish their image and reputations."

But in Europe and the United States, she says, they are well known and are frequently invited to perform.

"These artists are the greatest in their professions but they do not know how to promote themselves," Vinogradova said. "In Russia, an artist was a pure artist who did not understand business or promotion, only [how] to perfect his or her skills."

Some of the concert's performers include the Toronto Ukrainian ensemble Desna; violinist Wasyl Popadiuk, a native of Ukraine; Helena Holl, a soprano who performed with the Bolshoi Theatre; and Anna Karpova, a former ballerina with the Kirov Ballet in St. Petersburg, Russia, currently a ballet teacher and choreographer at Neworldance Academy in Toronto.

Karpova's husband, Vladimir Karpov, the concert's artistic director, was a principal dancer with the Kirov Ballet now teaching ballet at Ballet Jorgen and George Brown College. Stage designer Batalia Stapko also worked at the Kirov Theatre, as well as at the Bolshoi.

Andrei Vinogradov, Vinogradova's son, a student at the Schulich School of Business at York University, is a featured dancer and executive director of the Masquerade Theatre company.

A television special on the concert and its performers will air on CHIN TV at 8:30 p.m. Dec. 2, and Tomkov TV/Radio Productions will produced a video of some of the featured artists.

Tickets are available at selected video and bookstores or by calling 416-226-9151 or 416-767-3301.

Jewish music – both new and old

By ERIC STEIN
Special to The CJN

Looking for a good holiday gift idea for that Jewish-music-loving friend/relative of yours? Two recently released CD's may fit the bill.

The landmark CD collaboration The Well between Chava Alberstein and the Klezmatics has recently been re-released by Rounder Records.

The recording first appeared in 1998 representing at the time a giant step forward in the realm of what was then coming to be known as "new Jewish music."

This burgeoning style of post-modern klezmer/Yiddish music has continued to evolve, but the ongoing innovations in the style have not in any way diminished the power and sophistication of The Well, which should endure as a staple of the canon for years to come. Chava Alberstein is well known worldwide as the so-called "First Lady of Israeli Songs," while the Klezmatics, both as a group and as individuals in other contexts, have had as much to do do with the revival of klezmer music as anybody.

The combination promises a lot - and it delivers. What stands out particularly about these recordings are their sheer tastefulness and restraint. On many of her other CD's Alberstein has had a penchant for shlocky, muzak-like arrangements, using synthesized keyboards, electric bass and a wall of reverb where acoustic instruments and natural sounds would have been better suited. The Klezmatics meanwhile, in their quest for a fusion of klezmer with rock, metal, psychedelia and other modern styles, have made their share of crass, inelegant recordings.

But on The Well, the Klezmatics pass up outrageous pyrotechnics for an understated, mostly acoustic sound, perfectly suited to Alberstein's rich gypsy tenor. The exquisite arrangements and soulful playing, always appropriate to the particular mood of the song, put Alberstein in her most effective musical context yet. Rather than rehashing old standards, The Well sets a number of Yiddish poems to music, turning modest and often powerful lyrics by poets like Itsik Fefer, Abraham Reisen, Itsik Manger and Anna Margolin into instant classics. Particular standouts include the infectious waltz of the title track (Di Krenitse in Yiddish), the delicate, latin-tinged Ovnt Lid, and Di Goldene Pave(The Golden Peacock), a rapturous lullaby based on an exotic poem filled with mysterious imagery.

The only "problem" with the CD is that after its 55 minutes expire you'll be wishing for more, and probably scrambling to the repeat button on your CD player to listen to it all again!

In a thoroughly different vein comes the three-CD set Populare Judische Kunstler (Popular Jewish Artists), from German record label Trikont. Featuring historic recordings made in Berlin, Hamburg, Munich, and Vienna between 1903 and 1936, the collection is a fascinating treasure of what was once a rich German-Jewish musical culture.

The music here does not sound like anything currently recognized as "Jewish music." Highly assimilated, Germany's Jews were fully integrated into German culture prior to the Nazi era, and the artists of this community created in a distinctly German milieu. They did not play klezmer music or sing the Yiddish folk songs endemic to their Ashkenazi roots. Instead, their musical creations drew upon western European and American musical vocabularies.

These CD's capture this assimilated German-Jewish musical culture at its apex during the Weimar period. The collection features music hall, theatre and cabaret numbers, as well as popular operettas, vaudeville routines, and comedy snippets. The copious liner notes (you'll need to brush up on your German to read them) argue that "Jewish artists, up until the '30s were Germany's best international ambassadors of a new, open, liberal and witty German spirit and humour."

The notes argue further that the extinction of Jewish culture in Germany was catastrophic not only for Jews themselves but for the development of German culture. It is difficult not to detect an "apologist" tone here. With the current vogue in Germany for all things Jewish, the timing of this release places it in the context of the movement by the current generation to rewrite Jews back into Germany's history.

It is possible the case may be overstated here, but whatever the motivation may be and whatever the depth of its sincerity, it cannot be denied that these are important and fascinating recordings, revealing some of the character of German-Jewish musical culture prior to the Holocaust.

These CD's will probably be more of interest to those with an academic interest in Jewish music and cultural history. Diehards will suffer the poor, scratchy recording quality with far more patience than those looking simply for a good listen or a musical mood-setter (unless of course the mood desired is a 1920s German music hall).

For more information on acquiring these CD's contact the respective record companies: Rounder Records (info@rounder.com), Trikont Records (trikont@trikont.de).

Lonely Planet guides for the city bound traveller

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Cities draw tourists much like bright lights attract flickering moths.

Lonely Planet, distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books, has just released four of its latest city guides. All are lavishly illustrated, with colour photographs and maps.

Denmark's lively capital, Copenhagen, is internationally renowned for its Tivoli amusement park, its amazing pedestrian mall and its quaint network of canals. Copenhagen fills in the details.

If you're planning a trip to Cuba, don't leave home without Havana. It takes you beyond Havana's colonial plazas, baroque palaces and cobblestone streets.

Toronto hits the mark. The writers have not missed any major sights in this fair city, from Harbourfront and Queen Street West to Little Italy and Chinatown.

Montreal is also ably portrayed. In Montreal, a reader is given a grand tour of a great Canadian city, from the sylvan splendour of Mount Royal to the concrete solidity of Place d'Armes.

EL AL IMPROVES SCHEDULING ON TORONTO -TEL AVIV ROUTE

As of Sunday Dec. 2, all El Al flights between Toronto and Tel Aviv will be non-stop, the airline has announced.

Flights depart Terminal 3 of Pearson International Airport on Sundays, Tuesdays and Thursdays at 10 p.m. and arrive in Tel Aviv the next afternoon. As before, flights depart Tel Aviv at 1 a.m. and arrive in Toronto at 7 a.m. the same day.

The scheduling improvements were originally planned to begin next spring, but after El Al put all procedural requirements in place as required by Canadian authorities, it received a green light to advance the changes.

Ever since Sept. 11, the airline has attracted media attention as well as new customers because of its unparalleled security procedures, said Rami Fischer, El Al's general manager for Canada.

"More and more passengers tell us they are choosing El Al now for what we offer – great service, the highest levels of security, and that special feeling of Israel the moment they board our planes," he said.

Museum of Jewish Life: Delegates to the World Jewish Congress's recent annual meeting in Jerusalem were given a glimpse of the first stage of a proposed new interactive museum on the theme of Jewish life.

Yehuda Levy-Almeda, director of the proposed Museum of Jewish Life, said it will be a "storytelling museum" that will explain the essence and diversity of Jewish culture and religion. The Jerusalem-based facility is expected to open in stages over the next several years.

Funded by the Jerusalem Foundation, the Museum has taken quarters at Heichal Shlomo, the former home of Israel's chief rabbinate in Jerusalem. Already under way, renovation of the building is expected to cost $30 million.

Artist carries on family tradition

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Artist Debbie Seligman believes art and beauty are synonymous.

"Art is a reflection of the nature that embraces us every day," she says. Seligman, who has participated in several group shows, will have her first one-person show, Festival of Flowers, from Dec. 2 to Dec. 15 at the Downsview Library at 2793 Keele St.

Debbie Seligman with one of her watercolour paintings that can be seen at her Festival of Flowers show.

Seligman's original watercolour artworks are painted in the traditional Chinese style with a subtle western influence. Painted with Chinese pigments, they have a very delicate and fresh look.

"I like this style of art because it uses the traditional technique of Chinese brush paintings, which is very disciplined art," she says. "But also it has some freedom of expression similar to western impressionistic art, which is my family background."

Seligman comes from a long line of artists. Her father, Yehudah Podeswa, is well-known in Toronto art circles, and her grandfather, Chaim Podeswa, and her father's brother, Maylach, were artists in Poland who were killed in the Holocaust.

Seligman and her two brothers, one an artist and the other a film director, were steeped in the art world from birth.

As a young child and as a teenager, she was often the main subject of her father's works. She says she began painting on her modeling breaks.

As a child, she helped her father in teach art classes for young children and in high school she taught her own multimedia classes for three years.

Seligman graduated from the Associated Hebrew Day Schools, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and the University of Western Ontario, where she received a degree as an occupational therapist.

A busy mother of four children, she has a private practice and works at the hand and foot orthotic clinic at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"Because I am interested in creating and working with my hands, I am applying my artistic skills to my scientific practice," she says.

For more information on the Festival of Flowers exhibition, call the Downsview Library, 416-395-5720.

GROUP OF ARTISTS PRESENTS A FIRST GLIMPSE OF SEDER

The Seder Collective, a team of young professional artists including Jonathan Garfinkel, Josh Dolgin, Rebecca Brown and Michael Rubinoff, have been collaborating on what they describe as a "new kind of music-theatre."

The work, called Seder, combines traditional Yiddish and klezmer tunes with rocking beats performed by singers, cantors, musicians and disk jockeys. The story focuses on leaving slavery for freedom, leaving winter for spring, the rebirth of a nation, and the renewal of ourselves. The collective plans to workshop Seder next spring and present a full production in 2003.

In the meantime, they are presenting excerpts of Seder, at which the creative team will discuss their vision for the piece. Miles S. Nadal JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. W. Pay-what-you-can at the door. Sunday, Dec. 2, 6 p.m. 416-924-6211.

Klezmer Duo: Toronto musicians Martin van de Van and Brian Katz draw on their rich backgrounds as classical, jazz and new music composers to create an appealing "world" klezmer style. The klezmer duo embarks on a fourth European tour this summer.

Hear them in performance at the Free Times Cafe, 320 College St. Sunday, Dec. 2, 12 noon to 3 p.m. Reservations, 416-967-1078. Also at Mezzetta, 681 St. Clair Ave. W. Wednesday, Dec.5, 9:15 to 11 p.m. Reservations, 416-658-5687.

Two Appealing TV Docs: Two upcoming programs on Vision TV are of special interest to CJN readers.

Vancouver filmmaker Nikila Cole began a visual exploration of her Jewish roots when her daughter Sarah turned 12, the age of bat mitzvah. Raised in a secular household, Sarah chose to reject the traditional ceremony, but still wanted to learn about the history and heritage of her people. So she and her mother began a quest that would take them around the globe.

The result is Wanderings: A Journey to Connect, which chronicles their travels to Europe, Asia, the Caribbean and elsewhere in the footsteps of the Jewish Diaspora. The hour-long documentary features a Chanukah celebration in the Bahamas, a Purim celebration in Korea, and visits to the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam and a dying Jewish community in India.

Wanderings makes its world premiere on Vision TV, Monday Dec. 3 at 9 p.m. and again at 11 p.m.

Keepers of the Faith: Canadian Chassidim offers a rare glimpse into this Orthodox community in Canada. Three CDs for the active music listener

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Toronto-based singer/songwriter and multi-instrumentalist Joshua Engel recently released his first solo CD, Swimming To Catch The Sun, a collection of 13 songs that vary from folk to ballad to instrumental rock to punk.

One of the founders of popular local klezmer act Beyond The Pale, Engel is a three-time scholarship recipient from KlezKanada and has worked with klezmer acts Brave Old World, the Klezmatics, the Klezmer Conservatory Band and Chevrisa.

But on this CD, Engel lets lose and plays just about everything but klezmer. It begins with Same Old Songs (an ironic title), a catchy '70s pop melody; flows into bEnOwHeRe, an instrumental with classical piano and electric guitar styles reminiscent of 1970s Genesis; has a love ballad that features actress Tamara Podemski; a quirky a cappella barber shop-style song, Many Moons; and even a modern punk song, similar in vein to the music of such current pop acts as Green Day.

Engel, who plays guitars, bass, mandolin, drums and percussion and sings, is extremely talented both as a musician and a songwriter. The versatility in song styles proves this.

To some it may all seem rather self-indulgent and may confuse a casual listener. But then this CD is probably not intended for a casual listener. Anyone who likes to listen to music actively rather than passively, will find much to enjoy here. www.joshuaengel.tv

Music fans will also appreciate Hy-lig Ma-noover by Heillig Manoeuvre, a Toronto-based jazz quartet led by bassist Henry Heillig, founder of the popular '80s jazz/funk ensemble Manteca.

Heillig Manoeuvre prides itself on playing what it calls "friendly music, a band whose repertoire would be more songbook than doctoral thesis."

The songs are more contemporary/bluesy than traditional jazz. All 10 songs are written by the various members of the group, which besides Heillig includes guitarist Kim Ratcliffe, who has toured with Holly Cole; keyboard player Bill Brennan, bandleader on CBC radio show Vinyl Café; and drummer Howard Gaul, who has worked with jazz singer Laura Hubert and composed the soundtrack for such films as H.

All the musicians gel together on this CD, but their individual talents are especially noticed on such songs as El Nino and Highly Vancouver.

To prove the band's versatility, the CD ends with Ratcliffe's beautiful folky guitar-playing on Go Easy On Yourself. www.heilligman.com

Up and coming singer/songwriter Marni Levitt has been keeping busy performing regularly in Toronto's night-club scene since moving back from Montreal a few years ago.

Levitt recently released her debut CD Origin – a collection of six songs, five of which she wrote herself. The standout is the song I'm Gonna Love You, a very Sade-esque tune reminiscent of Smooth Operator.

Levitt's beautiful voice lends itself well to this hybrid mixture of jazz and folk, especially on I'm Gonna Love You and I Am. Levitt also includes a rendition of Gordon Lightfoot's The Way I Feel.

Levitt is a wonderful singer and a talented songwriter and hopefully this short CD is only the first of many. www.indievoice.com

Magnets used in coronary artery bypass operation

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Dr. Samuel Lichtenstein, a Vancouver-based surgeon has helped develop a new technique for coronary artery bypass operations.

The technique, which is drawing worldwide attention, involves connecting graft vessels to the coronary artery using magnets instead of hand stitching.

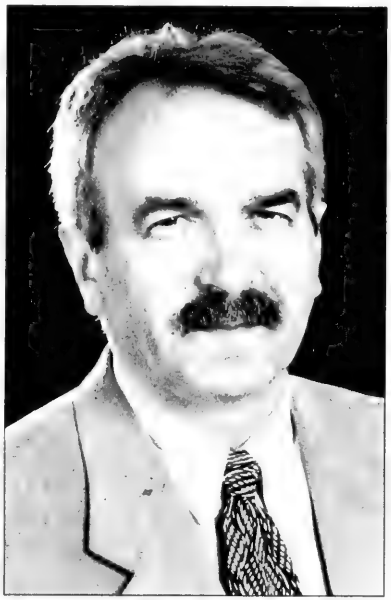
If proven successful, it could reduce the time-consuming, risky and delicate task of hand-stitching during coronary artery bypass graft surgery (CABG).

In this type of surgery doctors improve the flow of blood to the heart by bypassing clogged arteries and using healthy veins or arteries from other parts of the body instead.

They connect these vessels to the coronary artery in an operation, that due to the delicate task of suturing, could take up to five hours to complete.

Lichtenstein's discovery may render that task unnecessary.

"It's hard to know where this will go, but if it works it will be widely adopted," Lichtenstein said.



Dr. Samuel Lichtenstein

"Urologists are looking at the possibility of using the magnets for post-vasectomy operations, and gynaecologists are looking at it for the reconstruction of tubes after tubal ligation."

Thus far, the tiny, gold-coated magnets have been tested in research done on pigs, sheep and donated cadavers, and recently they were used on 33 patients in Frankfurt, Hanover and Leipzig, Germany.

Ventrica, the California-based company that provided Lichtenstein with the resources and engineering required to create the magnets, is not releasing the results of these operations until they have been evaluated by the scientific community.

Lichtenstein, 52, who was born in Poland, practised at Toronto General and St. Michael's hospitals prior to moving to Vancouver in 1993.

He now directs the heart centre at St. Paul's Hospital, and is head of cardiovascular and thoracic surgery there and at Vancouver General Hospital.

In addition, he is professor of surgery and physiology at the University of British Columbia.

In 1989, Lichtenstein demonstrated that cardiac surgery could be done at normal body temperature, a much less invasive method than the hypothermic temperatures that had been widely used until that time.

He holds several patents for biomedical devices, and he is currently "trying to figure out how to fix valves in the heart without doing heart surgery.

"As a youngster, I studied Gemarah, Rashi, and Talmud, and the idea of questioning intrigued me," he explained.

"My nature is not to accept dogma, and in medicine, there's a lot of things accepted as dogma that aren't true."

Canadian Food Inspection Agency recalls mini-cup jelly product

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Food Inspection Agency has issued a mandatory recall of a mini-cup jelly product deemed to be a serious choking hazard to children.

The danger was reported in The Canadian Jewish News on March 29 after the candy emerged in Purim mishloach manot packages.

Traditionally manufactured in south-east Asia, the individual tubular shaped jellies are about the size of a coffee creamer and are molded around a hard centre. Instead of gelatin, these jelly candies contain konjac, a binding agent made from the root of the konnjaku plant.

Danger of jelly candy reported in The CJN in March

At that time, the Kashrut Council (COR) and the Jewish Board of Education informed supermarkets under their jurisdiction and Jewish schools of the risks involved, and many kosher supermarkets removed the products from their shelves.

The current CFIA order requires all persons selling, marketing or distributing the product to recall it immediately and hopes to eventually have all affected products removed from the marketplace.

Dr. Warren Goldstein, one of the doctors who initiated the effort 18 months ago to get the products banned from Canada, said that about a month ago the struggle was escalated when he sent a petition to the Prime Minister's Office signed by more than 50 Toronto area doctors.

"It was great that the Jewish community responded so quickly when they were alerted of the danger," he said.

The product was recently banned in Australia, and Goldstein said that pediatricians in Israel have been alerted to the danger inherent in the candy.

For a list of the recalled products, see www.inspection.gc.ca/english/corpaffr/recarapp/20011120e.shtml or call 1-800-442-2342.m

Anti-Semitism abounds in European soccer

By ELI SHVIDLER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — The extraordinary events leading up to the recent match between Israel and Austria not only increased interest, excitement and anger among local sports fans, but also revived recollections of racist and anti-Semitic incidents in world sports, especially in soccer.

The controversial decisions by the Portuguese referee in the dying minutes of the match, which allowed Austria to earn the draw it required to keep Israel out of the World Cup, appeared to have been made as if they were carried out by express order of FIFA bosses who wanted to prevent Israel from making it to the finals at any cost.

If that interpretation appears to be a stretch, there are numerous other incidents in the annals of European soccer to indicate that anti-Jewish animus is alive and well.

The Italian soccer league is unrivaled in its fomenting racism and anti-Semitism. The "small group" of racist Lazio fans has long lost the label "small" and has become openly vocal in airing its views. It has no qualms about raising banners and chanting slogans against Jews and blacks at every opportunity.

The local derby against city rival Roma is always a good place for Lazio fans to openly display their hatred of anybody who is different. Targets for the fans' venom are Roma's black players and the opposing team's supporters, whom they like to call "filthy Jews." Recently, Lazio fans shouted to their counterparts: "Auschwitz is your home and the furnaces are your beds."

Roma fans did not stay silent either and, as expected, retorted with equally anti-Semitic chants of their own. Interestingly, Roma has the lion's share of support among the Jewish community in the "Eternal City."

There is no doubt that the transfer of former Israeli star Roni Rosenthal to the Italian team Udinese in the summer of 1987 was prevented by racist factions.

Today it is also clear that another top Israeli player, Eli Ohana, was denied the chance to play for another Italian squad, Atalanta, for similar reasons.

Soccer fans in Bergamo are notorious for their xenophobic tendencies, and were recently described by Carlo Mazzona, the coach of the northern Italian club, Brescia, as "100 percent racist." Italian ultra-right-wing groups rely on the support of soccer fans, where their foothold is particularly strong. Attempts by club bosses to fight racism, such as the Shalom Cup, have met stubborn resistance. Lazio, a main promoter of the event, has seen its fans stay away in droves and openly boycott the club's chair, Sergio Cragniotti.

Hapoel Tel Aviv (in red) versus European competition

The Italian Football Association (FA) has implemented a major crackdown on racism in the past two seasons, and the government has threatened to close down stadiums of clubs where fans openly display racism. But the campaign is not succeeding. Heavy fines and a public appeal by some of the world's top players to put an end to the practice have failed. Anti-Semitism and racism are flourishing in Italian soccer and have created fertile ground for ultra-right-wing elements to turn the disgraceful phenomenon into a national one.

In Germany, law enforcement agencies together with the DFB (the German FA) have long implemented preemptive measures to fight racism. Using intelligence-gathering on neo-Nazi elements, the authorities have distributed anti-racist publications and instilled the values of tolerance in young supporters, starting at school age.

Intensive action has also been taken at soccer grounds to isolate and stamp out incitement. German soccer, however, can still largely be divided between the former east and west. Neo-Nazi elements are far more prevalent and daring in the east than the west, but co-operation between the DFB and the police has had an effect in recent years.

In Holland, Dutch fans have been know to express racist hostility toward opposing teams. Ajax Amsterdam, considered the "unifying symbol" of the Netherlands, is to a large extent associated with Jews. Many Israeli flags can be seen flying in the stadium, and the Star of David has long become the squad's unofficial symbol.

But in Holland, success has bred hatred among the opposition, and the fact that Jewish symbols are associated so closely with Holland's most successful team has also led to frequent anti-Semitic responses. At the centre of the opposition and of the racism are fans of arch-rival club Feyenoord Rotterdam.

The mutual hatred between supporters of both clubs has already resulted in injuries and death from well-orchestrated street fights. When Feyenoord hosts Ajax or when the former plays in European competition, violence and anti-Semitic chanting are the norm. The club probably has the largest number of neo-Nazi supporters among Dutch outfits, and its skinhead followers are always a serious problem in both home and away games.

In France, the fans of Paris St. Germain (PSG) are among the country's most racist, and they openly denigrate Marseille supporters, whom one fan, a follower of ultra-right-winger Jean Marie Le Pen, described as "Afro-Arab supporters who reek of a Jewish scent."

When Maccabi Haifa played against PSG in Paris in 1998 in a European Cup Winners' Cup match, some home team fans shouted racist chants against the Israeli and Jewish spectators during the match and then threw stones and broken bottles at them afterward.

Not surprisingly, when Haifa won the return leg two weeks later to knock the Parisian side out of the competition, Marseille's supporters (Jews and Arabs alike) took to the streets in a victory parade gloating with their hated French league counterparts.

After overcoming the trauma of years behind the Iron Curtain, many far-right-wing parties have sprouted in eastern Europe. Not only do the authorities have little control over them, they even offer unwitting support through funding. The parties espouse white-supremacist ideology, and it is clear that local Jewish citizens are not part of those "white" races. Not surprisingly, soccer stadia are a hotbed for racism. About two months ago, two Israeli teams were exposed to naked anti-Semitism at the same venue: first, when Maccabi Tel Aviv played against Zalgiris Vilnius in the UEFA Cup, and a few days later when the national team met the Lithuanian squad. The chants were the same on both occasions: "Juden raus," "Jews to Auschwitz" and "May you burn alive here and in Palestine."

The Lithuanian FA apologized to its Israeli visitors and to the local Jewish community, and UEFA fined the Lithuanians more than $6,000.

Israel's national team was involved in another shameful event in Sarajevo recently when the home fans booed so loudly during the playing of Hatikva that the national anthem could not even be heard. The booing was almost as loud when Israeli fans booed during the playing of Austria's national anthem in the recent match in Ramat Gan Stadium.

A strange incident in Hungary occurred this summer when the fans of Ferencvaros, who are among the most violent and vehemently anti-Semitic in Europe, were stunned and deeply hurt to discover that a Jewish businessman had stepped in to save the club from bankruptcy. The matter was even raised in the Hungarian parliament by an ultra-right-wing party.

The fact the club is now under Jewish ownership did nothing to stop the fans' anti-Semitic chants during the city derby against MTK, a club with Jewish roots.

In Ukraine, a Jewish millionaire businessman, Grigoriy Surkis, president of Dynamo Kiev and a member of Parliament, heads the FA. Although several attempts have been made by rivals who use anti-Semitic innuendo in attempts to oust Surkis, the country's "Mr. Soccer" still maintains his positions of influence.

There are also a large number of racist fans from all age groups in Russia. Authorities have had to call in special anti-riot forces on many occasions to intervene and disperse rival supporters who have no compunction in "going to war" against each other.

Jews need to improve their PR

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Recently, I met with a professional of an Israeli association. Something she said still resonates in my head. With great distress she said, "Arab nations are forming international coalitions everywhere, and making their presence and impressions known internationally while we [Jews] are doing little to express our point of view." She's right.

The Arab world has taken great leaps in public relations and marketing. We have not. One need only look at the UN anti-racism conference in Durban this past September, when the Jewish world was rocked by the non-governmental agencies' (NGO) vote in favour of qualifying Israel as a racist state. These NGOs included, and were encouraged by, a very strong Arab contingent.

There was a Jewish presence at the conference, including representation from the Canadian Jewish Congress. They did their best, but ultimately their message was not nearly as thunderous and as planned as the Arabs' was: the latter worked painstakingly to establish an anti-Israel sentiment amongst the participants.

Because of our public relations failure, others determined the Jewish position for the world to hear. We sacrificed that battle because we weren't prepared. We're primed to lose future combats in the arena of words and clarity, but we don't have to.

There has been endless debate about the Jewish world's refusal to market itself in a determined manner. One theory holds that the problem began in the days of the White Papers when the British reneged on a promise to establish a Jewish state. The theory is that it was then that Jews said, "Whatever we say, the gentiles will do what they want."

Today the world is changing. E-mail, the Internet, political coalitions and other powerful forms of communication and organization are there for our use. We can use them to enlighten, influence and update the world on our position vis-a-vis war and peace, racism, our bid to establish relations with all states, or we can say, "What's the difference?"

The difference will be in how the future of the Jewish people unfolds. If we do not become conscious that we are voluntarily losing the war of words – where the casualties are often human life and truth, then let's understand that we are jeopardizing Israel and Jews everywhere. False information hurts.

It is time for all of us to seek out ways of being aggressive with our PR. We need to develop coalitions within the Jewish community and coalitions with other communities and organizations. This first requires the cessation of inter-denominational and inter-organizational infighting.

Our weapons of choice need to be front-line programs and social events with religious and ethnic groups who are willing to hear the truth. Let's educate ourselves about our history and about Israel, whichever way it spells out, so that all Jews are PR ambassadors.

Nationally and locally, we should establish a broad-based grassroots approach to government lobbying embracing the involvement of people at Beth Torah, Beth Tzedek, Beth Habonim and in all Canadian Jewish communities, including those in Kitchener, Saskatoon and Halifax.

Let's hire PR companies. Everyone else does. The Humane Society does. Why not call upon Jewishly-owned PR companies all over the Diaspora who are well versed in the chess-like tactics of public image to enlighten those who want to hear about our bid for peace and mutual co-existence?

I'm scared for our people. As long as we decide we need not market ourselves, the world will continue to make decisions about us based on false information disseminated by others. And the Jewish splendour, our own explanation of our blemishes and our acute concern for human life will all go unheard.

Our adversaries and enemies have grown. It's time we did the same.

About Life

Dear Ella,

What is it with men. I live with my husband and three sons, and all of them are equally lazy when it comes to cleaning.

I've never seen anything like it. They will sooner step over a pile of clothes or books rather than pick it up and put it away. You wouldn't believe the way the bathroom looks after my husband gets ready for work. Towels everywhere, water everywhere, clothes everywhere. It's like he was brought up in a pig sty, which I know he wasn't. His parents are very neat and tidy people. You can walk into my in-laws' house any time, unannounced, and find it spotless. After my husband and sons leave in the morning it takes me a couple of hours to get the house back into shape. Where did they learn to behave like this? Certainly not from me!

Mess Makers

Dear Mess Makers

First of all let me set one thing straight. This is not a gender-specific issue. Speaking from experience, I know there are many women out there that would feel just as comfortable stepping over a pile of anything without looking back. And have you every seen some ladies' hair and make up? Not pretty.

That being said, I have to wonder what would happen if you didn't spend that couple of hours cleaning their stuff after they left in the morning. It would be an interesting experiment to see what would happen when they ran out of towels, clothes and free floor space.

You are letting them act this way because there are no consequences. They still get to come home to a clean home and start all over. No one seems to be suffering but you. You know what they say, "If you can't beat 'em join 'em." I guarantee they will get the message before too long.

I'm sure you can get them to see your side of things if you make it just a little bit uncomfortable for them. Let them appreciate what you have been doing all this time. It may take a while – bad habits are hard to break – but you can do it and so can they.

Above is the scene outside the emergency department of Hadassah Hospital Saturday night where some of the injured from the suicide bombings were treated. Inset is the wreckage of the destroyed bus in Haifa. [Israel photos]

24 hours of systematic slaughter

Editorial

Just as the rescue workers – the medics, paramedics, ambulance drivers, doctors, nurses and others – ran Saturday night to save what lives they could, to comfort the horribly wounded and maimed youngsters moaning their pleas for help on the blood-soaked pavement of downtown Jerusalem, a car-bomb exploded in their midst.

So perverse, so all-consuming is this hatred of Jews!

Neither pity for a last breath nor deference for a dying agony is beyond the field of "battle" for Hamas' executioners or Islamic Jihad's "military" planners.

Ten Israelis, all of them young adults, were killed that night, blown to pieces by two Palestinian suicide bombers. More than 180 others were wounded, many of them severely, as nails and spikes planted in the bomb and shards of glass from the flying debris ripped or slashed through their bodies.

But the work of the Palestinian "freedom fighters" was not yet done. More Jews were targeted for death that night and the next morning.

Hours after the slaughter in downtown Jerusalem, a woman was shot to death near Kadim in the West Bank; a man was killed and three others were wounded at Alei Sinai in northern Gaza, and three people were wounded by snipers firing at Gilo from Beit Jalla.

In Haifa, at least 16 people were killed and some 60 more were injured by a suicide bomber on a city bus.

Twenty-eight Israelis were murdered; more than 200 were hurt during 24 hours of systematic slaughter at the hands of Palestinian murderers.

And in the streets of some Palestinian neighbourhoods in Lebanon and the West Bank, the paradise-seeking murderers were celebrated as heroes who unselfishly sanctified the name of God by killing Jewish children, rescue workers, unarmed civilians and the plain, unsuspecting, ordinary, working class folk who were riding a bus in the middle of the day.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Gay Shul Folds

TORONTO — Congregation Keshet Shalom (Rainbow of Peace), Toronto's synagogue for gay, lesbian and bisexual Jews, has announced it is folding by year's end. An unsigned press release states that members "would like to believe" the reason for the end of the congregation is that Jewish groups and agencies have opened their doors to homosexual Jews. Founded in 1992, Keshet Shalom was the successor group to Chutzpah, which was formed in the late 1980s. The congregation, which gathered at the Bloor JCC after being refused space at several other venues, once boasted a mailing list of 200.

ISRAEL

Compensation Talks

JERUSALEM — A Ukrainian delegation arrived in Israel last week to discuss compensation for the victims of a downed airliner. Ukraine's president, Leonid Kuchma, has promised to compensate the families of the 66 Israelis killed in the crash of a Sibir Airlines flight that was accidentally shot down Oct. 4 by a Ukrainian anti-aircraft missile over the Black Sea. The flight was on its way from Israel to the Siberian city of Novosibirsk.

Rail Line Bids

JERUSALEM — Israel is seeking bids to build a light-rail line. The $1 billion (US) line serving the greater Tel Aviv area would be Israel's first. The line is planned to be about 26 kilometres long.

Biotoxin Breakthrough

JERUSALEM — Researchers at Ben-Gurion University have developed a sophisticated sensor capable of detecting biotoxins in water reservoirs. The system, described as having considerable economic potential in overseas markets, is designed to protect water reserves from biological weapons attack.

Israelis Released

JERUSALEM — Israelis detained by the United States after the Sept. 11 attacks say they were treated "like terrorists." Five of the Israelis returned home last week after spending more than two months in jail on suspicion of participation in terrorist activities. They said they were placed in solitary confinement and held with Muslim and Arab prisoners who beat them, the Jerusalem Post reported. The Israelis, who worked for a New Jersey moving company, were arrested in a security sweep after neighbors told police they believed they were speaking Arabic.

WORLD

Get Day Extended

NEW YORK — L'maan B'nos Yisrael International, an organization dedicated to helping the plight of agunot, has extended its pre-Chanukah get day until the end of Chanukah. Throughout the week, batei din worldwide will be prepared to facilitate the get process, and costs will be covered by the organization. For information call 718-338-0833.

Israelis Killed

ZURICH — Two Israeli doctors and an economist were killed in the Nov. 24 crash of a Crossair plane. The 97-seat plane went down in a Swiss forest while attempting to land at Zurich Airport.

Muslims' Image

CAIRO — A conference opened here last week to discuss how to improve Westerners' image of Muslims. Amre Moussa, secretary-general of the Arab League, which is hosting the gathering, asked delegates whether they themselves were responsible for some of these negative attitudes. "Did we try to explain our culture, our civilization to others?" he asked.

Teachers' Seminar

WARSAW — Teachers from across Poland are slated to attend a seminar this month on the fate of Polish Jews during and after the Holocaust. Organized by the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw, the Dec. 8-9 seminar is designed for history, religion and Polish-language teachers in primary and secondary schools.

Mass Graves

LUBLIN — Archeologists have found mass graves at the former Nazi death camp in Sobibor. The excavations were the first since World War II at the camp, located in eastern Poland. The graves could provide valuable new evidence about the number of victims. According to official Polish accounts, 250,000 people, mostly Jews, were liquidated there.

Mussolini Street?

ROME — A plan by the mayor of a town in Sicily to name a street in honor of Italy's wartime fascist dictator Benito Mussolini is drawing protests. The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has condemned the proposal, launched by Mayor Guido Costa of the town of Tremestieri Etneo.

Is Israel Trying to Pay Off Pollard?

JERUSALEM — As Jonathan Pollard begins his 17th year in jail for passing classified information to Israel, the Israeli government is reportedly looking to pay him off.

According to Larry Dub, Pollard's attorney in Israel, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's government offered Pollard $2 million (US). In exchange, Dub said, Israel would no longer have the responsibility of seeking Pollard's release.

The offer was brought to the imprisoned Pollard on Nov. 14 by an Israeli envoy, according to Justice for Jonathan Pollard, a group advocating Pollard's release. Pollard and his Toronto-based wife, Esther, immediately rejected the offer.

A spokesperson for cabinet minister Dan Naveh, who is dealing with the issue on behalf of the government, refused to comment.

The Knesset last week marked the 16th anniversary of Pollard's incarceration. Legislator Michael Kleiner, who initiated the Nov. 21 session, accused successive Israeli governments of abandoning Pollard.

"Our government is willing to do a lot in order to return the bodies of soldiers so they can be buried in Israel, but prefers to bury Pollard alive," Kleiner charged.

Dub, too, had harsh words for the Israeli government.

"The government is obviously embarrassed because it's trying to buy off the Pollards," Dub said.

Islamic sounds of silence

Jewish leaders want Muslim moderates in Canada to speak up

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When teaching children, silence can speak volumes.

As Jews confront the hard choices facing Israel, many Jewish leaders feel Canadian Muslims have remained quiet on difficult issues facing the Muslim community, such as moderation, terrorism and anti-Semitism.

Death threats don't faze Muslim editor

please see page 14

Jewish representatives note that Jews are actively debating the plight of the Palestinians, wondering about the possibility of a shared Jerusalem and struggling over the future of settlements in the West Bank and Gaza.

And as adults attempt to deal with the situation, their children have responded in kind.

As part of the recent professional development day given by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, teachers watched Promises, a documentary in which Israeli, Palestinian and Arab-Israeli children articulate their perceptions of the Middle East conflict.

The Israeli children in the film discuss the rights of their Arab counterparts and voice their frustrations over their inability to solve the problem.

But not one Arab child in the movie expressed a willingness to accept the State of Israel in any form.

"We decided to show this film because we're all desperately concerned about Israel," said BJE executive director Seymour Epstein.

"In addition, teachers are all interested in children's voices," he said. "This film articulates many of the issues confronting the adult world in Israel today.

"One of the things that we see in the movie is that the Palestinian children do not come close to being empathetic to Israel.

"Where are the moderate Muslims?" Epstein asked. "Where are the lovers of Jews?"

A search of North American Muslim Web sites reveals many articles denouncing Zionism and the State of Israel and denying archeological evidence of any historical Jewish presence in Jerusalem.

And a recent report conducted by the non-profit New York-based Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace found that when teaching Palestinian children, the concept of peace is not found anywhere in Palestinian Authority textbooks.

Furthermore, "textbooks refer only to tolerance between Muslims and Christians. The Jews are not mentioned."

Zionism is only mentioned in a negative context and Hebrew is not considered one of the languages of the land, the report states.

"The State of Israel is not recognized. Its name does not appear on any map, nor do any towns, villages or projects ... Israel is presented as the usurper and occupier since its establishment in 1948.

"Jerusalem is presented as belonging to the Palestinians alone.

"Reference to the Jews is minimal... these references, however, contain negative generalizations attributing traits of trickery, greed and barbarity to the Jews, and insinuations that they do not keep agreements and treaties as Muslims do."

Given a history which reflects mutual cooperation, Epstein said there is every reason to believe that Muslims and Jews could create a model of co-existence in the Middle East, but the current radical Arab position that Israel should be Juden-free seems to be drowning out moderate voices.

"Being silent isn't enough," he noted. "We should expect more. Being silent is to perpetuate anti-Semitism and the position that the Jews don't have a right to their own state."

In North America, say Jewish community representatives, Muslim leaders are either evasive or quiet when it comes to the question of accepting the legitimate right of the State of Israel to exist.

Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations at Canadian Jewish Congress, said that modern Muslim anti-Semitism, fuelled by Islamic fundamentalism, often builds on centuries-old Christian anti-Semitism and aligns itself with modern Holocaust denial.

The current anti-Semitic conspiracy rhetoric also implies that Jews are behind most international events, such as the Sept. 11 disaster.

"While there are elements within Islam which can be positively disposed towards Judaism, the 21st century has seen the development of Islamism, a totalitarian, political ideology," Prutschi said.

"Because its purpose is to impose itself as the system which would be operative in all societies, it is very much opposed to and in conflict with the West.

"And it is within this context that the presence of a sovereign Jewish state in the Middle East is viewed."

But this view is not only held by Islamist terrorist groups such as Hamas and the Islamic Jihad, Prutschi said. Arab radical nationalists who are more secular in their approach to

Reflections from the G.A. (3)

At 7:00 A.M. on the last day of the General Assembly last month in Washington, I went to hear two of modern Jewry's most exciting and original thinkers expound upon "the state of world Jewry." It was the highlight of the assembly for me.

In last week's column I recorded some of the thoughts imparted by the first of the two speakers, Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz. This week I write about the second speaker.

There is not a legal scholar on earth who has not heard of Irwin Cotler. He is both torch and torch bearer for the most important causes of humanity, one of the planet's highest authorities on the subject of human rights.

Since the very first moment he stood behind a classroom lectern or before a convocation of his peers his chief motto has always been: Speak truth to power.

Readers of The CJN are, of course, familiar with Irwin Cotler, the Member of Parliament for Mount Royal. He often writes in the paper; the paper often writes about him. Indeed, as recently as Nov. 8 he appeared on our front page.

Cotler is a compelling orator. He discourses on a subject the way infantry assaults a hill: full force, frontally, relentlessly, with wave after wave of facts, statistics, argument, logic and passion.

Ever since he returned in early September from Durban, a fire has raged within him; it "consumes" him and compels him to shout out wherever and whenever he can, a warning of the terrible dangers he saw foreshadowed there, at what he called the UN's "festival of hate".

Cotler was part of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations' Conference Against Racism. What he witnessed there was ominous and ugly. He admitted to the sparse audience in attendance that morning that he was unprepared for the coarse anti-Semitism and brazen hatred that was directed at Israel and at Jews.

The campaign to delegitimize the State of Israel, thought by many to have been overtaken and made irrelevant by the assumptions of Oslo, has returned in earnest to the UN. It is at the top of the Islamic nations' agenda. And the Jewish world had better be prepared!

That campaign will have a number of battlefields.

In Geneva, this week, at the UN Committee on Human Rights, Israel will again be falsely condemned for alleged violations of the terms of the Geneva Convention. The committee will use the occasion to single out and vilify Israel – again – and place on the distorted record more fraudulent accusations against the Jewish state of "crimes against humanity."

In February of next year, the International Criminal Court in The Hague, will open its doors for "business." Cotler fully expects hostile "non-aligned" and Islamic leaders will attempt to bring Israeli leaders before the court on charges of having committed "war crimes," or "crimes against humanity," or "genocide."

These accusations permeated the final documents drafted at the preparatory regional conference in Tehran prior to the Durban meeting and were subsequently endorsed, in one form or another, by the Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) and the various governments.

Cotler urged us to draw at least six conclusions from the Durban conference.

- "Assaultive speech is dangerous," Cotler said.

We should no longer dismiss vile statements of hate as inconsequential ravings of inconsequential people. For, violence always begins here, with what the haters say. "Durban was akin to reading Mein Kampf; Sept. 11 was akin to seeing a new Kristallnacht."

- "A new anti-Jewishness anchored in classical anti-Semitism is now abroad. Classical anti-Semitism denies individual Jewish particularity; the new campaign denies national particularity for the Jews." Or put another way by Cotler, "[T]he Jews, as a people, do not have the right to be among us a people, as an independent state."
- The UN has been hijacked by the Islamic Conference and its supporters. It must be held to account for its perverse behaviour. Thirty percent of all UN Human Rights Committee indictments over the past 22 years have been registered against Israel.
- The NGO movement has also been hijacked by the Islamic Conference and its supporters.
- The real battles are on university campuses. They are the "front lines" of Jewish defence. Our students must be supported with the necessary resources to tell their adversaries to "back off." Cotler recited the example of Peleg Reshef, the chairman of the World Union of Jewish Students, who came to the literal rescue of fellow Jewish students who were being harassed and intimidated by a group of menacing pro-Palestinian demonstrators in Durban.
- "Anti-terrorism must be now be seen as a universal principle for all humanity." The most profound denial of human rights is the assault on human life. Therefore strategies aimed at defeating terrorism are also aimed at protecting human rights. All terrorism is unacceptable.

We must, all of us, catch a spark from the fire that rages within Cotler.

Ontario on high alert, says security adviser

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario is much safer today than it was on Sept. 10, says Maj.-Gen. Lewis MacKenzie, who was recently appointed security adviser to the provincial government.

"The threat has not changed, but America was wrapped in cotton batting [before Sept. 11]," MacKenzie said at last week's regional executive meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

MacKenzie, a native of Truro, N.S., was in the military for 33 years before retiring in 1993. He spent nine years in Germany with NATO forces, and was on nine peacekeeping tours in six areas, including the Gaza Strip, Cyprus, Vietnam, Cairo, Central America and Sarajevo.

He said that Israelis have learned to live with the threat of terrorism, "and we'll get used to it in North America... We have to stay alert and allocate security as a relatively high priority."

Lewis MacKenzie

He already detects a degree of complacency within society, he said, "particularly in Ontario. [People might be thinking] that maybe [Sept. 11] was just one day of a really nasty series of events in our neighbour's backyard. That thinking is the most dangerous thing of all."

Ontario is a high-value target, MacKenzie said, and we are on high alert. "There is more American presence in Ontario, in terms of investment, infrastructure and diplomats, than in some U.S. states."

The two highest profile targets in Canada – the federal government and Toronto – are in Ontario, he said. "We are high value because we are near the media. It's no good conducting an attack if it's not going to be covered instantly.

"The attack also has to have an impact on the economy and it has to hit major population centres," he said.

But some good has come out of the disaster, he said. It has driven ministries to co-operate and share information. "We are actually sharing information with the feds because it is in our self-interest to do so."

Counter-terrorism, said MacKenzie, is 90 percent intelligence-gathering and 10 percent actual action. "In the last 10 years, however, the key organizations that contribute to the intelligence process have been dramatically reduced [in order] to fight the deficit."

Ontario is now injecting additional funds into the OPP's counter-terrorism unit, as well as into the police college for counter-terrorism courses, he said.

"Funds are also going towards training and educating high building managers in evacuation procedures," he said.

He was on a military tour in Toronto during the Mississauga train disaster in 1979 "and the world literally came to the doorstep of Mayor Hazel McCallion asking how she [handled the disaster] so well.

"Her answer was that she had run an exercise two weeks earlier – the only exercise she had ever run. The message there is we have to run an exercise; we have to practise."

Asked about his view of profiling as a law enforcement technique, MacKenzie said it is common sense to carefully check a planeload of people who come from a country that supports terrorism. "Racial profiling is far more insidious... This is not racial profiling, it's common sense."

Citing statistics, MacKenzie said that among other things, if one Canadian mall is totally destroyed every month due to terrorism, someone's chance of dying is one in six million. "The chance of dying of heart disease is one in 400, but I don't see people cleaning up their act by way of diet and exercise.

"We have to keep things in perspective and we have to get used to the fact that we have to live with it."

As for travelling to Israel, MacKenzie said that it is probably safer there now than ever before. "The threat has not changed since Sept. 11."

Beef up police hate-crime units: CJC

TORONTO — The Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress has called on the provincial government and municipal police forces to ensure that fighting hate crimes remains a priority.

CJC's call came on the heels of reports that there is currently only one full-time officer attached to the Toronto Police hate crimes squad, down from the usual two.

Toronto Police officials say the second position, which reportedly has been vacant for at least two months, will be filled soon.

-And the Ontario Provincial Police say they recently doubled the budget of the OPP's hate crimes unit to $400,000.

Congress says a fully functioning hate crimes squad is needed now more than ever.

"The horrific events of Sept. 11 and the United Nations Durban conference on racism have given extremists an explicit opportunity to peddle their hateful messages," said Frank Bialystok, chair of the Ontario region's community relations committee.

"Many communities have been cruelly targeted over the past ten weeks. In our community we have been victimized by synagogue defacements, anthrax hoaxes and threats of physical violence. We have seen Web sites that resurrect some of the oldest hatreds against Jews and other religious groups, and speak of these groups in such a way that encourages violence," Bialystok said in a statement.

CJC says "immediate steps" must be taken to increase the strength of municipal police hate crimes squads. Citing the Toronto Police anti-hate unit, Congress notes that when properly staffed, it has demonstrated its effectiveness in dealing with hate propaganda.

"It is well and good that the province has significantly increased the budget of the OPP hate crimes unit," stated Bialystok. "But the majority of Ontario's population lives in the large urban centres. Cities such as Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton, London and Kitchener will receive no benefit from this increase. Doesn't it make sense to allocate resources to where they are most needed?"

New head of Israeli tourism office arrives in Toronto

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — One of Israel's most experienced tourism specialists has come to Canada to head the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) in Toronto for the next four years.

Dani Shahal, who has worked in the Israeli ministry of tourism since 1967, has big plans for Canadians, and especially the Canadian Jewish community. He would like us to come to Israel in record numbers.

"I may sound a bit ambitious," Shahal said as he began to outline his goals in an interview at his Bloor Street W. office.

"The year 2000 was the best year ever regarding traffic from Canada to Israel. More than 50,000 Canadians visited Israel that year. My aim is to double that figure in the next four years – to reach a figure of 100,000 visitors from Canada by the year 2005."

Previous IGTO officials may also have sounded ambitious when they set a target of 50,000 visitors from Canada in the Christian millennium year, Shahal said, but that target was achieved.

"Although things are quite tough now for many reasons – the geopolitical situation, the economic situation all over the world, and what's happened after the 11th of September – we need to show people that although we've got difficulties, we are still existing as a tourist destination.

"We've got problems, no doubt, mainly in the territories. I don't want to say that life is as it was before the intifadah. But people in Israel are still going to shops, theatres, cinemas. They're sitting in the cafes and restaurants. They're going to the sea. They're living their lives."

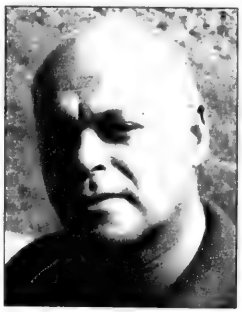
Rather than concentrating on a major promotional push, Shahal said the IGTO is focused on "showing the flag of Israel" across Canada, especially at travel trade fairs.

"We want to show that life in Israel is still going on and that people are still visiting Israel on vacation."

Shahal has done his homework on Canada and its Jewish community. "You've got a very warm Jewish community of 350,000 that is very supportive of Israel," Shahal said. "People told me I made the right decision to come here because of that."

But he noted a pattern that could put the Jewish community to shame.

In times of increased political tension betweeen Israelis and Palestinians, Canadian Jews – but not Christians – seem to stay away from Israel in droves, Shahal said. A group of about 500 Christian pilgrims, led by Rev. David Mainse of Toronto, has recently returned from Israel, he noted.



Dani Shahal

It would be a mistake to presume that Canadian Christians were more devoted to Israel, since many Canadian Jews plan to visit Israel when the situation improves, he said. However, he urged Jews not to wait too long.

"Israel badly needs your support, and your most effective support right now will be by coming to Israel, filling up the hotels, and visiting the tourist facilities in order to strengthen the economy," Shahal said.

"I don't want to promise you roses, but... you'll see that life is going on. It's especially recommended that you come this winter, to escape from the cold in Canada to our nice, sunny Israeli winter in Eilat."

Shahal said the number of Canadians going to Israel has dropped dramatically in light of Israel's unique political difficulties, as well as the events of Sept. 11, which have dragged down the global tourism industry.

"But I'm quite optimistic," he said. "I think that people will eventually start traveling again. I've heard from people in the travel trade that business travel has picked up again.

"It's true that leisure and vacation traffic is still down 30 to 40 per cent. I don't know when it will pick up but I hope it will be soon."

Born in Haifa in 1944, Shahal has lived to see other dreams realized. In 1967 he was among an early wave of soldiers to enter the Old City of Jerusalem. "I put a note in the Western Wall," he said. "It was the dream of my life. People don't understand the meaning or the emotion of this."

As a representative of the ministry of tourism, he has been posted to South Africa and Europe, and he has worked domestically to persuade Israelis to take more vacations at home.

He says he has faced tough challenges before, such as the chills in the travel industry that attended the first intifadah and the Gulf War, but he said Sept. 11 has produced an even deeper chill. He's waiting for the improvements he knows will come.

Meantime, he says that he and his wife are "looking forward" to their first Canadian winter and that he has been trying on coats to find one to see him through to spring.

HEARTS OF STONE!

For Jews, this past year has been the most difficult in 50. Filled with bombings, terrorism, shock, sorrow and tears in Israel and New York - perhaps no one has suffered as much as The Schevischurder family in Israel.

They lost five members in the Jerusalem "Sbarro" bombing.

The parents were with 5 of their 8 children when a suicide bomber detonated a knapsack filled with nails and explosives. The mother and two daughters A"H were killed instantly. The father and son A"H lay mortally wounded and died after reciting the Shema Yisrael together. Two young girls aged 8 and 10 were injured, one very seriously.

The 3 brothers not with the family found their sisters in the hospital. Then they came together for the five concurrent funerals which took place on Mount Menuchot in Jerusalem.

The father Mati was a Jewish studies teacher and the mother Tzirel worked with deaf children. They left a small amount of life insurance. The remaining 5 children aged 8 to 21, are destitute and facing a crisis. The youngest girl faces many surgeries and long term therapy.

WON'T YOU PLEASE HELP?

We need every Jew to help these five orphans financially. We can defeat those with hearts of stone. Charitable tax receipts will be issued for donations of $18 and up. Please give generously. In the merit of this mitzva may you and all of Israel be blessed with a year of health, happiness and peace. Thank you.

The Palestinian attacks had a twofold aim: to kill Jews and to send an unequivocal message to the American administration. Their message was simply this: "We will have no peace with Israel because we will not have an Israel."

On the very day last week that retired Marine Corps general Anthony Zinni and assistant secretary of state for Near East affairs William Burns, the two American envoys, arrived in Israel to try to get the parties back to the negotiating table, Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Fatah operatives let loose their new barrage of wanton killing and suicide bombings against Israeli civilians.

But now it is the turn of Israel – and it is hoped, the American administration and the West – to deliver an equally unequivocal message to the broad audience of the Palestinian people and others. That message is simply this: Israel's destiny is to forever be a sovereign, freedom-loving, Jewish state in the Middle East.

No actions by its enemies will alter this. No force, no violence, no terrorism, no ghoulish, grisly, glorified cowardice by Palestinian "martyrs," nothing will ever change this.

If the Palestinian leaders and their people cannot accommodate themselves to this truth, their destiny will be to forever live squandered lives.

Yasser Arafat, is very likely at the final crossroads of his leadership. His charade is over. There is hardly a leader in the West who has the patience any longer or the politesse to endure his prevarications, dissembling and deceit. It is well-documented and proven to the satisfaction of honest, objective western observers that Yasser Arafat is personally, directly and deliberately responsible for the culture of hatred of and violence towards Jews that predominates in Palestinian society.

It is not only Israel now that demands of him that he root out Palestinian terror networks. U.S. President George W. Bush minced no words Sunday: "Mr. Arafat must do everything in his power to find the terrorists and bring them to justice." Secretary of State Colin Powell, Zinni and other western leaders said much the same thing.

Canada too must send a similarly sharp message to the Palestinian Authority leader. Expressions of horror and revulsion are no longer sufficient. Canada must show by its deeds that there will be consequences to Arafat's indifference or unwillingness to stop the violence and terror. Changing our voting record at the UN is a good place to begin.

Meanwhile, Israel will choose the hour, the timing, the method and the place for meting out just punishment upon the planners and perpetrators of the latest slaughter of its citizens. The war against terror will be fought in the hills of Judea and Samaria and the alleyways of Gaza, as well as in the mountains of Afghanistan. Any attempt to deny that it should will now be seen for the hypocrisy, or worse, that it is.

It's time to grow

I commend Mr. Rosenzweig (The CJN, Nov. 29) on his lofty ideas with respect to improving Jewish public relations. God know we need it. Moreover, his forthrightness is appreciated. He is correct in stating that a prerequisite is the cessation of interdenominational and interorganizational infighting.

Based on recent tangible experience, my illusions were shattered. I personally approached three organizations, one was an umbrella Christian group, another an umbrella Islamic group and last a Jewish organization, to jointly coordinate a community stand against terrorism. They each declined. We went ahead anyway.

But the message only serves to reflect that the "false information" or lack of information or true information out there is acceptable to us as a community. It's obviously better than standing up publicly for what is right. Or for that matter losing focus on our individual agendas.

Right on Mr. Rosenzweig, it's time to grow.

Bribes won't catch terrorists

Who gave Jean Chrétien the authority, last month, to forgive Pakistan's $447 million debt with Canada? Who gave the prime minister power to convert a business loan to foreign aid? What did Canadians get in exchange for such a generous gesture? Did parliament vote on this? Did Chrétien's own cabinet?

Someone needs to remind Canada's prime minister of the conditions placed on such a debt in the first place and just how many of those conditions were violated. Pakistan promised us naive Canadians that they would not convert our nuclear technology, from the sale of a Candu Reactor, into an atomic bomb. Doesn't Chrétien remember that Pakistan broke the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Agreement and Canada was chastised by many western nations as a result?

I trust Chrétien understands that bribing foreign governments is not the way to capture terrorists.

Now is the time to talk tough, Jean.

Belgium the accused, not the accuser

Let us bring the country of Belgium up for war crimes for helping to deport 50,000 Jews to Auschwitz and Birkenau from 1942 to 1944. We know that on Jan. 15, 1944, with the help of the commanders of the Belgian army under King Leopold III, Belgium helped the Nazis round up the Jews in the smaller towns of Belgium.

Jews trying to escape were turned back and ended up in the hands of the Nazis. We should ask for trials and reparations from Belgium before [their trials of others] get out of hand.

Should we celebrate Halloween?

While the writer of this article (The CJN, Nov. 22) has covered the historical development of Halloween from the pagan era to the Catholic Church's adaptation of All Saints Day, she neglected to investigate the harrowing times that Jews have experienced in many communities in Europe on Halloween night. It was a night when, under the mask, your neighbours and friends were able to attack you without revealing who they were. There is live testimony today of people who dreaded this night more than any other night during the year. This would be an excellent additional reason for us as Jews not to celebrate Halloween, but rather to use it as a teaching tool to impress upon our children that we live in a wonderful democracy where we can all be loyal Canadian citizens with the right to celebrate our own holidays while respecting all other religions and their customs.

Missed opportunities

I am writing to express my sincerest appreciation for the many years of hard work by different institutions to educate the members of our community in the disastrous consequences of prejudice and discrimination. Hatred of different religions, races, sexes, and lifestyles, always had catastrophic results, as was most tragically demonstrated during the Holocaust. These types of educational endeavours are particularly important now, after Sept. 11. There are hundreds of professionals and volunteers who work year round to plan and implement those programs, to find high-calibre speakers, to locate appropriate venues, to fundraise and to publicize these events. Congratulations to all for such successful fall programs.

I have lectured and have also attended many of the interesting lectures offered to the community, usually from the end of October to the first two weeks of November at The Jewish Book Fair and Holocaust Education Week. Because of the overlap between these events, it is impossible to attend many worthwhile programs.

Since thousands of hours have been invested into these programs, shouldn't people be given the chance to benefit from most of the programs, rather than having to make choices?

If the goal of these events is truly to educate, then the officials in charge may wish to consider a change in scheduling to prevent the overlap. Such change would allow more people to attend more events.

Jews, circumcision and Chanukah

By RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

Brit milah, the mitzvah of circumcision as a sign of the covenant between God and the Jews, was one of the key religious practices criticized and prohibited by the Seleucid Empire. The continued commitment to circumcision was a significant factor in the revolt of the Hasmoneans against this Hellenic kingdom. Circumcision is still the oldest continually practised ritual of Judaism and has been maintained wherever Jews have lived and under all circumstances.

Yet this core commandment of Judaism is currently under attack from medical ethicists and child-rights advocates. While not yet specifically directed against Judaism, the accusation that infant circumcision is a brutal assault against defenceless children requires a response.

The anti-circumcision movement makes the following claims:

- No one has the right to injure another person.
- Circumcision causes physical pain and psychological harm.
- Circumcision will deprive the child of sexual pleasure later in life.
- There is no valid medical or social reason for this procedure.
- The religious traditions that call for boys to be circumcised should re-examine their practice.

I think the anti-circumcision movement is wrong. In response, we should note that our tradition has long held that the body is sacred and must be treated with respect and reverence. The Torah prohibits inflicting injury on oneself or another. Surgery of any sort is only permissible if there is a valid reason for the procedure.

While these affirmations are similar to those made by the opponents of circumcision, we differ from our detractors because we believe circumcision is a core religious commandment, and that constitutes a valid reason for its performance. Moreover, when properly carried out by a skilled mohel, it causes minimal pain to the infant. The increased use of anesthesia in ritual circumcision eliminates the claim of pain as a consideration. There is also evidence that most Jewish men are not in deep psychological pain because of their circumcisions, nor that circumcision leaves one more sensitive to skin pain or deprives one of sexual pleasure.

While secular, social reasons may not justify it, the most recent position of the American Academy of Pediatrics is that there are "potential medical benefits to circumcision." These long-term advantages provide sufficient warrant for the short-term risk or pain involved in the procedure.

The entire concept of pain is framed by our cultural matrix. If an act is understood as lacking pain, then it is perceived as good. The experience of walking on burning coals is only one such example. The modern western world has developed a culture that is overly sensitive to pain and suffering. This concept does cause psychological pain, for it teaches children that they can endure almost nothing. Ritual circumcision was a statement of religious commitment that prepared Jews for other difficult decisions.

While these ethical justifications legitimate the possibility of circumcision, they are not our primary reasons for this act. Jews view circumcision through the prism of Torah. Circumcision is a mitzvah, a religious commandment. While the formal term for circumcision is brit milah, the covenant of circumcision, the popular and common terminology is simply brit or bris, which means covenant. The circumcision procedure is performed on the male generative organ to symbolize that the covenant is passed on from one generation to another.

"As for you, you and your offspring to come throughout the ages shall keep My covenant. Such shall be the covenant between Me and you and your offspring to follow, which you shall keep. Every male among you shall be circumcised. You shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin, and that shall be the sign of the covenant between Me and you. Throughout the generations, every male among you shall be circumcised at the age of eight days. Thus shall my covenant be marked in your flesh as an everlasting covenant" (Genesis 17 :9-13).

The story of Chanukah
[courtesy the Library of the JTS]

In recent years, some Jewish women have developed rituals to welcome a child into the covenant. In addition to the traditional naming ceremony when a parent is called to the Torah, many now celebrate a brit habat (daughter's covenant) or a simchat bat (daughter's joy) at home. We provide families with such a ceremony to enhance the simchah of the birth of a girl. While not involving any surgical procedure, the ritual affirms the significance of the covenant and emphasizes that this newborn daughter will have an important role among our people. While some have argued that a similar non-invasive ritual should replace the brit milah, circumcision remains a powerful rite because it is hallowed both by religious commandment and historical continuity.

The contemporary clashes over circumcision are actually revisions of ancient disputations and ideas. Hellenistic culture viewed circumcision as mutilation of the body. Ancient Greek and Latin writers often attacked the Jews for the practice. We know of Jews during the days of the Maccabees who underwent reverse circumcisions so that they could appear in the gymnasia and wrestle without any distinction between Jew and gentile. One of the oppressive regulations established by the Seleucid Empire against Judaism prohibited circumcision. Part of the history of Chanukah was the struggle to defend our right to worship God in our way and not to define religious practice by the perceptions of the majority culture.

Midrash Tanchuma reflects that ancient debate. It tells of a discussion between the Roman governor Tineus Rufus and Rabbi Akiva. Rufus asks Rabbi Akiva why the Jewish people are circumcised, since circumcision damages what God had formed. "The works of human beings are more beautiful than those of the Holy One," Rabbi Akiva replies.

To prove his point, Rabbi Akiva presents ears of grain and delicate breads to Rufus, saying: "The ears of grain are the work of the Holy One, the breads are the work of human beings – are not the loaves of bread better?" He then brings stalks of flax and woven garments, explaining: "The first are the work of God; the second, the work of humans. Are not the garments more beautiful?"

For Rabbi Akiva and other Jews, circumcision added value to the human body. This theology asserts that we are partners with God in creation. In the Torah, circumcision is called an ot, a sign of the covenant and an indication of our commitment to participate with God in this process. Our role is to improve the world in which God has placed us. We grind and bake grain into bread. We spin and weave flax into garments. We work with other people to cultivate just and peaceful societies. We bring the Divine Presence into the world through our prayers and our deeds.

In the Talmud (Menachot 43b), our masters taught: "Beloved are Israel, whom the Holy One surrounded with commandments; tfillin on their heads, tfillin on their arms, four tzitzit on their garments, mezuzot on their doorposts." Of these, King David said, "Seven times a day do I praise You by heeding Your righteous ordinances" (Psalms 119:164). Once when King David went into a bathhouse, he saw himself standing naked. David exclaimed: "Woe is me. I stand naked without a commandment." But when he noticed the circumcision on his body, his mind was set at ease. According to this midrash, God provided us with physical mitzvot that serve as reminders of our covenant with God.

In the bathhouse, King David found himself exposed without tfillin or tzitzit and there were no mezuzot. Naked in a place of potential corruption, without the physical reminders of the covenant, King David worried that he might deviate from God's ways. He was consoled by the realization that wherever he would be, the seal of God's covenant would be in his flesh. Circumcision was seen as a pathway to the presence of God. It was a zchut, a benefit for the child.

We know that in the ancient world there were many more women than men who converted to Judaism. Perhaps the fear of circumcision held the men back. Paul of Tarsus saw circumcision as an impediment for those who wished to follow Jesus. Jeremiah had earlier spoken of the circumcision of the heart as a metaphor for devotion to God. Paul used that idea to contend that one no longer needed physical circumcision if the person was devoted to Jesus as the pathway to God. Many years later, Augustine would criticize the Jews for being carnal, overly concerned with the flesh and lacking spirituality because of our practice of brit milah. This deep disagreement with Christianity stemmed from our belief that the physical is part of the spiritual, not antithetical to it.

Despite criticism from Greeks and Romans, from Christians and now from modern antagonists, we affirmed and continued the mitzvah of circumcision. Under Nazi domination and during the dangerous days of Stalinist rule, many surreptitiously sought ways to circumcise their sons. Uncircumcised adults from the former Soviet Union, now living in freedom, often seek a brit milah as one of their first acts of reconnecting to the Jewish tradition and the Jewish people. For the real reason we observe this mitzvah is not medical. Brit milah is a sacred moment for the Jewish people and a peak instant of holiness in the life of a family.

A mohel can make this moment both safe and sacred. Our community is blessed by the presence of many fine mohalim who have been certified by various Orthodox, Conservative and Reform rabbinical bodies. They have met the standards set by each of these movements for Jewish observance, ritual knowledge and medical skill.

In his book It's a Mitzvah!, Rabbi Bradley Artson writes, "The mitzvah of brit milah is the oldest continually practised ritual in the world. Ever since the time of Abraham, almost 4,000 years ago, Jewish parents have brought their sons into the brit, the covenant between God and our people through the practice of brit milah. In giving this gift to our sons, we provide membership in an eternal people, bestow the blessing of holiness and sanctity, respond to the will of God, and affirm our families' commitment to the lofty moral standards of the Torah and our Jewish traditions. We publicly assert that the repeated attempts to destroy our people or malign our practices will not succeed. We affirm that our families will provide an ongoing link to our privileged past and our messianic future."

This Chanukah, as we ponder the mystery and the miracle of our survival as a people, let us also reflect on how some conflicts do not go away; they merely reappear in different guise. Our task today, as it was for the Maccabees long ago, is to remain vigilant to defend our faith and to be committed to continue it in the future.

This article deals with the American, not the Canadian, Red Cross. It is based on a memorable essay by Lawrence Eagleburger, a former U.S. secretary of state. His piece was originally published in the Oct. 30 edition of the Washington Post, and its content was widely circulated.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Regrettably, as far as I could tell, the Canadian news media made hardly a mention of the resignation of Dr. Bernadine Healy as president of the American Red Cross. What should have been communicated to the public was that (as Eagleburger claims) Healy was forced out of office by a secret vote of the American Red Cross board.

People both here and in the United States assumed her dismissal was related to an alleged misspending of contributions that had flooded the Red Cross after the Sept. 11 tragedy in New York and Washington, D.C. Some of the funds were said not to have gone to bereaved families as the original plan had been, but instead went to Red Cross administrative needs. (That issue has since been resolved.) However, Healy's resignation had nothing to do with that, but had to do with Jews.

From time to time, I have made reference in this column to the discrimination which the international Red Cross organizations have practised against Israel. The Jewish State's parallel group is called the Magen David Adom (the Red Star of David). That organization has never been admitted to the international bodies of the Red Cross, because they have bowed to Arab pressure not to acknowledge the legitimacy of the Magen David, and therewith the legitimacy of Israel. Therefore, while the Christian Cross and the Muslim Red Crescent are acceptable, the Jewish symbol is not. Thus the campaign to delegitimize Israel has been, in effect, supported by the international Red Cross.

Some time ago, Healy was successful in persuading the board of the American Red Cross to withhold the organization's dues from the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies, a tactic that came close to changing the anti-Israel policy of the latter institution. But before that happened, the American board was persuaded to get rid of Healy.

Eagleburger writes that before long, the American Red Cross, under its new and surely more "moderate" leadership, will return to paying its dues and avoiding the issue of granting the Magen David Adom the equality justice demands.

"Those of us who, like Healy, believe that the American Red Cross must represent the best of our nation, have lost not just a battle but a war," he writes.

I don't know what the position of the Canadian Red Cross is on this matter, but while its influence on the international scene cannot compare to its American counterpart, it is a battle that it should join.

The message of Chanukah

Chanukah is the most challenged holiday in the Jewish year: challenged by its proximity to Christmas, by its multitude of interpretations, by the requirement of a firm belief in miracles.

Chanukah presents us with a dilemma. Leaving aside the miracle – a construct of later rabbis to diminish the role of the by-then despised Hasmonean line by inserting the role of the miraculous into the holiday – what exactly is its message for us?

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Popularly, we describe the war of the Maccabean brothers as a war of Jewish liberation from Greek paganism: it represents a rejection of Greek, in favour of Jewish, values. The Jewish nation rejected the universalist notion promoted by Greek civilization that all gods were equal, that all nations had a portion in the civilization of the gymnasium, the agora and the schools of philosophy and debate, as long as exclusive and particularist identities were left behind.

We link the Maccabean revolt to Zionism: against all odds, the tiny, under-equipped army of the Jews defeats surrounding nations in a miraculous struggle against well-equipped and well-led armies. As time has shown, those armies were not so well-run, although they did have plenty of ammunition and foot soldiers. As we found out in 1967, there is nothing like a first strike to wipe out the enemy, a lesson that discounts the miraculous in favour of a good army.

Would that the lesson of Chanukah were so simple – small against great, pagan against god-fearer, us against the rest. But, as Canadian Jews, we simply do not live in that kind of world. An exclusionist mentality, except for the haredim, simply does not – will not – work for us today.

We value the multicultural nature of Canada; we're at home in a country where we educate our children in Jewish day schools while we grant our neighbours' right to educate their children in Catholic, Muslim or evangelical schools. Canadians expect racial integration, the acceptance of mutuality in choices of not only religion, but also lifestyle and sexual preference – and not only acceptance, but also protection for a wide range of behaviour. Our only caveat is that it not disturb the peace, order and good government to which we have a right.

Chanukah is the best time to confront this tension between the exclusionist and the accepting, between the universal and the particular, between respect and intolerance. The Macabbean uprising did not lead to the sealing off of the Jewish nation, but merely directed its encounter with Greek culture into other paths – not into the path of idolatrous worship, which was unconditionally rejected, but into the path of inquiry of the mind, into the scholar's academy, into the creation of a rule of law. In fact, the encounter led into the rabbinic academies and the halachic system which we now embrace as Judaism.

I cite examples of the way in which Judaism has managed to sustain its particularity while enriching itself by contact with the cultures in which it has lived.

Although the rabbis proclaimed the eighth day of Tevet as a fast day because that was the day on which the Septuagint – the translation into Greek of the Torah – was completed, we now think nothing of translating it into the vernacular. The Torah was not allowed to become an inaccessible book, the private property of a privileged clergy. The rabbis believed all should be able to know the contents of our holiest book.

Consider gematriyáh, the sometimes whimsical, often mystical meanings assigned to words based on their numerical value. The word itself is from the Greek for geometry. We should also not overlook the influence Sufism has had on Jewish mystical thought, or the influence Aristotle had on Maimonides.

Recall Jewish poetry of Spain during our golden era. We enjoy the hauntingly beautiful Ladino music which is the pride of Sephardim. Both love songs and piyyutim used the forms of poetry developed by the Muslims.

Since the early Middle Ages, illustrators of the Haggadah borrowed the artistic styles of the Christian artisans around them. Haim Yerushalmi's magisterial Haggadah and History traces images of printed Haggadot back to their often non-Jewish sources.

Art, music, poetry, mystical thought, popular access to knowledge: we have taken and transformed ideas and modes of expression over many centuries from every major civilization in which we found ourselves. Yet we have maintained our identity. For me that is the message of Chanukah.

Student learns he can make a difference

Guest Voice

I recently came back from the GA of the UJC where I participated on DTWT, organized by the USD of the WZO and the JAFI. But even before my flight from Washington, D.C., landed at YUL, I realized that this year's General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities was about more than acronyms.

Walking past the Marriott lobby's airport-like security — and an inexplicable white chocolate replica of the Lincoln Memorial — the North American Jewish community came together for inspiration, vision and action.

While there was a lot of talk, having Jews from Tennessee, Iowa and Vermont joining such established communities as New York, Chicago and Toronto was inspiring in and of itself. And whether they went to the Orthodox, Reform or "Why I'm Not Attending Services" rooms for Kabalat Shabbat, everyone at the GA shared the same goal: wanting to do what's best for the Jewish people.

This year, with Canadian and, especially, American Jews feeling a new sense of involvement, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was an important focus and was the theme of many lectures. But there were also the usual sessions on intermarriage, religious teachings and fundraising.

I attended as part of the Montreal delegation. On the Shabbaton, Montreal students energized others and brought the Marriott ballroom to life with their singing and dancing. That spirit lasted throughout the GA.

I also took part in the Do the Write Thing program for journalists, a session of the GA which hosted discussions on journalistic themes in an intimate atmosphere of thirty or so participants. We also had a common interest: how to balance journalistic interests with our Jewish identities.

Most interesting were the Israeli speakers who spoke from firsthand experience about the Middle East.

Meretz Member of Knesset Avshalom Vilan said that Israel has more to lose in the current conflict by ignoring its social problems, while Israeli cabinet minister Tsipi Livni wondered how peace can be negotiated if violence can't stop for 24 hours, much less a week. And Aharon Barnea, anchor for Israel's Channel Two, warned of tension in an area of the world where war is an escape for weak rulers.

Most touching of all, the parents of Zachary Baumel, the Israeli soldier missing in action since 1982, addressed students and told them how much of a difference they can make.

Baumel's parents spoke as part of the greatly appreciated Saturday session, which aimed to help students respond to anti-Israel sentiment and activity on campus. Jonathan Kessler, editor of Middle East Insight magazine, noted that students can influence future political, religious and community leaders on their campuses.

The Canadian students met immediately after the session, led by Eddie Shostak, president of Hillel Montreal, and Charlie Hadid of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Delegates from Halifax said they were concerned that left-wing campus groups, which they might otherwise join, were unquestioningly adopting the Palestinian cause. Other students shared strategies they were using at their schools. Most of all, there was a sense that students do indeed have the capacity and determination to effect change.

After being among the few young people at a performance by Vertigo, an Israeli modern-dance troupe, a group of us were attracted by what seemed to be free refreshments in a small conference room. A woman asked us politely if we were members of the King David Society, noting that membership meant a donation of at least $25,000 that year. We joked that we picked the wrong year to donate only $24,000.

But when we noticed there were tango lessons and no adults were enthusiastic, she invited us to stay. Sure enough, the students put a little life into things and others soon joined us on the dance floor. (The promise of free refreshments two days earlier led another group of students to a black-tie gala next door. They were, however, perturbed when they noticed it was a gathering of the American Postal Workers' Union.)

Momentary diversions aside, each night the students at the GA pondered the future of the Jewish people into the early hours of the morning. And if anyone was wondering why Lincoln is missing a toe…

The Kirshner File

Film archive preserves a precious legacy

The basement of the Avraham Harman Institute of Contemporary Jewry, on the Mount Scopus campus of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, houses a priceless legacy.

Here, in specially designed, temperature-controlled premises, is the Steven Spielberg Jewish Film Archive, containing precious images of Israel's past, Diaspora Jewish communities and the Holocaust.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"We have over 15,000 cans of films and 9,000 video cassettes," said its director, Marilyn Koolik, who was recently here at the invitation of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

By virtue of its holdings, the archive is said to possess the largest collection of Jewish documentary film footage in the world.

Founded in the late 1960s by Moshe Davis and other historians at the Hebrew University, it originally bore the name of its first donor, Iranian businessman Abraham Rad. But after receiving an infusion of funds from the Hollywood director Steven Spielberg in 1987, its name was changed.

Although Spielberg has yet to visit the archive, his financial support is unflagging and critical. "He just gave us another donation," said Koolik.

Spielberg monies have been used for one overarching purpose: the preservation of problematic nitrate film, which tends to decompose.

Since the late 1980s, scores of 35mm and 16mm films, most about pre-state Israel, have been sent to labs in London, Amsterdam and Los Angeles for duplication on safety film, a daunting task.

"It's like art restoration," explained Koolik, a professional librarian and art historian who joined the archive in 1980 after making aliyah from the United States in 1971.

Copying volatile nitrate movies on safety film is extremely costly. Citing an example, she disclosed that the cost of remastering The Land of Promise – a 55-minute 1935 documentary on the Jewish community of Palestine that has been described as pre-state Israel's preeminent propaganda film – was $13,000 (US).

But, as she hastened to add, the project to preserve historically important films has also received the backing of Canadians like Gerda Frieberg and Harry Gorman, both of Toronto.

From bitter experience, Koolik has learned that older safety film is subject to chemical decomposition, or vinegar syndrome, as well.

"No one quite knows why this happens. Entire conferences have dealt with this subject. So we have to keep on copying films over and over again."

"Clay tablets, 2,000 years old, last longer," she added ruefully. "We're on a constant treadmill."

Of late, the archive has experimented with digital restoration methods, but it remains to be seen whether they will stand the test of time.

Jointly administered by the Avraham Harman Institute of Contemporary Jewry and the Central Zionist Archives, the archive is a veritable treasure trove.

As the official depository of the World Zionist Organization and its subsidiaries, including the Jewish Agency, the Jewish National Fund and the United Jewish Appeal, it is particularly strong on films about Zionist activity before and after 1948, when Israel was officially proclaimed.

"Virtually all the pre-1948 films about Palestine were made by Zionist organizations, starting in 1919," said Koolik.

"Essentially, they were propaganda/fundraising films for overseas audiences. There were hundreds of them, showing settlements and towns being built and water pipes being laid. So what we have is an extraordinary film history of the building of a nation."

In its vaults are the films of Fred Dunkel, one of the Yishuv's earliest cinematographers; of Baruch Agadati, a pioneer of Hebrew-language talkies; of Hazel Greenwald, who worked for Hadassah during the 1940s and 1950s; of Norman Lourie, a partner in Palestine Films, which was very active immediately before and after 1948; of Rolf Kneller, who shot documentaries from the 1930s to the 1960s, and of Ben Oyserman, a camerman and director killed during the 1967 Six Day War.

Apart from these films, the archive possesses the Yosef Millo Collection, the home movies of one of the founders of the Cameri Theatre; the Ze'ev Aran Collection, which documents the rebuilding of the Hebrew University's Mount Scopus campus in the wake of the Six Day War; the Joe Malcolm Collection, which includes the sole surviving reel of Yaacov Ben Dov's The Land of Israel Liberated (1919), and a collection of films deposited by Israel's kibbutzim.

Archival films about Jewish communities in the Diaspora are just as wide-ranging.

"We have footage of Yemenite Jews leaving Yemen during Operation Magic Carpet, of Poland's Jewish community prior to World War II, of Jewish settlements in Argentina, Morocco, Ethiopia, Birobidjan, present-day Russia, China and North and South America. Some of it is quite moving."

Its films on the Holocaust are intriguing and heart-breaking.

Aside from the original videotapes of the trial of Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann, a gift from the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai Brith, it has nearly 400 films about the Holocaust from the Ghetto Fighters' House in Israel.

There is rare footage of the destruction of the Warsaw ghetto and still rarer colour footage of Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini on an inspection tour of the eastern front, taken by Hitler's pilot.

Not too surprisingly, filmmakers and academics are its main users. To ease their way, virtually all the films have been broken down by scenes.

ABC News bought footage for The Trial of Adolf Eichmann (1997); BBC for A Dream So Far: A History of the Palestine Police (1991); CBS for America Celebrates Israel's 50th (1998); The History Channel for Jerusalem With Martin Gilbert (1996); Israel Television for Pillar of Fire (1981) and Thames Television for Palestine (1978).

Filmmakers whose documentaries have been featured at the Toronto International Film Festival have also delved into the archive, from Ron Havilio (Fragments of Jerusalem, 1997) to Simcha Jacobovici (The Struma, 2001).

Their presence has been welcomed. "Copyright fees," said Koolik, " constitute a significant proportion of our income."

The archive is a source for academics. Yehuda Bauer, the Holocaust specialist, and Anita Shapira, an expert on early Israel, used its films for a seminar about the Vilna ghetto and a course on Zionist history, respectively.

Four years ago, the archive began to develop a new computer technique – video streaming, invented by Israelis – so that its films could be accessed on the Internet.

Pioneers marching to work in The Land of Promise.

"But you can't download our films," cautioned Koolik. "They simply run through your computer."

By the end of the year, 100 films will be posted on the Internet. Within five years, 500 films will be available.

Koolik, whose parents are Polish Holocaust survivors, regards herself as a custodian.

"My job," she said in a recent interview, "is to preserve this material – these historical documents, if you will – in the best way I can for the next generation and the generations to come."

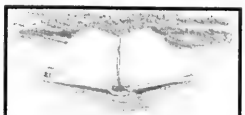
Chanukah: symbolic defeat of assimilation

By RABBI MOSHE STERN



Had the rabbis of the Talmud lived in 20th century North America, they probably would not have found it necessary to ask the question, "Ma Chanukah?" – "What is Chanukah?"

Chanukah has become more widely observed and recognized than any other holiday in the Jewish calendar. Even Jews who observe few Jewish traditions during the rest of the year light Chanukah candles. And since the advent of the electric chanukiyah, more Jewish homes fulfil the mitzvah of publicizing the miracle of Chanukah than ever before. Rarely does one see a Jewish home without a chanukiyah shining in the window. Indeed, Jews seem proud to tell the world that it is Chanukah and to announce that this religious festival commemorates the battle for religious freedom.

But I wonder if even we ought not to stop and ask ourselves the same question posed by the rabbis of so many years ago: "What is Chanukah?"

What is this festival that we all participate in? What is it all about? Jewish history, we have been told, has its message and lesson for each age and generation. What is the message and the lesson of this beautiful Festival of Lights?

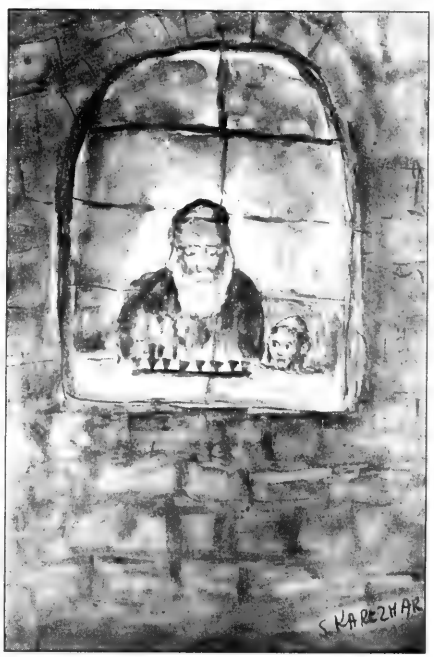
I would even estimate the majority of Jews who light candles don't realize that the victory they are commemorating was not so much the military victory of the Maccabees over the Syrian army, but rather the victory of traditional Jews over those Jews who desired to assimilate into the majority culture.

I often wonder if those Jews who scoff at Jewish tradition and who make light of Jewish practices would light the candles if they knew the true significance of Chanukah.

The message and lesson of Chanukah are clear to anyone who reads the books of the Maccabees. On the one hand, these ancient books tell of the eagerness displayed by the upper classes in Jerusalem some 2,140 years ago to abandon the Torah, the Sabbath and even circumcision in their desire to be like the non-Jews. They became Hellenized, not only in outward things, but in thought and life as well.

Even in the ranks of the priesthood, "many were making of no account the honour of their fathers, and thinking the glories of the Greeks the best of all." The lack of concern many Jews have today for Jewish values and traditions shows that history repeats itself.

On the other hand, the same books have preserved for us the immortal memory of men of strong principles, to whom the Torah was dearer than life itself, men who were "ready to live or die nobly" in its defence, men who were fully worthy of God's help and the miracle wrought through them.



The clash between Jews who cherish their heritage, traditions and practices and Jews who would break away from Judaism by choice or through neglect – is this not the same clash that occurred more than 2,000 years ago?

Chanukah commemorates the victory of traditional Judaism over the forces of assimilation and intimidation. Is it not a bit incongruous then, for Jews, who observe no Jewish tradition, or who scoff at it, to kindle the Chanukah lights? For in the performance of this mitzvah they are in effect bearing testimony to the Jewish values for which they have little or no regard.

Chanukah can have meaning only for those who are ready to rededicate their lives to Jewish living at all times. Chanukah has meaning only to those who understand that Judaism requires self-sacrifice for its religious duties and obligations. Chanukah has meaning only to those who recognize that through the candles they are kindling the light of Torah and mitzvot, the lighthouse amid the sea of secularism that is threatening to wash away today's North American Jewish community.

Our rabbis maintain that God linked his name to Israel to help ensure its survival. And surely the continued identity of the Jews as a separate religious community, their long and uninterrupted march through the ages, their victory over the countless foes that oppressed them, can only mean that they were fortified by God's protective power and that their religion was the source of their wonderful vitality and almost superhuman persistence. It is this tradition above all that has made the Jews distinct and distinguished in history, and has given them the power to survive.

We know what the Jews have accomplished under oppression and persecution. Chanukah recalls some of these thrilling experiences. But if Jewish ideals and values still have any meaning for us, then they must influence us and our lives as well. Judaism can, and must, survive in our free society amidst a life of plenty, liberty and opportunity, but only if we are prepared to express the Maccabean spirit of dedication to things Jewish, as they did under oppression and hardship. Chanukah beckons us to become true to the tradition and practices of our forefathers.

As we kindle the chanukiyah, let us resolve to dedicate ourselves anew to the glories of Judaism. Then, indeed, will the chanukiyah of Jewish life shine forth as a beacon of light for all mankind.

Jewish Life

A month for Jewish books

Books
Bernard Baskin

More books on Jewish subjects are being published today than ever before in history. The shelves of bookstores – Jewish and general – are packed with exciting titles. The eager reader can now choose from a spate of volumes on every conceivable subject: Bible, Talmud, history, the Holocaust, contemporary Israel, theology, religious life, customs and ceremonies, cooking, mysticism, Hebrew and Yiddish literature and the novel in English.

Once again, in a society filled with competing attractions, I commend the pleasures of reading to you.

Books are tickets of admission into the world of imagination. They can dilate our minds, enlarge our sympathies, remove from us some prejudice or smallness of mind and provide light into the dark nooks and crannies of our personality. They can help us commune with better minds than our own, lay hold upon better ideas than we now possess. They provide the best antidote against alienation.

We tend to forget that a book is a miracle. By means of 26 letters, intricate symbols of communication, abstract thoughts and ideas are conveyed. Across the span of centuries, without regard to geography, the book speaks. It has the power to teach, inspire, activate and delight. It can open windows on new horizons, foment revolution and sustain the troubled spirit. It is no wonder that English essayist and poet Charles Lamb maintained that there is more reason for saying grace before one begins a new book than before a meal. For a meal and its satisfactions are soon forgotten, but the power and influence of a worthy book are unending.

Through the ages Jews have always honoured and treasured the book. The praises for the written word have been unremitting.

Anticipating the age of the paperbound volume, Hai Gaon wrote, "Always have your book in your pocket!" Moses ben Ezra waxed poetic, "Books are pouches of wisdom embroidered with pearly words." Yehudah ibn Tibbon must have had my filing system in mind when he wrote, "Review your books at the beginning of every month... Arrange them in good order so that you need not toil to look for one when you require it." Bibliophiles are charmed by his oft-reprinted words, "When you lend a book, put it on record, and, when returned, strike it from the record. Every Passover and every Feast of Tabernacles, bring back home all the books you lent out."

Despite vast technological change, the book is not about to disappear. It may be altered to meet changing needs and conditions, but it will not be supplanted. What will not change is the power of the book, as Emerson said, "to speak to us, arouse us, terrify us, teach us, comfort us and open its heart to us as a brother."

There is one supreme consolation about books. The joys they bring are safe as well as enduring.

Many people have exercised themselves to death, many have played themselves to death, many have worried themselves to death, but no one has ever thought himself to death or died from the ecstasy of learning. Our body gradually dies, our emotions become dull, but the mind continues to live and can grow ever more alive, volatile and encompassing.

Latkes and the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The light it lasted for eight nights
Relieving people of their plight...
Yes, fry the latkes in the oil
To celebrate ancestor's toil...
Chanukah is here at last
Let's all go and have a blast!

[http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/Susieq/latke.htm].

Chanukah is almost here. And to celebrate, it's time to pay tribute to the wonderful and tasty latke. Today, you can sample the potato latke and its many oily variations on the World Wide Web. (My apologies to all doughnut fans out there. "Soufganiyot" will get their due recognition another time.)

When he was on Good Morning America, Rabbi Marc Gellman shared a classic recipe (potatoes, onions, eggs, oil) with a twist: nutmeg. He also gave advice about latkes' faithful companion, apple sauce: "Core but do not peel about eight Mutsu or Rome apples. Cook with ¼ cup of apple cider and cinnamon stick." [http://www.wchstv.com/gmarecipes/potatopancakes.html].

What to do if you love latkes but not the fat? The American Institute for Cancer Research suggests trying a no-oil lean latke. To make the pan-roasted latke, coat a skillet with cooking spray and smooth the grated potatoes into a large plate-sized pancake. One serving has 162 calories and less than 1 gram of fat. The site adds that if a Chanukah latke just isn't a Chanukah latke without oil, then go ahead and add a tablespoon [http://www.aicr.org/smddec98.html].

If you ever tire of traditional latkes, don't despair. The Jewish-Food LATKE archives have over 100 varieties to tempt you: everything from brandied apple, beet, cheese, chick pea and sweet potato, cod fish, savoury meat, viennese layer to zucchini with garlic and yogurt-mint topping [http://www.jewish-food.org/recipes/latindex.htm].

If that's not enough, then hop over to the RFCJ Recipe Archive for apple-cinnamon, chestnut flour, risotto, mushroom pecan, bran (!) and over 90 others [http://www.cyber-kitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=HANUKKAH].

There are many sites that give recipes but I particularly like one that spends more time on how to make a great latke. At the All Recipes site, there are tips about what kind of potatoes to use (russet), how to keep them from turning pinkish-brown (keep them under water) and how to make sure they don't fall apart when you're frying them (squeeze the potato mixture in a cheesecloth). [http://www.allrecipes.com/cb/w2m/seaspec/holiday/jewish/latke/].

I never would have imagined that there was an entire sub-genre of latke humour out there! In the Ritual Slaughter of the Latke, Raphael Finkel elucidates the intricate (and phony) Jewish laws that ensure that latkes are kosher. For example, just as kosher meat must be salted, Finkel says we must "Remember to salt the potato and leave it to drain for at least 24 hours. We do this in memory of Lot's wife, Latke, who was turned to salt. Use a lotta salt, in memory of Lot's daughter, Lotta." [http://www.cs.uky.edu/~raphael/yiddish/home nt.html].

For real Jewish passion, check out the food fight over which is the tastier treat: latkes or hamantashen [http://www.mtholyoke.edu/offices/comm/csj/970404/food.html]. And don't miss The Scientific Method and the Latke-Hamantash Issue by Edward Kolb, a professor of astronomy and astrophysics at the University of Chicago [http://home.fnal.gov/~rocky/latke_2.pdf].

If your kids love latkes and you want to keep them out of the kitchen, here's a solution: have them create a magical latke made from a paper plate, tape and brown paper [http://www.thebestkidsbooksite.com/craftdetails.cfm?TopicID=602].

Unfortunately, latkes weren't so pleasant for Jill Fenton. When she was challenged to spell "latke" during the final day of competition at the U.S. National Spelling Bee, the 7th grader from Central Christian Middle School in Kidron, Ohio spelled the food as "lotka." [http://www.ohio.com/bj/news/2001/June/01/docs/020031.htm].

But I'll leave the last word to writer Marjorie Ingall whose wishes for a modern day Chanukah miracle are probably shared by latke fans everywhere [http://www.cuisinenet.com/cafe/you_gonna_eat_that/1997/00009-1.shtml].

"My hope is that a miracle will occur and the calories of eight days will count as the calories of one."

Death threats don't faze moderate Muslim editor

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Tahir Aslam Gora believes that freedom of expression is a fundamental right of all free societies.

Gora, an East Indian, is a Muslim-born liberal writer and editor of a community newspaper which is read by the Canadian Muslim community.

Gora was the editor of a weekly magazine in Pakistan. After being kidnapped and jailed in July 1998 for criticizing the Pakistani government for nuclear testing, Gora moved to Canada.

Tahir Aslam Gora

But after writing several critical articles about the Toronto Muslim community and their approach to international events, Gora began to be harassed and threatened here as well.

In July, Canadian Journalists for Free Expression and PEN Canada issued an action alert and expressed concern about the threats against Gora and his personal safety.

In an interview, Gora said that now that Canadian-based organizations have begun to support him, most of the threats have stopped.

However, he said threats don't bother him as much as calls from friends telling him not to write positively about other religions.

Gora said that he has been called a traitor by many intellectuals and writers in the Muslim community for stating that he accepts and respects Israel's right to exist.

Because of these and other views, Gora said that many of his advertisers have pulled their ads and his Urdu and English language paper, Watan, has shrunk from a weekly of 32 pages to a 16-page monthly.

Many people in the Muslim community are against any positive portrayal of Israel or Jews, Gora said. They believe that the only reason there are problems between Muslims in the world is because of a Jewish conspiracy, he added.

Anti-Semitism and anti-Westernism is encouraged by the Muslim media, which plays a great role in brainwashing people, he said.

Gora has published several collections of short stories in Urdu. A novel titled Respite and This is Not a Matter of Sorrow, a collection of poems, have been translated into English, but are not yet available in Canada.

In the meantime, he has started a campaign for an organization supporting the freedom of expression for Muslim writers, journalists and intellectuals. He has also formed a small group of Muslim intellectuals who defend and support British Muslim author Salman Rushdie, who was the subject of an Iranian death edict for his novel The Satanic Verses.

"I believe that change will begin in the Muslim community only if Muslim writers begin to write more objectively," Gora said.

The sounds of Islamic silence

politics are also opposed to the existence of the State of Israel.

Jewish leaders worry that because of the silence of moderates in the Muslim community, the Islamist view of the world may dominate educational priorities.

Recently Mahmoud Jaballah, a principal and founder of a Muslim school in Toronto was arrested because of suspected terrorist links.

Muhammad Khalid is chair of the Islamic Society of North America, an organization that worked together with the Jewish community in support of provincial funding for faith-based schools.

In an interview, Khalid said he is not opposed to ministry supervision in order to prevent teachers from imposing views which represent hatred in Muslim schools.

However, he noted that Muslim schools in Toronto do not teach about current events.

On issues of Westernism and anti-Semitism, Khalid said that Muslim schools in Toronto do not teach anything at all.

War crimes case proceeds

TORONTO — The trial of a 91-year-old alleged war criminal got under way in Hamilton last week after a Federal Court judge turned down a defence lawyer's request that he be allowed to withdraw from the case.

Defence lawyer Michael Davies had argued that Jacob Fast was suffering from Alzheimer's Disease and unable to assist in his own defense. Judge Denis Pelletier allowed the trial to proceed, saying he couldn't conclude that the proceedings would be unfair.

Immigration officials allege Fast, an ethnic German born into a Mennonite community near Zaporozhye, Ukraine, served as an auxiliary member of the German security police (Sipo) from 1941 to 1944.

Court documents allege Sipo carried out the mass murder of hundreds of thousands of civilians in territories occupied by the Nazis and that Fast "was personally responsible for the arrest and mistreatment of prisoners, some of whom were later deported to concentration camps."

The federal war crimes unit, which is prosecuting the case, argues Fast would not have been allowed into Canada in 1947 if he had told the truth about his wartime service.

Radical Change in Spousal Support Law in Ontario: Uncertainty Reigns (Part 2 of 2)

In the November 22 issue, we presented the first part of an article by Cheryl Goldhart on Miglin v. Miglin. Ms. Goldhart explained how this case superseded the Pelech Trilogy (three Supreme Court of Canada cases) and how it has made it easier for women to request spousal support from a Court in the face of a separation agreement or marriage contract which, prior to Pelech, would have made it difficult for them to do so.

In this issue, we present the remainder of Cheryl's article, together with our comments.

MIGLIN V. MIGLIN: WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

by Cheryl Goldhart (concluded)

Section 15.2 (6) of the Divorce Act provides, as follows:

"An order made under subsection (1) or an interim order under subsection (2) that provides for the support of a spouse should,

(a) recognize any economic advantages or disadvantages to the spouses arising from the marriage or its breakdown;

(b) apportion between the spouses any financial consequences arising from the care of any child of the marriage over and above any obligation for the support of any child of the marriage;

(c) relieve any economic hardship of the spouses arising from the breakdown of the marriage; and

(d) insofar as practicable, promote the economic self-sufficiency of each spouse within a reasonable period of time."

All these factors must be considered and no single objective is paramount. Contrast this test with the self-sufficiency/clean break philosophy of the post-Pelech trilogy era, when family law lawyers (and hence, their clients) had a real sense that once an agreement had been reached, a clean and irrevocable break could be achieved.

Details of Justice Abella's ruling

Justice Abella states at paragraph 92 of the Reasons:

"The Divorce Act establishes the purposes and objectives of a support award. If the overall terms of a settlement agreement meet those purposes and objectives, the agreement should be respected. If the terms of an agreement do not promote the policies under the Act, a Court should intervene to maintain the policies and objectives under the Act. However, a Court should not take the opportunity to review support settlements as an invitation to fine-tune a financial settlement. Rather, a Court reviewing a settlement should approach the matter much as an appeal Court approaches a family law appeal. The Court's job is not to second-guess the parties but to ensure that the proper principles were applied to the facts. A Court should intervene only if the financial settlement exceeds the generous ambit within which reasonable disagreement is possible."

For family law practitioners in Ontario, this ruling creates a great deal of concern. In other parts of Canada, lawyers should hold their breath and wait and see if the Supreme Court of Canada will agree or disagree. Assuming it disagrees, these are my concerns about the case, in no particular order:

- Changing existing agreements. What jurisdiction does the Court have to vary an agreement? In Miglin, Justice Abella repeatedly refers to a variation of a subsisting support agreement (albeit in the context of an original application under s. 15.2). I see no jurisdiction in the legislation which allows a Court to "vary" an agreement. A Court has a lot of power and discretion when varying an order, but Courts do not have the jurisdiction to vary consensual agreements unless they are incorporated into Court orders. In my view, the language used by the Court is unfortunate. Certainly, a Court can award support in the face of an agreement, but vary the agreement itself? I don't think so.

- No threshold. Justice Abella finds that the inquiry in cases such as Miglin requires a two-stage analysis. The first stage, or "threshold", is to determine whether there has been a material change. The second stage is to determine the amount of spousal support, if any, that is justified under the statutory scheme set out in s. 15 of the Divorce Act and is found in the leading cases of the Supreme Court of Canada. The Miglin case was an originating corollary relief application under section 15.2 of the Divorce Act. In my respectful view, there is no threshold to be met nor preliminary inquiry necessary. Thresholds are articulated in s. 17 of the Divorce Act, where the Court is empowered to vary orders. The legislation is clear that no threshold is required to bring an application under section 15.2 of the Divorce Act. The Court of Appeal may have intended to introduce a threshold to cases where a prior agreement exists, but the Court doesn't say that. If it did, we would be back to my first concern, namely, the Court has no power to vary agreements.

Invitation to frivolous litigation

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

- Threshold too low. Assuming I am completely wrong with respect to my first and second concerns, then the test annunciated, being a "material change", is far too low. The bar is now inches off the ground, practically inviting any litigant to merrily hop over it. Anyone can establish that, between the time the agreement was entered into and the time of the application, something has changed in their lives which is material to their economic situation. My concern here is that there will be all types of frivolous litigation launched requesting changes to parties' agreements. Our only hope is that these potential litigants were so soured by the system the first time around that unless they do have a legitimate claim, they won't bother to pursue it.

- How to draft agreements. This affects me, and my practise, personally. As a family lawyer, I believe the Miglin decision will make it impossible to draft agreements which will stand up to future challenges. It appears that we must not only consider our own clients' positions but the positions of opposing parties and consider whether it's a good deal for them. Remember, Justice Abella stated: "A Court should intervene only if the financial settlement exceeds the generous ambit within which reasonable disagreement is possible." How are we going to figure that out? Justice Abella directs parties to ensure that the objectives set out in s.15.2 (6) of the Divorce Act have been satisfied. But, even if I can get the other side to agree on the objectives upon which the agreement is based and we can together articulate those objectives and agree on the wording to be placed in the agreement, it appears that Miglin goes further and provides that the agreement must meet those objectives not only when the agreement is signed but also at the time of the future application to vary it. A tall undertaking in my view.

How to define "generous ambit"

- How to advise our clients. This flows from my last concern. How can we ever give our clients advice about contracts? The spousal support provisions of a separation agreement now have the shelf life of custody and access provisions. They are only reliable until one of the parties thereto wants a change and a Court agrees. As we know, in custody and access situations the Courts will always intervene if they deem it necessary. I believe that, as family law practitioners, we need to get our minds around the fact that, when it comes to spousal support, the Courts are simply exercising their parens patriae jurisdiction, i.e. their inherent jurisdiction to act as a parent. To protect ourselves as lawyers, we must be very careful in the drafting of spousal support releases and be very clear with our clients about the potential fallibility of those releases. Also, in our reporting letters to our clients, we must be extremely clear about the advice we have given them.

Time will only tell whether the Ontario Court of Appeal's views on spousal support agreements will be adhered to by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Stay tuned!

Supreme Court decision awaited

POSTSCRIPT BY JOHN SYRTASH

Since Cheryl wrote this article, Canada's Supreme Court has agreed to hear the appeal of the Miglin decision. This decision to grant "leave to appeal" was given with much greater speed than anyone anticipated. Until Canada's highest Court disposes of the case in the next few months, the uncertainty will continue.

The reader should also be aware that not all lawyers agree with Ms. Goldhart. The Court of Appeal did not. Many feel that the threshold for ignoring spousal support releases should be low — or lower — since many recipient ex-spouses deserve the benefit of flexibility in this area, as do their children. Currently the debate rages to such an extent that many of us were recently polled by fax — a highly unusual practise — as to our views on whether or not Miglin was correct.

One fact clearly underscored by all of the above is that lawyers, as well as their clients, are faced with considerable uncertainty in the area of spousal support releases in marriage contracts, cohabitation agreements, and separation agreements.

In an upcoming issue, we hope to be able to present yet another viewpoint on this subject from another distinguished family law lawyer.

On behalf of myself, my family, B'Nai Brith Canada and the firm of Basman Smith, I wish you a freilich Chanukah.

Branch of Sephardic Educational Centre launched

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Members of the Sephardic community came together last week to launch the Toronto chapter of the Sephardic Educational Centre.

Located in the Old City of Jerusalem, the SEC offers facilities for several educational and cultural forums – from informal summer programs to university accredited courses. The centre offers a special program sponsored by Birthright Israel.

Max Benaim, director of the new Toronto branch, said a local chapter will provide the community with "somewhere unaffiliated and apolitical where the youth can get together under a common banner."

The chapter is currently looking for space to house its programs, he said.

Just back from his 61st trip to Israel, SEC founder Dr. José Nessim said he made his first trip to Israel to work in a medical station in the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

In Toronto recently to discuss the history and importance of the centre, the Los Angeles resident said he realized many years ago that there was a real void in the Sephardic community.

With millions of Sephardim around the world, "how could we not have our own address or telephone number?" Nessim asked.

Six thousand square metres of abandoned space with rich Sephardic roots was found only metres away from the Kotel.

"For centuries, this location has housed the residences of the Rishon Lezion [chief rabbis] – more than 30 have lived there," Nessim said.

The Supreme Court for Sephardim and the most prominent Sephardic school were located there for many years, he added.

"In 1920, [Tiferet Yerushalayim, a Sephardic yeshiva] was the only yeshiva in Jerusalem."

After initial hesitations, the government of Israel finally leased the three rundown, abandoned buildings to Nessim for a centre in 1979.

After two decades of renting, Nessim began work to purchase the buildings.

However, "I had to go to court twice before I could finally buy them from the government," he said.

Nessim said the authorities were unhappy about the fact girls were allowed to live in the Old City, even though they were housed in separate quarters from the boys.

"About 10 years ago, a group of haredi men came in and took away our Torah because they felt that our mechitzah wasn't appropriate."

Nessim persevered and the premises now sleep 250 people. More than 19,000 people have passed through the Jerusalem centre.

Now, branches of the SEC have opened up all over the world to provide a place for young people to hang out and make their own decisions, Nessim said.

He hopes that eventually the SEC in Jerusalem will be home to a Sephardic museum and library, a centre to educate youth leaders and train rabbis.

"Sephardic children shouldn't all be trained in Ashkenazi schools.

"Our culture is too rich and our Judaism too beautiful for us not to have our own centre," Nessim said.

Baycrest exhibit offers message of hope to elderly

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For the elderly, works of art can have immense healing powers from helping to trigger happy memories to spurring self-expression.

It's no surprise, then, that the walls of Baycrest are adorned with paintings, photographs and figurines, including the centre's most recent art addition, the Ashrei Project.

Unveiled late last month on the fifth floor of the Apotex Centre, the colourful project extends an ample four by 10 feet and consists of a series of hand-stitched and machine embroidered Judaic symbols – a Torah, menorah and gragger among them – cushioned beneath five dancing figures made from screen meshing. The piece is outlined by the sparkling red words of the Ashrei prayer, in English and Hebrew.

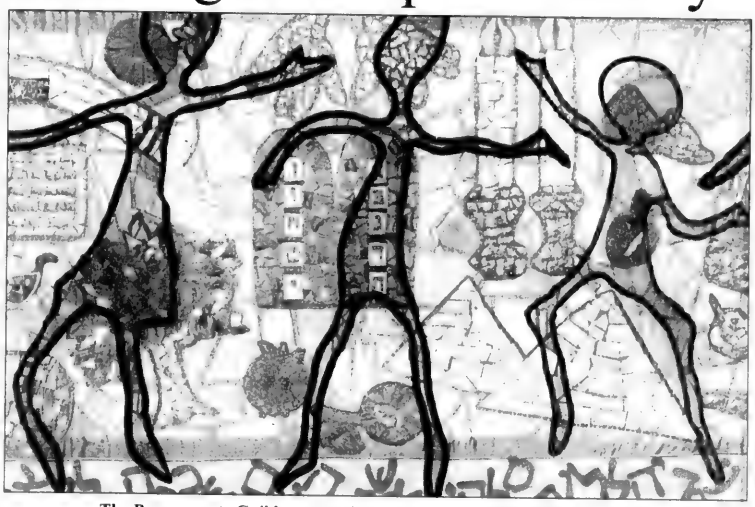
"This project holds the message of joy, hope and continuity," said Ashrei designer and artist Elaine Glassman, who worked on the project for the last 1½ years alongside 34 members of the Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Textiles. "Ashrei, the prayer said every day, symbolizes the common thread in our daily lives."

The idea for Ashrei came about when Vivienne Marcus, the art and interior design co-ordinator at Baycrest, suggested to guild members that the Apotex centre's fifth floor needed a central visual display to grace the walls. She felt the piece should have a Jewish flavour so that residents could identify with it both emotionally and spiritually.

"Art has enormous therapeutic value," Marcus said. "We use art to trigger emotions and memories and as a means to help people find their way around."

Marcus and several guild members put their heads together to develop the project's joyous, holiday theme. Once Glassman illustrated the design, contributors stitched, hemmed and sewed away, meeting typically on Tuesday afternoons.

Now that the project is finished, "I don't know what to do on Tuesdays," quipped Glassman, who noted contributors were free to use their creativity and the final product reflects that freedom. "Everyone realized their potential while working and it was a learning experience for all of us."



The Pomegranate Guild presented this wall-sized quilt to Baycrest Centre.

Baycrest resident Ida Orliffe was moved as she reached from her wheelchair and touched the projects' silk and polyester fabrics.

"I like the ingenuity," she said. "I feel a warm, homey feeling when I look at it."

Orliffe's reaction to the piece is very much in tune with what many elderly people feel when they see works of art, noted Robin Kavanat, an art therapist intern at Baycrest.

"Art and photographs are a very big part of people's lives here," Kavanat said. "I work with one lady who doesn't know her name, but every time we pass a certain painting, she points it out."

Glassman said the Ashrei design, while deep in meaning, has a folksy flavour and is not complex, so residents can feel comfortable looking at it. "We tried to make simple symbols, so that people could focus on one thing at a time," she said.

Formed in 1982, the Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Textiles boasts 85 members who have a common love for creating textile, fabric and needlework art displays with Jewish themes. The members meet for monthly programs and work on a volunteer basis.

Mock praises black hockey pioneer at banquet

By JENNIFER PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Karen Mock came home from the United Nations' World Conference against racism in Durban, South Africa, dejected but not defeated.

She said an international barrage of anti-Semitism at the gathering caused rifts and undermined her intensive preparation.

When she returned on the evening of Sept. 10, she said she and other participants were bruised, "in need of spiritual healing." But by the next morning, Sept. 11, "it all seemed trivial in comparison."

Although the two events are worlds apart, they are intimately connected, Mock said in a keynote address to the Harmony Award banquet in Markham last month.

In a speech titled From Durban to New York and Beyond: Challenges that Face Us All, Mock urged listeners to resist hatred in all its forms.

What the media didn't discuss in their coverage of the Durban conference, she said, was the effort she and others had put in behind the scenes in the year leading up to Durban.

But much of that hard work was undone by "the power of hate," she said, describing the rifts between organizations that developed there.

"Then, on Sept. 11, we saw what hate could lead to. All the verbal attacks of Durban had become physical, tangible."

Karen Mock

Mock, who was recently appointed executive director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation after 12 years as head of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights, has a long-standing association with the Harmony Movement, which is dedicated to promoting diversity and inclusion and holds an annual banquet to honour one Canadian who has made significant contributions to combating hatred.

Previous honorees include human rights activist Bromley Armstrong, David Lam, and Canadian heritage volunteer Ruth Goldbloom.

Mock said this year's recipient, Herbert Carnegie, is particularly appropriate in light of recent events, since he's spent a lifetime turning rage into positive energy.

Born in Toronto in 1919, Carnegie grew up here and became an outstanding hockey player. He dreamed of playing in the NHL, but there was one obstacle: back then, the NHL didn't allow black players.

One team owner said he'd give $10,000 to anyone who could turn Carnegie into a white man.

But Carnegie didn't allow himself to be defined by bitterness. Following a stellar minor-league career, he founded the Future Aces Hockey School, where he taught more than just how to skate. What he taught was his personal creed, the Future Aces Creed, which has now become a way of life for thousands of Canadian students.

Its 12 points have so far been adopted by five school boards. Each begins with "I will endeavour..." and promotes values such as courage and a positive attitude.

In her address, Mock asked attendees to draw hope from Carnegie's ability to turn anger into positive energy, and from organizations like the Harmony Movement, which "spur us on to tikkun olam [repair of the world]."

Other Harmony Movement supporters include journalist June Callwood, retired judge Pamela Appelt and former Ontario lieutenant-governor Lincoln Alexander, who was present to offer Harmony Scholarships to 10 students from across Canada who have organized youth and student events to eliminate racism and promote multiculturalism.

Carnegie, who turned 82 on the day of the banquet, spoke briefly and thanked those who have helped bring his creed to the public. His goal, he told the audience of 550, has always been to "never isolate or exclude [even] one student," because "you never know what that one person might do for our country."

The banquet fell during Holocaust Remembrance Week and on the anniversary of Kristallnacht. In light of that history, and, closer to home, the atrocities committed against Japanese-Canadians during World War II, Mock said we mustn't allow the current charged climate to be used as an excuse to take away hard-won civil liberties. "Vigilance is necessary – but hypervigilance is intolerance."

Chapters, Indigo pulls Mein Kampf from their bookshelves

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Chapters and Indigo bookstores have pulled copies of Adolf Hitler's pre-war manifesto, Mein Kampf, from the shelves of more than 200 stores across Canada.

Calling the book hate literature, Indigo CEO and chair Heather Reisman announced the chain would return copies of the book to the publisher and would delete its sale from the company's online service.

"We consider it hate literature," Reisman told The Globe and Mail. "With freedom of expression, the line is drawn on hate literature. It's a corporate decision. It's what we stand for."

Reisman said the book was ordered accidentally, likely as part of Chapters' database. Indigo acquired Chapters earlier this year.

The announcement was questioned in some quarters, with critics calling the book a useful learning tool and a historic document that should be available to the public. Others defended the right of a store-owner to determine which merchandise would be sold to the public.

Mein Kampf, German for "my struggle", was written by Hitler while in prison for leading a failed beer hall putsch in Bavaria. Published in 1925, it outlined his extremist policies and expressed his deep hatred of Jews.

Reisman's decision to pull Mein Kampf was "an act of conscience" and "very commendable," said Ed Morgan, a professor of law and chair of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

The book "is the paradigm of a vicious anti-Semitic tract," he said.

Acknowledging it is also a historical document that is valuable learning aid to serious students of history, Morgan said the book is still readily available in other bookstores and libraries.

The edition available at Indigo, which retailed for $32.00 on the company's Web site last week, is the "raw" unannotated version of the book, lacking context and perspective, Morgan said. "It is therefore understandable why a bookstore owner would feel queasy about selling it."

Manuel Prutschi, chair of Congress' community relations committee, said Mein Kampf "continues to be an object of veneration by the far right, who see it as a relevant political program and revel in its anti-Semitism."

While he acknowledged the book should not be banned and should be available for students of history, "there is no real reason it should be available in your neighbourhood bookstore."

Shoichet wins lifetime achievement award

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dorothy Shoichet, winner of the North York Chamber of Commerce's Lifetime Achievement Award for her four decades of volunteerism in the community, says she still has a lot to do.

Shoichet, current chair and former president of the Koffler Centre of the Arts, is currently working with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre to make sure details are in place for the planned expansion of the Koffler Centre.

The plans "hopefully" include a new building designed by former Toronto architect Frank Gehry, she says, "something that could electrify the Jewish community.

"Gehry designed an arts centre in Bilbao, Spain, and it revitalized the community. The same thing could happen here. I am thrilled to be part of it all."

When she became president in 1994, the centre had two galleries and three schools of visual art. "When I stepped down last year, it was a full centre of the arts, celebrating literary achievement, performance and visual arts."

There is now a drama school – it runs the Leah Posluns Theatre – a school of music and a school of dance. As well, it runs the Jewish Book Fair and the Jewish Book Awards. Last year, the centre dedicated the Dorothy Shoichet Sculpture Garden to honour her years of service.

Among her other community activities, Shoichet has served as director of the Toronto Arts Council, the Dare Arts Foundation, Women's Canadian ORT, Kolel: Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, the Ashkenaz Foundation, the Muki Baum Association for Children with Multiple Handicaps, Jewish Community Centres of America, and the Canadian Council of Aboriginal Business.

She is also a founding member of the Toronto Symphony Maestro Club, a founding president of Friends of Habimah Theatre and a member of Hadassah-WIZO. She was an official NGO representative at UN conferences in Kenya in 1985, and China in 1995 that reviewed the progress of women worldwide.

Growing up in Toronto, she says, she lived in a home "filled with poets, politicians and musicians. My home was wrapped in culture. This triggered a lifelong passion for the arts.

"My father was also an idealist; he was very concerned about the working class. All these things influenced me."

After graduating from university, Shoichet went into her family's business – they manufacture picture frame mouldings, framed pictures and mirrors – and worked full time as director and executive officer until retiring three years ago.

Dorothy Shoichet

As a woman in the manufacturing industry she was not taken seriously by men, she says. "It was the mindset at that time, and I decided to do something about it. I wanted to change the environment for women in the workplace."

She approached the president of George Brown College, she says, and convinced him to start a course on women in business, which is still offered. "It was a night class, and the first time it ran, 25 women enrolled and 24 completed the course. That was proof that it was needed."

When she was involved with ORT, she says, she sensitized them to women's issues, such as making sure there are enough women teachers in its technological schools.

As a director of Kolel, she tries to bring a different voice to the board, that of the unaffiliated. "It is a voice that should be heard. When organizations talk about serving the community, they should include unaffiliated people that want to be part of the community at large."

The Koffler Centre aspires to be the cultural arm of the Jewish community, she says. "It brings Jewish people together in a way that is welcoming and comforting.

"We may be not be able to encourage our children to attend synagogue, but they will be happy to attend a play or concert that involves them Jewishly. That is the extraordinary role the arts can play."

In everything the gallery does, says Shoichet, it is sensitive to Jewish issues. "We plan many of our programs around 'the other,' people such as women or immigrants who are left out. A recent photo exhibit on a Polish shtetl really spoke to us all."

As a volunteer, says Shoichet, she has become enriched. "My horizons have been broadened. I've learned how to do such things as publish a newsletter and embrace cutting edge contemporary art.

"That doesn't even address the satisfaction I get from helping out. My payback is in personal growth."

She acknowledges that being a volunteer can be difficult and demanding, but "I like people and I am committed to my work. I am driven by an opportunity to learn, a feeling of concern for the community, and a sense of tzedakah.

"I have a deep belief that those who are able must make a commitment to the betterment of the life experiences of other members of the community."

Ron Bolotin: Sheer Determination

Five days before Ron Bolotin's 19th birthday, while on training exercises in the Sinai, he stepped on a land mine. Ron lost his right leg and his eyes were so severely damaged, he feared he would never see again. But luck was on his side — the surgeons saved his sight, and he was fitted with a prosthesis to replace his right leg.

Before joining the army, Ron's passion was competitive swimming. Six months after receiving his prosthesis, he was ready to enter the water again. He trained at the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv, and with the help of the highly specialized rehabilitation staff, he became a swimming instructor for disabled children.

Ron has won many medals in disabled swimming championships all over the world and recently successfully represented Israel at the Paralympics in Sydney, Australia.

He says he could have never returned to a normal life, had it not been for the outstanding help he received in the Beit Halochem Centre. "Beit Halochem is my Hollywood," he smiled about that.

The other 50,000 disabled veterans also have the DETERMINATION to reach their potential.

Seniors & Health

Dear Dr. Veinish,

I have noticed that whenever I go to the concert with my mother, she always sits in an aisle seat. She gets up at least three times during the performance to go to the washroom. More recently, she has stopped participating in exercise classes and outings with her seniors group. She is convinced that this is just "one of those women's problems" which comes with age. She is not depressed but I am worried she is becoming increasingly isolated. Any advice?

Jane

Dear Jane,

Your mother is right only insofar that hers is a common problem – for men as well as for women. Whether she is actually incontinent or not, her behaviour suggests that her fear of losing control of her bladder is interfering substantially with her lifestyle. This is not a normal part of aging, and therefore should be properly assessed and treated like any other medical problem.

Women may be referred to a gynecologist or urogynecologist for an evaluation, while men are best assessed by a urologist. In larger centres, there are often specialized clinics which specifically address the various forms of incontinence commonly seen in the adult population. Wherever you live, it is important to see a health care professional with experience and expertise in this area. A careful history and physical examination are often sufficient to make the diagnosis. In other instances, additional tests and investigations may be required to develop a comprehensive treatment plan for the individual patient.

The overall goal of therapy is to maintain a normal lifestyle, usually by remaining dry. Treatment may include multiple modalities, including behavioural interventions – timed toileting and Kegel exercises – and medication. Drugs commonly used in this setting include topical or oral hormone replacement therapy, and other agents which act directly on the bladder in women, or on the prostate gland in men. Incontinence products such as pads and briefs should only be used as supplementary or precautionary measures in the community dwelling elderly, and not as primary treatment. A pessary may be helpful in certain situations – please remember, proper care is a must. Similarly, surgery is only recommended in very specific cases, for very specific indications.

Most problems attributed to "normal aging" can usually be remedied if properly addressed. Many individuals need help, however, to recognize and identify the problem, as well as encouragement to speak up and seek help. Your mother is lucky to have such a caring advocate as you.

Dr. Shelley Veinish is a geriatrician at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and assistant professor in the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto.

Winnipeg businessmen buy Manitoba papers

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In an era where newspapers are being gobbled up by massive media corporations seeking "synergy" and "integration," two Winnipeg businessmen have taken a modest step toward bucking that trend.

Last week, Bob Silver and Ron Stern, two of the principals behind the apparel company Western Glove Works, completed a deal that saw them acquire the Winnipeg Free Press and the Brandon Sun from Thomson Corporation, one of Canada's largest media companies.

The sale of the newspapers, Thomson's last newspaper holdings in Canada, completed a massive divestiture begun more than a year ago when Thomson announced it was selling its 130 Canadian and U.S. newspapers, valued at $1.3 billion, to concentrate on electronic information. Among the publications it sold was its flagship newspaper, the Globe and Mail.

While media giants like CanWest Global – for a time rumoured to be interested in the Free Press – pursued a policy of cross-ownership and consolidation of media properties, Stern and Silver have no other media holdings.

Their acquisition of the Free Press harkens back to an earlier era where local entrepreneurs controlled community newspapers. In its heyday in the first half of the 20th century, under the stewardship of editor John W. Dafoe, the Free Press gained a reputation as Winnipeg's newspaper of record and for its advocacy of Western Canadian concerns.

Today the Free Press, which was founded in 1872, remains Winnipeg's pre-eminent newspaper, with daily circulation of 140,000, rising to 190,000 on Saturday. Its only competition is the Winnipeg Sun, a tabloid daily owned by Quebecor.

Though Silver has no experience in the newspaper business, Stern is past publisher of two periodicals, Vancouver Magazine and Equity Magazine. Stern sold his stakes in the magazines about six years ago. Both men maintain an interest in a separate newsprint business.

They took pains to say they did not purchase the Manitoba papers to provide themselves with a public forum for their views.

"I've tried to assure everyone that we have purchased a newspaper, not a pulpit," Silver said.

Silver, 52, said it was too early to discuss future editorial policies. The new owners planned to meet with the paper's management team early in December to discuss the paper's new direction.

"It's wrong to think there will be wholesale changes," he said. "It's a good paper with a good editorial position."

Stern, 55, said the new owners planned to give the editorial staff broad latitude to stake out their own positions on issues.

"The leading mandate for the Free Press is to be the authoritative source of news for the City of Winnipeg and the Province of Manitoba," he said. "Beyond that, as in any major metropolitan area, it has to cover national and international news."

The last two Thomson papers had been available for some time. Aware they were for sale, "we talked about it, did some investigating and learned it [the Free Press] was a good business," Stern said.

Though the Free Press, a traditional broadsheet, is a money-maker, Silver believes there is room for improvement.

"With management, we want to see it get bigger, better and more profitable," he said. "To grow in a marketplace that is really not growing" would be difficult.

Prior to entering the world of media ownership, Stern and Silver found success in the apparel industry. In 1981, along with two other partners, they purchased Western Glove Works, a company founded in 1922 by Silver's grandfather and two great-uncles. They took it from a company with $9 million in sales to one generating $200 million in revenue.

Despite its name, Western Glove has long been out of the glove business, focusing instead on the manufacturing of jeans that are sold under the Silver Jeans label as well as under a variety of private labels. The pants are marketed in major retail outlets across North America.

In addition, Stern and Silver own Beach Patrol, a California-based maker of swim suits.

Silver, who was born in Winnipeg, and Stern, who was born in rural Saskatchewan and moved to Winnipeg when he was seven, both had a traditional Jewish upbringing. Stern attended a Jewish day school for one year and later an afternoon Hebrew school. His family were members of a conservative shul. He now lives in Vancouver where he is a member of the board of the city's Jewish Community Foundation.

Still a resident of Winnipeg, Silver supports the community's Jewish Foundation and Combined Jewish Appeal.

Canada expected to rap Israel over security

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada's expected support of a United Nations resolution critical of Israeli security measures is another example of the singling out of the Jewish state for unfair treatment, says the Canada-Israel Committee.

Before year's end, Canada is expected to vote for a UN General Assembly resolution – which Canada has already backed at the lower committee level – calling on Israel to stop "obstructing" the movement of aid to Palestinians.

The resolution charges that Israel's practice of searching trucks belonging to the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) and questioning UN staff has seriously impeded the flow of medical supplies, food and other provisions to Palestinians.

Israel has said its searches are essential to its security and no different from security increases worldwide since Sept. 11. Israel also points out that the UN permits such searches.

Even so, the resolution is expected to be rubber-stamped by the 189-member General Assembly. Most UN measures are formulated, debated and voted on in committee meetings. The resolution is one of 18 related measures expected to come up for deliberation before the end of December.

The draft version of the resolution "calls upon Israel to cease obstructing the movement of personnel, vehicles and supplies of the agency."

The resolution is "certainly problematic," says the CIC's David Goldberg. "Israel isn't interested in stopping humanitarian aid, but in supplies that may be used for less than humanitarian purposes. Israel has every right to defend itself."

The measure was "slipped" into an otherwise routine procedural resolution, Goldberg said, adding anti-Israel motions of this sort come up regularly at the UN, where they are bundled together with other measures.

He said it's all but certain Canada will vote for the resolution at the General Assembly. Only Israel and the United States are expected to vote against it, as they did in committee.

U.S. expected to vote against resolution

Goldberg said he is "uncomfortable" with Canada's support for the resolution, especially at a time when countries around the world, Canada included, are beefing up security to the point where many experts have raised questions about possible infringement of civil liberties.

Canada's ambassador to the UN, Paul Heinbecker, was quoted last week as saying that no one is asking the Israelis to compromise their security. "But the view now is that UNRWA could be dealt with in a way that was not so limiting to its effort to carry out its mandate."

Goldberg said it's unfair that the work of UNRWA has been politicized.

"But what's really unfair," he added, "is that UNRWA exists at all. That it's still in business is a tragedy." He argues that had the Palestinian leadership accepted Israel's concessions and reached a final peace deal at Camp David last year, there would be no need for humanitarian aid for Palestinians.

He said there has never been an instance in which UN aid vehicles did not ultimately reach their destinations. "There are delays, but they do get through."

There's also a long-standing conflict between Israel and the UN on the interpretation of rules pertaining to the search of vehicles delivering aid.

An agreement following the 1967 Six Day War stipulates that Israel must allow the free movement of UNRWA supplies "subject only to regulations or arrangements which may be necessitated by considerations of military security."

Nevertheless, the UN cites the 1946 Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, which it says exempts UN property from search.

Goldberg concedes there's a "basic mistrust" between Israeli troops and UN personnel on the ground. That atmosphere was exacerbated a year ago, when it was believed that UN peacekeeping troops had videotaped evidence of the status of three Israeli soldiers who had been kidnapped in southern Lebanon. It has been alleged the tape Israeli authorities were permitted to view had been heavily edited.

In a related development, Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy has denounced the "biased and twisted political use of the United Nations by those promoting hatred of Israel" through the commemoration of the UN's 25th annual International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People on Nov. 29.

"No other people has a UN International Day of Solidarity," Landy said in a written statement. "Since the Arab bloc pushed this through the UN General Assembly in 1977, it has become a tool for these states to exploit the Palestinian problem, which they helped create, and simultaneously to continue their rejection of Israel as a Jewish state.

"This is a clear instance of how the neutrality of the UN has been undermined and how its institutions have been hijacked and manipulated for the promotion of one-sided propaganda. The International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People has become a vehicle to demean and delegitimize the State of Israel and to attack the Jewish people.

"We urge all Canadians not to give such biased attacks any credibility but rather to communicate their commitment to the rights and security of both the Palestinians and the people of Israel."

Can the Alliance reach Jews?

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

On the face of it, one would be hard-pressed to conjure up a political movement more inimical to traditional Jewish interests than the Reform cum Canadian Alliance party. Consider the basic ingredients: a right-wing, grassroots, populist party with roots in Western Canada. Throw in some allegations of anti-Semitism and one has the recipe for a party unwelcome to the Eastern-based, small and capital 'L' liberal, slightly left-of-centre Jewish establishment.

For the Canadian Alliance (CA), that instinctive Jewish wariness has proven to be an almost insurmountable obstacle in the effort to achieve meaningful inroads within the Jewish community. But is that wariness justified?

Can one find pockets of questionable attitudes towards the Jewish community within the CA? Yes. But that's only half an answer because one can find similar antipathy to Jews and the causes they hold dear, like Israel, within every caucus. Conversely, one can also find within the CA pockets of support for Israel that are as strong as in any other caucus.

The CA's view on immigration, for another example, is well known and in some fundamental respects diametrically opposed to the standard position advanced by the organized Jewish community. Yet despite the CA's frustration about public support for things they believe rightly belong in the private sector, the official CA position on Jewish day school funding is the only federal source of support for Jews faced with prohibitive Jewish school tuition fees.

How are we to make sense of these seeming contradictions – compelling reasons for supporting the CA and equally sound justification for opposing it?

The truth is that there are inconsistencies and contradictions in every caucus and every party's rank-and-file. If the Jewish community were to hold out until it found a political movement that dovetailed neatly with the so-called Jewish agenda, it would be a long wait.

There is also a second issue. No community, including the Jewish one, is monolithic. Jews' support for political parties is based on a whole range of issues – many of them having nothing to do with specifically Jewish concerns.

Enough time has now passed to draw certain conclusions about the Canadian Alliance. Both the current leader and many key Alliance members have demonstrated strong, consistent support for Israel – in some cases at no small cost to broader public support for the party. In many other respects, the CA platform closely parallels the positions (both fiscal and social) held by Jews who used to count themselves as Tories.

As for the particular attitudes or policies that do not jibe with the normative Jewish consciousness, the only way to address those is from the inside. The CA has reached out to the Jewish community and demonstrated its ability to adjust its policies to reflect the views of its membership.

Given that the CA has shown itself to be open, the only remaining question is whether elements within the Jewish community can be as open too.

Fogel named head of CIC

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Shimon Fogel, formerly the director of government relations for the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), has been appointed executive director, succeeding Rob Ritter who has left to begin a new career in Newfoundland and Labrador.

Originally from Montreal, Fogel has been with the CIC in Ottawa since 1988. As the head of the CIC's political bureau, he has been responsible for government relations and has served as a consultant to Parliament's standing committee on foreign affairs and as a member of the prestigious roundtable on global security under the auspices of the Department of National Defence.

Fogel said he initially joined the CIC because "it seemed like the perfect match between involvement in the political process, which is one of my passions, and work for the Jewish community, which is a love that is close to my heart.

"For 12 years, I have had the very, very best job that you could find in Canada."

Working for the CIC, said Fogel, "is promoting a cause that is at the core of every Jew's identity and it is an opportunity to express, in a concrete way, my commitment to the land and people of Israel.

"Over the past 12 years, I have made extraordinary friendships and enduring relationships with people from all parties and the Senate that transcend partisan considerations and... the friendships that I have developed have also given me an opportunity to contribute in meaningful ways to the development of Canadian public policy."

Fogel said he is "grateful for the confidence that the community leadership has expressed in me and that they have agreed to allow me to maintain a significant presence on the political side."

Fogel said he is excited about the challenges of his new position but said he will miss Ritter, with whom he has worked closely.

"Rob was my partner and among my closest friends over the past 12 years and I miss his presence and his guidance.

"I think the community will, in a very real sense, miss his leadership, but new faces provide fresh perspectives and one of the things that I think I will be able to do will be to bring a new sense of dynamism to the pro-Israel advocacy challenge."

Asked about his plans for the CIC, Fogel said he would like to be "known as someone who promoted Israel and not someone who felt it necessary simply to defend Israel."

His aim, he said, is to tell both the general public and specific target groups, that "Israel's case is righteous."

Program raises questions over govt. funding, content

Province, Montreal among sponsors of Palestinian series

MONTREAL — For the second year, the Quebec government and the City of Montreal were among the sponsors of a month-long program organized by Medical Aid for Palestine-Canada (MAP).

Called Rhythms from Palestine, the series of events held Nov. 2 to Dec. 2 raised some concerns over its "cultural" content.

The program, funded in part by the Ministère des Affaires municipales et de la Métropole, was meant in part, according to its literature, "to increase the Canadian public's awareness and understanding of the rich but not very well-known Palestinian culture."

The Rhythms program included non-political music and contemporary art segments at Place des Arts' Cinquième salle and the city-owned Chapelle Historique du Bon-Pasteur and the Château Dufresne Museum.

But its film series, which ran Nov. 21 to 25 at the National Film Board of Canada, included several that could be seen as supportive of the Palestinian cause.

Two of the films, Season of Love and Live from Palestine, described as having their world premiere here, depicted, respectively, the "truth... behind the facade of news broadcasts" and "the private lives of Palestinian reporters who cover the events of the intifadah."

The director of both documentaries, Rashid Masharawi, founder of the Cinema Production and Distribution Centre in Ramallah, was present for the screenings of his films this year and last.

The other films in the series, according to their official descriptions, also seemed to betray their political bias.

Children of Fire, by director Maï Masri, was about "Palestine... the tale of two young children from Nablus during the first intifadah."

Another by Masri, Frontiers of Fire and Dreams, chronicled the daily lives of "young Palestinian refugees [who] defy boundaries and barbed wire to build lasting friendships."

A fictional short, Four Songs for Palestine, by Nada El-Yassir, told the story of "a woman who goes about her daily business amidst death and human rights violations."

A documentary short titled Dreams, by Ismail Habbash, depicted "the violation of [Palestinian children's] rights and the resulting insecurity."

David Birnbaum, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), said in an interview that he found some of the film titles "very worrisome," adding, however, that it was difficult to gauge the films' level of anti-Israel content since no Congress representative had, at writing, seen any of them.

Birnbaum was also troubled by the fact that two levels of government were helping to sponsor the screening of films that could conceivably be disseminating "propaganda and myths" about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Birnbaum felt that the general tone of Rhythms' printed material this year seemed less strident than last year's. The 2001 edition also no longer listed Heritage Canada as a sponsor, which Birnbaum suggested might have been the result of CJC-Q's expressing its concerns to federal officials last year.

Other sponsors this year, however, included, like last year and in the exhibit at city hall in 1999, the Caisse de dépôt et de placement du Québec, the Quebec government and the City of Montreal.

Several Quebec unions, as well as the Société d'alcool du Quebec (SAQ), were also listed among the sponsors of the Rhythms program.

Thomas Hecht, chair of Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region (CIC-Q) and a board member of the Caisse de dépôt, told The CJN he would be against any event that might contain materials "promoting incitement to violence" or that "import conflicts into the Canadian scene."

He added that he is preparing a letter to sponsors of the Rhythms event, among them Caisse president Jean-Claude Scraire.

In addition to the concerns about content, some people have questioned the possibility of a conflict of interest involving the Quebec government, since MAP-Canada president Edmond Omran is the longtime partner of Municipal Affairs minister Louise Harel, whose ministry funded the Rhythms program.

However, when asked whether Harel's ministry could be perceived as being in conflict as a result of her relationship with Omran, Hecht said, "I don't know." And Birnbaum said Congress was not prepared to comment on the conflict of interest issue.

Christine Mitton, Harel's press attaché, rejected the idea of a possible conflict of interest, since, she said, her ministry funds projects equally for numerous cultural communities, including the Jewish community.

"This is the ministry's clear mandate," Mitton told The CJN, adding that the basis for receiving ministry funding is an analysis of the merits of the program, "like many other projects."

The Rhythms program, she said, received $50,000 from the Municipal Affairs Ministry this year.

Hamiltonian gets to visit restored Polish cemetery

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Moishe Gold recently fulfilled his lifelong dream of visiting Ozarow, the small town in central Poland where he can trace his family's roots back to the early 1700s.

In October, Gold travelled to Ozarow with members of a group established to restore the town's Jewish cemetery.

The Ozarow Cemetery Restoration Project (OCRP) was founded this past May by Ozarow descendants from around the world to rebuild the cemetery which was left in ruins by the Nazis during World War II. Gold's grandfather was buried there in April 1932, two months before Gold was born.

Gold, who was born and raised in Hamilton, dreamt for years of visiting the place where his grandfather, his namesake, had lived and died. He asked members of his family to go with him since he was uncomfortable going alone, but he was unsuccessful.

"It's a long way, and with Poland's history of anti-Semitism, understandably no one was interested," Gold said. "There were other Jewish tours of Poland, but as they didn't visit Ozarow, what was the point?"

For some 400 years, Ozarow had been home to a small but thriving Jewish community. Tradesmen of all kinds conducted business with, and lived alongside, their non-Jewish neighbours. The two communities buried their dead across the street from one another.

Both Gold's grandfathers were bakers: Gold's mother Sarah worked in her father's bakery. (Gold's grandfather was also the shammas in the town's only shul.) Gold's father Benjamin bought and milled wheat from the outlying farms, supplying flour to the several other bakeries in town.

In 1928, Gold's mother moved to Canada to be with her sister and brother-in-law. Two years later, she sponsored Benjamin, her husband-to-be, and the couple married soon after. As a goodbye gift, Gold's grandfather gave his future son-in-law a sefer Torah, telling him he was only allowed to sell it if he needed the money for his wedding or to marry off a child. (The Torah was never sold, and is still used today in Hamilton's Adas Israel synagogue.)

Gold's father, who arrived in Canada with no knowledge of English and with no real trade, became a junk peddler, taking his horse and wagon around the streets of Hamilton. Every Rosh Hashanah, he collected money to send home to the Ozarower rabbi so families in need there could celebrate the holidays.

By 1930, there were about 2,000 Jewish families who made up 80 percent of Ozarow's population. While life was good, there was a sense that the future lay elsewhere. Even before the World War II, said Gold, everyone dreamt of going to America.

With the outbreak of war, Jewish life in Ozarow changed forever. By 1941, its Jewish population had more than doubled. Jews from towns such as Lodz and as far away as Vienna were transported in. One day, the Nazis took about 3,500 Jews near a forest outside the town and divided them into two groups. They told the first group to undress and that they were free to go back home. The other group watched as they started to run and were all shot and killed.

On another day, Ozarow's remaining Jews were all sent to Treblinka. About 100 of them (including, Gold believes, his paternal grandfather) refused to go and were shot in the town square. Their bodies were buried in a mass grave in the Jewish cemetery. By the end of the war, the cemetery's walls were destroyed and many of its tombstones, which the Nazis had used for fortifications, were neglected and covered with vegetation.

With the help of the Polish government and Ozarow's residents, OCRP's project co-ordinators have cleared away the undergrowth and built new walls. More than 300 headstones were reset by the restoration project manager, a non-Jewish silversmith from Warsaw. A monument was erected and a plaque in five languages was installed in the cemetery's entrance.

As the cemetery was being cleared, Gold received news that the tombstone of his grandfather had been found. The Hebrew lettering was well-preserved because it had fallen face down.

Along with 25 others from OCRP, Gold travelled to Ozarow for the restored cemetery's dedication ceremony in October. More than 500 people attended, including the mayor, the wife of the Canadian ambassador, representatives of the U.S. and Israeli embassies, members of the Polish media and a film crew. A letter from the president of Poland was read out by a representative from the Polish government.

Gold went to his grandfather's reset headstone, lit a yahrzeit candle and together with the grandson of the town's last rabbi, said a special prayer.

Gold also found the location of his father's house, by now an empty field, and saw the car dealership that now stood in place of the home in which his mother had grown up.

At the dedication, a Polish TV crew interviewed Gold and other members of OCRP for a documentary about the Jews of Ozarow and the restoration of the cemetery. The footage will be shared with CBS and Channel 2 Television in Buffalo who are also interviewing descendants living in North America.

Today, Gold is writing up his diary of the trip and e-mailing Ozarow descendants who were unable to join the trip, including one person from another lost Jewish community who is looking for advice on how to restore its cemetery.

For more information about Ozarow's Jewish cemetery and OCRP, visit www.ozarow.org. Photos of the dedication ceremony can be found on the Polish Web site at www.ozarow.net.

JCS hires first Israel affairs co-ordinator

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Stuart Lapowich would have liked to stay in Israel, but the yored chadash – as he refers to himself, using the Hebrew term for a person who has just moved from Israel – has found a new niche here.

"What I've learned from my time [in Israel], I can definitely instill in students," he said recently over coffee, speaking about his new job with Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto.

Stuart Lapowich

Lapowich, 25, is JCS' Israel affairs co-ordinator, a newly created position in which he has responsibilities related to the Birthright program as well as to helping students address Israel-related issues on campus.

To the best of his knowledge, his position is unique in Canada, but he has had American counterparts for at least three years, he said.

He is excited about working with staff and students involved in Birthright Israel, the free 10-day trips for young Jewish adults between the ages of 18 and 26 who have never been on an educational trip to Israel. "I think the Birthright initiative is amazing," Lapowich said.

He also sees it as the "perfect springboard" to motivate students to become more active on campus. Under the aegis of JCS, there will be four busloads of Birthright participants (160 students) later this month and two buses (80 participants) in February.

Lapowich's hiring in mid-November was particularly timely with respect to York University, where Jewish students have been dealing with increased tensions as well as anti-Israel and anti-Semitic comments recently (see CJN, Nov. 29).

To help students who want to speak out on behalf of Israel but who may feel at a loss to do so effectively, Lapowich is co-ordinating a weekly media update, organizing speakers about Israel, and working on a monthly newsletter that is expected to debut early in the new year, to serve as a student forum in response to Israel-related issues on individual campuses.

York and U of T will run Israel Week concurrently in January, and an Israel advocacy weekend retreat is planned for early February, Lapowich said.

At the University of Toronto, Jewish students are interested in starting interfaith dialogues, a longtime area of interest for Lapowich. In 1999, he oversaw a Canadian Young Judaea program in Israel, in which Jewish teens interacted with their Arab counterparts; and he recalls that even as a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, he suggested the school initiate dialogues with non-Jews.

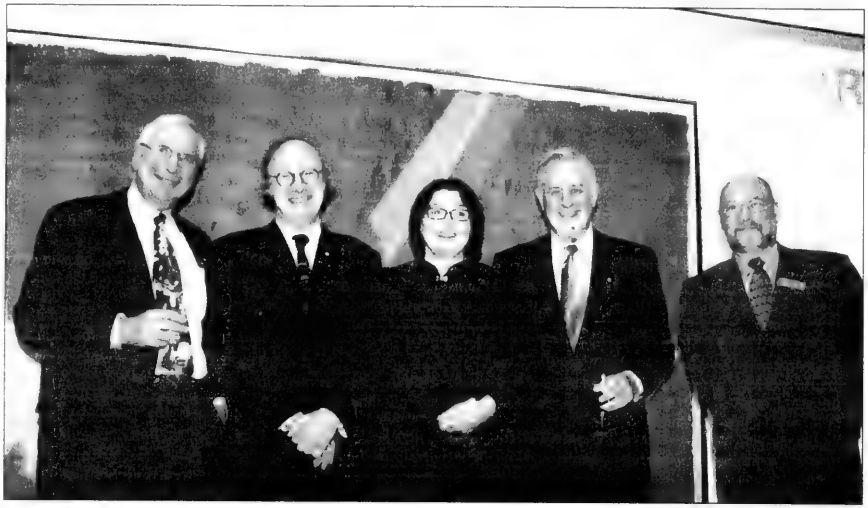
Although Jewish day school alumni have "a great base of knowledge," Lapowich believes some of them may be at a disadvantage because they lack experience dealing with anti-Israel challengers, having spent their younger years in a sheltered environment.

"I think that Canadian Jewish students can sometimes live a sheltered life," he said. "Every exposure to a new culture, or a new idea, is beneficial to one's development." He also believes students need to learn about opposing viewpoints and the culture they derive from in order to respond knowledgeably to criticisms.

A Toronto native who made aliyah three years ago, Lapowich returned in September after his sister gave birth to twins. "I don't want to be a once-a-year uncle," he said.

Lapowich is also finishing his MBA at York University, having transferred from Tel Aviv University. In Israel, he also combined work and study, most recently as a software consultant. An alumnus of the Canadian Young Judaea camp system, he returned to the organization as a program director for two summers and again this past summer to run Camp Shalom's tripping program.

"I truly believe from my days as a youth leader that the greatest gift I can give somebody is to make [him or her] empowered, to get them to a point where they can respond well and deal with the issues themselves," he said. "Nobody should be uncomfortable with their identity, and they should have the tools to back it up."



GOLDFARB CENTRE OPENS: York University opened the Joan & Martin Goldfarb Centre for Fine Arts last week in recognition of the Goldfarbs' $3.75-million gift – consisting of art works and cash for capital improvements – to the University's Faculty of Fine Arts. From left, Marshall Cohen, chair of York's board of governors, Martin and Joan Goldfarb, Avie Bennett, York's chancellor and Phillip Silver, dean of of fine arts, stand in front of a Jack Bush canvas, one of the donated works.

U of Western Ontario students open new JSU house

Largest residential Jewish student population in Canada

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

LONDON, Ont. — The University of Western Ontario has the largest residential Jewish student population in Canada, and the third-largest Jewish student population in the country, according to Josh Shuval, president of the university's Jewish Students' Union (JSU).

The organization (www.usc.uwo.ca/clubs/jsu) also boasts the largest executive of any Jewish student group in Canada, with more than 40 students. "Our meetings are...something else," said Shuval at the recent festive opening of the JSU house.

The acquisition of the 2,000-square-foot home, which has been rented for a year, and the hiring of two new staff people – executive director Jared Isaacson (who replaced Arye Berk, now studying at rabbinical school) and program director Jordan Cares – reflect the renewed vitality of the JSU, and the sizeable Jewish student population, estimated at approximately 2,800 students, or 10 percent of the overall undergraduate population.

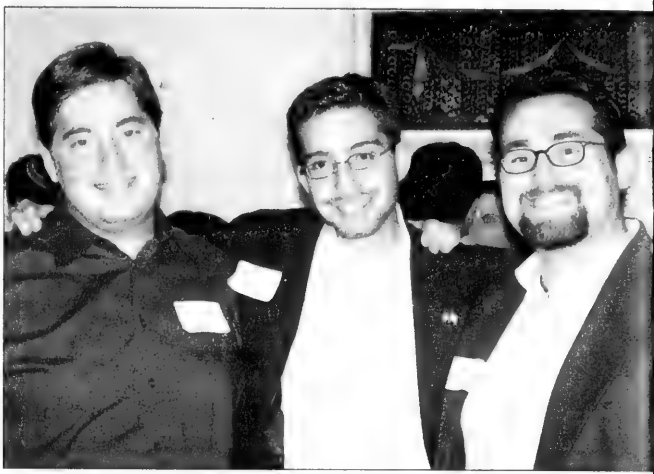
The JSU hasn't had its own house in more than 20 years, said Shuval.

To the best of his knowledge, UWO is one of the last campuses of its size, in terms of Jewish population, to get its own house and have more than one staff person, Shuval told The CJN in an interview. There are 600 students on its e-mail list, 400 of whom are paid-up members.

The JSU has also become an agency of the London Jewish Federation, he added. "It has made us into a much stronger campus than we were before."

Shuval and others would also like to see a stronger connection between the JSU and the Toronto Jewish community, home for more than half the JSU students.

The London Jewish community is not large enough to sustain a student population that is almost its equivalent in numbers, he said.



Among the celebrants at the opening of the JSU house were, from left, Jordan Cares, Josh Shuval and Jared Isaacson. [Frances Kraft photos]

Don Abelson, a UWO faculty member and co-chair of the London Campus Committee with Daniel Sandler, expressed his hopes that the JSU would become fully absorbed into the London Jewish community.

"We have much to learn from you and much to benefit from – your energy, spirit and insight, and hopefully in return the London Jewish community can afford you an opportunity to participate even more fully in the events that we sponsor," Abelson told students at the opening.

The JSU's new home, located at 1233 Richmond St., is a former Chabad House located a five-to-10-minute walk away from three dorms. Although it has yet to be furnished, the old house, with its oversize moldings, working fireplace and stained-glass transom windows, exudes character. Its first program, a barbeque in September, attracted 140 people.

The main floor has a kitchen and three other rooms, where students can hang out or take part in programs. The four upstairs bedrooms will be used for offices and conference rooms.

The new Jewish Students' Union house at the University of Western Ontario.

"We want to see this develop as a home for Jewish student life here in London, and help us grow as a campus organization into the community itself...as we help develop our community's future leaders," said Isaacson.

The JSU's on-campus office in the university's main hub, which the house is supplementing, is so small that Maxyne Finkelstein, executive director of UIA Federations Canada, quipped that when she first visited last year, she realized that "if somebody gained weight, you were finished."

UIAFC, along with the London Jewish Federation, is funding the house. "This is considered a very important national service, helping students connect Jewishly, and a very important part of that is to have a home, and meet other Jews," Finkelstein told the students and community representatives at the opening.

She noted that a house for Jewish students also opened recently in Waterloo (the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Students' Centre of Kitchener-Waterloo). "I hope this is the beginning of a long line of homes that will open for students across the country," she said.

The ultimate goal in London is to have a permanent facility, said Frank Simkevitz of UIAFC in a phone interview. Simkevitz, who is director of the London Jewish Community Foundation and the liaison between the London Jewish Federation and UIAFC (among his other roles), said that under Berk's direction, the JSU was built up over and has become more active in recent years.

The JSU is now seeking donations for the house in the form of furnishings (or money for furnishings) – everything from cooking utensils for its kosher kitchen to bookshelves, couches and filing cabinets.

Among other indications of a thriving Jewish student population at UWO is the eight-page inaugural edition of the JSU Schmuze, JSU's new newsletter, co-edited by Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto alumni Michael Tweyman and Daniel Weinerman.

What is the appeal of the university for so many Toronto students? "It's close to Toronto, but not too close," said second-year student Marci Turner, who is the JSU's cultural and religious co-commissioner with Karen Hershenfield, also a Torontonian.

"You're away but you can come home whenever you want," Turner said. "There's a wide variety of programs. It's a good school. It's an appealing package."

Students make proposal to empower their peers

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canadian student leaders who attended the recent General Assembly (GA) of the United Jewish Communities in Washington, D.C., proposed a new initiative that will empower them by allowing them to network with Jewish student clubs across the country.

The proposed committee would give students the power to deal with advocacy, programming and funding issues and would be run by students for students with the backing of staff and lay leaders, said Montreal Hillel vice-president and McGill student Shoshi Gal.

Gal said the students are relying on lay leaders to support them while they get the committee off the ground.

"We totally need the help of the adult community... we need [them] to believe in us," said Gal.

The committee, which will function as a support network and a forum in which to compare and exchange ideas and strategies, will be Canadian students' first opportunity to join as one group to discuss campus issues and to learn from events at other universities.

"It's a forum for university leadership to talk to each other," said Lance Davis, director of student leadership at UIA, which funds most of the campus services across Canada.

"There is [currently] no national forum to discuss issues that are of concern to them as Jews," said Barbara Bank, chair of the National Campus Committee, a fledgling organization of lay leaders interested in supporting Jewish campus life.

The proposed committee will tailor students' ideas and strategies to meet specific campus needs.

Joanna Grossman of Dalhousie University in Halifax is glad the committee will allow campuses with small Jewish populations to be seen and heard. Small campuses tend to be overwhelmed by larger universities because they lack the resources to compete for attention.

"Small campuses need to have a voice," she said.

Gal sees the committee as an opportunity to counteract student apathy and to involve more students in Jewish campus life.

"The way to destroy apathy is to empower students," said Gal.

Bank and Adam Minsky, director of national Jewish campus services, UIA Federations Canada, attended a brief session with the students at the GA and agreed to support the new initiative alongside the National Campus Committee.

"We will help them obtain the things they need to have a vibrant student life," Bank said.

Chef Wolfe's a maestro in the kitchen

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When chef Josh Wolfe, 24, steps into a kitchen, he feels like an orchestra conductor.

"If a cellist in an orchestra misses a note, the audience notices. And with food as well, a good meal is only as strong as its weakest dish," says Wolfe, a graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools, CHAT and the culinary arts program at Humber College.

"You can have a delicious sauce, beautiful fish, wonderful ravioli, but if the vegetables are overcooked, everything is affected."

Wolfe recently won a gold medal in the Ontario division of the Skills Canada cooking competition held in Kitchener, Ont., and went on to win a bronze medal in the national competition, held in Edmonton.

He is now working towards obtaining his Red Seal, a national standard for the certification of chefs that, among other things requires 6,000 hours work under a registered chef.

When Wolfe was growing up, his grandfather ran a hotel and bar in London, Ont., and "I was always intrigued with the food part of the business. The mass popularity of cooking on television sort of fortified that feeling."

He often cooked at home for family barbecues and Shabbat dinners, and at 20, got his first kitchen job with Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers. "I worked as a prep cook, peeling and cutting, and placing food on platters.

"I began to love the work. There is something about putting on my whites that energizes me."

This past summer, Wolfe, a former Camp Ramah camper, spent a month at the camp teaching cooking, and he says a number of boys took part.

Josh Wolfe

"One dish we made was a standard puree of vegetable, which we used to stuff homemade ravioli. For dessert we made frozen maple parfait with wild blueberry sauce.

"We made dishes that people could duplicate at home. I taught them that a good meal does not have to be complicated or expensive.

"I was thrilled to get a phone call from a mother who said her child went home and made the family pasta and tomato sauce with parmesan cheese. That was my payoff."

He also taught them a little bit about the science of food. "For example, the egg white and egg yolk cook at different temperatures, so it is important to mix the egg thoroughly and put it in the pan immediately so the cooking times balance each other."

There is a tremendous value in cooking classes, Wolfe says. "People cook together and learn from one another; there is a real element of sharing. I may teach a technique and that may spark an idea. Everyone benefits."

The food industry is a dynamic one, he says. "If you ever do the same thing twice, you're at the back of the pack. When you're cooking in a restaurant you need to be aware that the products available change daily, the people change daily and even the humidity changes. You have to maintain control and keep these things in mind.

"You can't be straight and narrow. You can't necessarily do what you did yesterday. You have to see all around you and you have to step out of the situation before you react to it."

It's an unforgiving business, he says. "People know what they like, and if they don't get it, they won't come back."

Wolfe says he is "happy to have made food my livelihood. Whether it's as a restaurant owner or teacher, or as a chef in someone else's kitchen, I just love the notion of feeding people and providing sustenance.

"Cooking is what I do. I spend all my money on cookbooks, and on my day off, I cook for family and friends."

Wolfe developed the following "Canadian desserts. The four recipes all combine to form one spectacular dessert which showcases truly Canadian ingredients. Use them together or as elements of other dessert plates. Any way you use them, enjoy the products, enjoy the process, and happy cooking."

CANADIAN MAPLE PARFAIT

½ cup no. 1 maple syrup
2 large egg yolks
2 cups whipped 35 percent cream

Combine first two ingredients in a large bowl and place over barely simmering water. Whisk continuously until doubled in volume and bottom of bowl remains clean when scraped. (If heat is too high, the eggs will scramble so take your time and do not stop whisking.)

When cooked, set aside and allow to cool to room temperature. Whisk cream to firm peaks by hand or by machine. Fold whipped cream into cooked mixture in three stages so as not to lose volume.

Distribute base into four equal portions in any shaped mould and freeze immediately for at least four hours. The heat of your hand or warm water around the mould should be enough to remove parfait when ready to serve.

MAPLE FUDGE

1 cup sugar
½ cup maple sugar
¼ cup 10 percent cream
1½ tbsp. butter

Combine the first three ingredients in a pot and boil to 238 degrees on a candy thermometer while stirring occasionally. Remove from heat and allow to cool to 110 degrees without stirring.

Transfer to a bowl and stir in butter with a wooden spoon until slightly harder. Transfer onto parchment paper right away. Place on a flat tray to shape. Cut into small cubes to garnish the parfait.

MAPLE LEAF SHAPED CHOCOLATE TUILLES

Use these if you have time to add incredible visual appeal along with a little crunch to the whole dessert.

2 tbsp. butter
2 tbsp. sugar
2 tbsp. egg whites at room temperature drop of vanilla
1½ tbsp. flour
⅔ tbsp. cocoa powder

Cream butter and sugar. Gradually incorporate egg whites and vanilla. Sift in flour and cocoa powder and mix until just incorporated. Do not over-mix. Place in fridge to cool.

Cut out small maple leaf shapes in a piece of plastic or overhead sheet plastic. With a spatula spread the chilled mixture over the cut-out onto parchment paper. You'll need five to six for each plate.

No Middle Eastern meal starts without hummus

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

It's fair to say that no authentic Middle Eastern meal starts without a plate of the chick pea purée known as hummus, and lots of straight-from-the-oven pita to mop it up.

An inseparable part of the Israeli scene too, hummus is the standard first course at every local Israeli restaurant, but it is also served at many Israeli weddings and Shabbat dinners, whether the participants live in Casablanca or California.

But why this hummus hang-up? It seems there may be more to it than just great taste. Researchers at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem have just publicized findings in which they claim that the humble Middle Eastern hummus has extraordinary health benefits. Hummus was found to be a complete protein that could replace soy as an animal-protein substitute. Scientists are also excited about studies showing that hummus may have cosmetic uses. We've all heard of avocado masks, but how about a hummus facial?

Although yummy with pita, hummus is delicious when served in other ways, too. Use it as a dip for raw vegetables, crackers, or bagel chips. Or try your own fusion cooking and spread it on country bread, then add sliced tomatoes and alfalfa sprouts. Hummus can also be used as a salad dressing when thinned with additional oil and lemon juice.

If you want to experience an authentic hummus, on your next trip to Israel be sure to stop in at Uzi's, a little hole-in-the-wall place in the centre of the coastal town of Netanya. A thoroughly engaging host, Uzi grinds his hummus the old-fashioned way: by hand with a mortar and pestle. He then serves it warm, adorned with hot chili peppers and the usual trimmings. This is serious business – not for the faint-hearted.

Supermarkets that carry hummus may offer a choice of homestyle, spicy or any one of a number of other variations. But it's a challenge to make your own and get the consistency and taste exactly to your liking. But first you must decide how authentic you wish to be. Purists will sort, soak and cook the chick peas from scratch, but most of us will take the easy way out with canned chick peas.

TRADITIONAL HUMMUS

2 15-oz. cans of chick peas, well drained
½ cup tahini (sesame paste)
¼ cup lemon juice
2 garlic cloves, minced
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
¼ tsp. ground cumin

Garnish:
1 tbsp. olive oil
¼ tsp. paprika
1 tbsp. parsley, chopped, for garnish

Place all ingredients in a food processor or blender (reserve ¼ cup chickpeas for garnish) and puree until a smooth paste is formed. Add more lemon juice if a thinner consistency is required. Chill for at least two hours in a covered container. To serve, place a thin layer of hummus in a small serving bowl, smoothing it down evenly with a knife. Pour the olive oil in the centre. Sprinkle with paprika and parsley. Garnish with the reserved chick peas. Makes 1¼ cups. Yield: 4 servings.

MIDDLE EASTERN DAIRY HUMMUS

2 15-oz. cans of chick peas, well drained
1 cup dairy sour cream
1 cup unflavoured yogurt
juice of 1 lemon
½ cup (packed) stemmed fresh flat-leaf parsley
½ cup (packed) stemmed fresh cilantro
2 garlic cloves
½ cup olive oil
salt and pepper to taste
For garnish: few cilantro sprigs

Place all ingredients, except salt and pepper and a few cilantro sprigs, in a food processor or blender until a smooth paste is formed. Chill for at least two hours in a covered container. To serve, place a thin layer of hummus in a small serving bowl, smoothing it down evenly with a butter knife. Garnish with cilantro sprigs. Yield: 8 servings.

Bake in oven for five or six minutes until firm. Be careful, as they burn quickly. Allow to harden on tray at room temperature. Store wrapped in plastic.

MUSKOKA BLUEBERRY COULIS

4 cups fresh or frozen blueberries
⅔ cups sugar

Place both ingredients in a pot and bring to a boil. Reduce the heat to a simmer. Continue to simmer for 35 to 40 minutes until mixture has thickened considerably.

Cool slightly and transfer to a blender to puree. You can always thin the sauce with water if it is too thick.

Canadian reaction to weekend terror

Jewish groups, political leaders condemn attacks

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) is urging the government of Canada to boycott UN meetings in Geneva this week that are widely expected to be used as a forum for Israel-bashing.

Speaking in the aftermath of the Palestinian terrorist bombings in Jerusalem and Haifa, the CIC, the Jewish community's lobbying arm on Israel, also called on the federal government to rethink its financial support for Palestinians unless there is "a clear and sustained change in the behaviour of Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority (PA)."

The CIC, like other Canadian and international Jewish organizations, reacted with outrage and expressed sympathy for the victims as the full extent of the weekend terror attacks became known.

Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien used some of the most forceful language yet in his condemnation of the suicide bombings. A statement released by the prime minister noted his "anger" at "the terrorist attacks perpetrated in Jerusalem and Haifa.

"We reject absolutely any suggestion that such abhorrent action can ever be justified in any way," he said. "Violence and fear are never the tools of justice, they are the weapons of blinkered extremists, who tolerate only their point of view and accept no civilized restraint in seeking its imposition."

The prime minister counseled Israel and "peace loving people throughout the region" not to give in to despair, but instead "continue to work for the lasting peace that they have craved for so long."

Opposition leader Stockwell Day called the bombings "heartbreaking beyond belief. Just as it is devastating to the people of Israel, it is devastating for people who love peace everywhere that these types of evil and bloodthirsty attacks take place."

Day, leader of the Canadian Alliance party, told The CJN that Arafat must demonstrate he has the power to crack down on Hamas, Islamic Jihad and his own Fatah faction, which was responsible for one of the attacks.

He called on Canada to stand by Israel, "just as we are standing by the United States when they were brutally attacked by evil murderers." And he called on the federal government to indicate whether any Canadian funds are being used to buy anti-Israel textbooks used in the Palestinian education system.

In a statement released following the bombings, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) questioned whether peace with an Arafat-led administration is possible.

"If Arafat can control the terrorists but is refusing to do so, he and the PA should be treated exactly as the Taliban in Afghanistan. If Arafat has no control over the terrorists, what is the use of negotiating and signing agreements with a party who cannot enforce the peace?" said CJC president Keith Landy.

Landy urged the international community to re-evaluate its approach to Arafat and the PA.

"Like all Canadians, we were horrified by the carnage we saw wrought in the heart of Israeli cities by suicide bombers, incited, recruited, trained, encouraged and honoured in the territory under the PA," Landy said.

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said the weekend's "mass murders are... the culmination of the failure to educate Palestinian children that Israel has the right to exist and of the attitude of organizations and NGOs at [the Durban conference on racism]. You end up getting nothing but encouragement for those mass murders."

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, said "We condemn the terrorist attacks and we believe the appropriate response for our Canadian government is to vote against pro-Palestinian and anti-Israel resolutions at the UN.

"Canada must show by its deeds it stands against the terrorism in the United States and Israel and not be seen in the bloc... that harbours and supports terrorist forces against Israel and the western world."

In Montreal, meanwhile, "a rally against murder and incitement" was held Monday at Dorchester (Dominion) Square. It was organized by a variety of community organizations.

Israel strikes Gaza after attacks

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — IDF Apache gunships fired missiles at targets near Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's Gaza headquarters Monday afternoon in apparent retaliation for weekend suicide bombings by Islamic militants.

Arafat was staying in Ramallah at the time of the attack, and no injuries were reported.

Military sources said Arafat's helicopter was attacked to restrict his freedom of movement, at least symbolically.

White smoke rose into the air as Palestinian security personnel ran away from the area under attack. Ambulances raced to the scene. Palestinian sources said 19 missiles were launched in the half-hour long attack.

Earlier Monday, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon held emergency consultations with key cabinet ministers to decide on an Israeli response to two bombings and a shooting attack that killed a total of 26 people and wounded nearly 200, most of them Israelis.

Sharon was to address the nation later Monday, before convening the full cabinet. Israel Radio, citing Sharon aides, said cabinet was expected to approve harsh retaliation, but stop short of crushing Arafat's PA.

In Washington Sunday, Sharon told U.S. President George W. Bush that Israel no longer expects Arafat to deal with terrorism, and that "Israel will act against those who perpetuate terror and those who send them on their missions."

Arafat's 'moment of truth'

At their meeting at the White House Sunday, Sharon told Bush that Israel holds Arafat directly accountable for the recent wave of terror attacks in Israel.

Bush told Sharon that he is demanding immediate and wide-ranging action from Arafat against terror. This includes the immediate arrest of those responsible for terror attacks as well as action against terror organizations such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

A senior diplomatic source said "there was not even the slightest disagreement between the two" during the meeting. He said Sharon did not give the president any details on how Israel plans to react, but informed him that Israel intends to step-up its operations.

The Bush-Sharon meeting was moved up from Monday to allow the prime minister to return home to Israel as bombings in Jerusalem and Haifa threatened to wreck a U.S. Middle East peace mission led by retired U.S. Marine Gen. Anthony Zinni.

National Security Council spokesperson Sean McCormick told reporters at the end of the meeting that if Arafat wants to be a leader, he must "step up."

McCormick stressed the focus must now be on the Palestinian leader's deeds, and that it was impractical to demand that Israel return to the negotiating table before Arafat acts.

He said Bush and Sharon also discussed ways to increase Israel-U.S. cooperation in the war against terror and also against those behind attacks on Israel.

They also discussed the U.S. war on terror and the possibility the U.S. will strike Iraq. The two leaders agreed to maintain contact on the issue.

Sharon was the only participant from the Israeli side at the meeting. The Americans were represented by Bush, Secretary of State Colin Powell and National Security Advisor Condoleeza Rice, who had helped make preparations for the meeting and held talks with Shin Bet head Avi Dichter on Friday.

"This is a moment where the advocates for peace in the Middle East must rise up and fight terror," Bush said prior to the meeting, after arriving from Camp David. "Chairman Arafat must do everything in his power to find those who murdered innocent Israelis and bring them to justice."

Tank commander hunts down father's killers

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prof. Baruch Zinger, 51, of Gadera, was murdered Sunday morning in a terror attack near the Alei Sinai settlement in the Gaza Strip.

An IDF tank unit, the commanders of which included Oded Zinger, the victim's son, killed the two Hamas gunmen who carried out the shooting.

The attack occurred at 8 a.m. Zinger, who worked at the Nahal Sorek nuclear research institute, was on his way to pick up his son for a furlough. Oded had received special permission to travel to London, and his parents had visited him Saturday night at his IDF base, close to the Nissanit settlement.

Zinger returned to the area yesterday to get his son and take him to the airport. To expedite Oded's departure, Zinger first travelled to Alei Sinai, about 1.5 kilometres from the IDF base, to pick up a tank commander who would take over Oded's duties. En route, Zinger was gunned down in his car by two Palestinian assailants clad in IDF uniforms and armed with Kalashnikov assault rifles and hand grenades.

After the shots were fired at his jeep, Zinger managed to drive another few dozen metres. He then placed a call to his wife, Nurit.

"Nurit, I am between Nissanit and Alei Sinai. Call the police; I'm wounded," his wife subsequently recalled him saying.

Zinger's next, and last, phone conversation was with Oded. After describing the incident, he said: "I see them three or four metres behind me. They are going to shoot me."

The conversation then came to an abrupt end.

The Palestinian gunmen approached Zinger, shot him again, this time from point blank range, and killed him.

At this stage, IDF forces, including a tank commanded by Oded Zinger, rolled onto the scene. A fellow officer from the tank platoon fired the shell that killed the two terrorists.

Hamas claimed responsibility for the attack, stating that the two assailants, from Gaza, had been members of the organization's military wing, Iz a Din al-Kassam.

Zinger was murdered on a road that is considered one of the safest routes in the Gaza Strip. Close to the Green Line border, the road connects Gaza's northern settlements with Israel. There have been few daylight attacks on the road.

Rumsfeld expresses doubts about Arafat's control

Powell said Arafat was facing a "moment of truth" and that it was imperative that he "take positive action now" to halt the violence in the Mideast.

Speaking on the CBS's Face the Nation, Powell said he told Arafat on Saturday night that "he had to respond and not just pick up the perpetrators" of the bombings in Haifa and Jerusalem, but "take action to make sure that there were not other perpetrators in these organizations getting ready to commit further acts."

"And so it is a moment of truth, Mister Arafat," Powell said. "I told him that it was absolutely necessary for him to take positive action now."

Powell said he believed Arafat had enough control "that would permit him to do more than he is doing now," including halting all incitement and putting perpetrators in "real jails."

"The deadline ought to be now. Stop now," he said. "Use all of your legitimate power but more than that, use the power of your position as leader of the Palestinian people to bring this kind of…violence to an end and make a 100 percent effort and get as high a level of results as you can."

U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld expressed doubts Sunday that Arafat had "good control" over the Palestinian people in light of the wave of terror attacks.

On NBC's Meet the Press, Rumsfeld said Arafat "is not a particularly strong leader, and I don't know that he has good control over the Palestinian situation."

Rumsfeld added that Arafat "has not ever delivered anything for the Palestinian people throughout history. His record is not particularly impressive."

Zinni called Saturday night's deadly suicide attacks in the heart of Jerusalem, "the deepest evil that one can imagine, to attack young people, children."

Speaking at the scene of the bombings, where he laid a wreath Sunday on behalf of his government, Zinni vowed that "we will stand together and show the world that we will not stand for this."

An angry mob greeted the special envoy, booing him and calling out "death to Arabs" and he walked from the places where the two suicide bombers blew themselves up. Security officers stopped Zinni from continuing to the area where the car bomb exploded, because of the seething crowd.

Business as usual in terror-struck capital

By ORI NIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Jerusalemites go back to work immediately after a bombing, and last weekend was no different.

"The attacks are part of our routine," said Hanan Hershkowitz, 30, a money-changer whose shop sits right between the two locations where the suicide bombers blew themselves up at the Ben-Yehuda pedestrian mall on Saturday night.

"We live with terror. We have it for breakfast, lunch and dinner," Hershkowitz said wryly.

When the bombs went off, Hershkowitz was sitting with some friends at a nearby pub. He immediately headed for his shop; on the way, at Zion Square, he saw a large object on the ground. Realizing it was a piece of a body, he decided to watch over it so that it would not be trampled by the rescue workers.

"I left only after the chevrah kadishah guys came by to collect it. I was there until three in the morning."

Four hours later, Hershkowitz was back in the pedestrian mall to open his shop. A few customers came in to buy and sell some dollars while the Income Tax Authority officials conducted their assessment of the damage to his shop and others nearby.

David Abergil, 41, was at Drugstore 2000, an all-night mini-market, for his 12-hour shift at the cash register as the shop's night manager when the suicide bombers struck. "Half-an-hour after I started my shift, the bomb went off in front of my eyes. Two people flew through the air."

Abergil was standing outside the shop at the time. "I saw a flame in the sky and felt the impact and saw people flying."

A man in his 30s tottered toward the entrance to the shop and collapsed, he recalls.

Abergil, a medic in the army, saw the blood flowing from the man's leg.

"I pulled down his pants and thought his leg was gone. I grabbed some bandages from a shelf and made him a tourniquet above the knee and then another one. He was bleeding a lot. I held the tourniquet with one hand and reached into the refrigerator with another to get a bottle of water to give him something to drink. He kept asking: 'Is my leg there?' And I said, 'Yes, you still have a leg.'"

Later, after an ambulance had taken the man away, Abergil mopped up the blood and then closed the shop for a few hours.

But Jerusalemites go straight back to work after a terrorist bombing, and by 7 a.m. Sunday morning, Abergil was back at the cash register, packing milk and yogurt into a plastic bag for a secretary on her way to work.

"I work from 10 to 10, finish a shift, go home to rest; and then I'm back again. It's Russian roulette. Today, he was hurt. Tomorrow, it could be me."

Court delays Sharon case decision

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

BRUSSELS — A Belgian appeals court is expected to decide early next year on whether Belgium has jurisdiction in a case of Palestinians trying to bring war crimes charges against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, after the Belgian state prosecutor said that the trial should go ahead.

The plaintiffs contend that Sharon, then the defence minister, bears responsibility for atrocities committed by Christian militiamen allied with Israel in killing hundreds of Palestian refugees in a 1982 revenge operation in the Sabra and Chatilla refugee camps in Lebanon.

Israel's attorneys have argued that Belgium does not have jurisdiction over the case, and hinted the episode could have far-reaching consequences for Belgian-Israeli relations.

Belgium has no jurisdiction: Israel

At the opening session of the appeals hearing, prosecutor Pierre Morlet argued that a Belgian court could take on the case presented by a group of survivors of the massacre in which 900 men, women and children were killed. Morlet rejected the Israeli arguments of immunity, lack of jurisdiction and the retroactive application of the Belgian law, promulgated in 1993, to events that took place a decade earlier.

The court decided that it would hold two more sessions – at the end of December and the end of January – to continue hearing arguments about whether the investigation and trial should take place, and then would release a decision. Even so, both sides have already said they would appeal a decision not in their favour.

Michael Verhaeghe, the Palestinians' lawyer, said that it was "very encouraging" that the prosecution agreed with the Palestinians' arguments. But the Israeli side voiced its disapproval of the decision.

"To make Israel responsible is not justice," said Kohn. "We feel the complaints are hurting our sovereignty."

One senior Israeli official earlier likened the legal move against Sharon to the Palestinian uprising and to terrorism at home.

"What is happening here is part of the intifadah, of the Palestinian struggle against Israel," said one member of a joint Foreign Ministry-Justice Ministry delegation dispatched to Brussels to act as spokemen for the Israeli position.

"In Israel they carry out terrorist attacks, and here they are making manipulative use of Belgian law in order to attack Israel."

The hearing came a day after Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat became the latest international figure to face a complaint in a Brussels court for crimes against humanity, when lawyers representing 33 Israelis and Belgians accused the Palestinian leader of initiating terrorist attacks.

The court is already considering complaints against a string of other past and present world leaders, including Cuban President Fidel Castro, former Iranian president Hashemi Rafsanjani and Rwandan President Paul Kagame.

The suit contains personal claims against Arafat, Tanzim chief Marwan Barghouti and Palestinian preventative security heads Jibril Rajoub and Mohammed Dahlan for "murder, crimes against humanity, and genocide."

Lawyers representing about 30 Israelis filed the complaint with a Belgian examining magistrate, holding Arafat and the groups responsible for a series of attacks including the August 9 suicide bombing of the Sbarro restaurant in Jerusalem that killed 16 people. Victims of Palestinian terror held a demonstration outside the courthouse before the complaint was filed.

Twenty-eight of the plaintiffs are Israeli victims of terrorism; the other two are Belgians whose family members died as a result of Palestinian terrorism. One of the Belgians is a Jew whose brother was killed in an attack on a synagogue in Brussels in 1982. The second is a non-Jew whose brother, a diplomat, was killed during an attack on the Jordanian embassy in Khartoum in 1971.

Palestinians shaken by Israeli endurance

BY MOTI BASSOK
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – Israel's resilience after a year of the intifadah has unnerved the Palestinians, said Deputy Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon last week in a speech at an annual conference of Finance Ministry staff.

Israel has had to absorb over 9,000 attacks since the beginning of the intifadah, he said, but despite the scores of dead and wounded, the morale of the Israeli public remains high. He stressed the need to maintain this level of morale since it is an important factor in the balance of power between Israel and the Palestinians.

Ya'alon told the conference he believed the Palestinian leaders were evading a historic end to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"The Palestinians will continue the violent uprising as long as they believe it serves their purpose," he said. He also said he believed the outcome of this conflict is more crucial than that of all of Israel's wars.

According to Ya'alon, the Arab countries know they are unable to stand up to the Israel Defence Forces in a direct military confrontation and have therefore chosen terrorism. He warned, however, that Syria possesses long-range missiles that can cover all of Israel's territories, as well as chemical missiles.

The deputy chief of staff said the IDF had foreseen a Palestinian uprising in September 2000 after the failure of the talks at Camp David, and had prepared accordingly. He noted the IDF has not made use of all its capabilities in the current conflict. The two missions in which it used fighter planes during the intifadah were successful, he said, and did not kill innocent civilians.

Ya'alon also expressed his sorrow for the death of five children in Khan Yunis last Friday. The children were killed when they accidentally came across a bomb planted by IDF soldiers.

The Week in Israel

• The IDF withdrew from Jenin. The withdrawal was seen as a goodwill gesture to U.S. envoy Anthony Zinni who arrived in the region today.

Nov. 27

• Two Israelis were killed and dozens wounded when two Palestinians opened fire in Afula. The gunmen, who were believed to have been from the Jenin area, were shot dead.

• An Israeli woman was killed by a Palestinian in a drive-by shooting near Gush Katif in Gaza.

Nov. 28

• Palestinians fired on Gilo. No one was hurt and the IDF returned fire.

• Representatives of Christian churches in Jerusalem urged Israel to permanently halt construction of a mosque in Nazareth near the Catholic Basilica of the Church of the Annunciation.

Nov. 29

Nov. 30

PARIS — This city's most important Jewish institution normally focuses on education and kosher certification.

This month's elections for the assembly of the Consistoire de Paris, however, were dominated by another issue – community security, following a resurgence of anti-Semitic aggression this month around Paris and in the southern port city of Marseille.

The most recent incidents involved a Molotov cocktail attack against a synagogue in a Jewish neighbourhood of Paris and smashed windows at a Jewish school in the Paris suburb of Epinay-sur-Seine.

Just days before, vandals burned down part of a Jewish nursery school in Marseille, leaving anti-Semitic slogans painted on the walls of the main building.

The aggression shattered the relative calm that had prevailed since the Sept. 11 terror attacks in the United States, reawakening French Jews to a problem that dominated Jewish political culture in France after the start of the Palestinian intifadah in September 2000.

Interviewed a week before the elections, three of the leading candidates for Consistoire president – a position that the assembly members will elect soon – outlined their views on ensuring the security of the city's Jewish community.

While they differed on specific plans, the candidates agreed that the French government must take a more active role in protecting Jewish citizens.

"We have the impression that the government is not sufficiently conscious of the threats presented to the national community, Jews included," Consistoire President Moise Cohen said, recounting how he had tried to draw President Jacques Chirac's attention to the problem.

Yet challenger Jack-Yves Bohbot, a city councillor and vice-president of the Nazareth synagogue, suggested that the community's lobbying efforts with the French government have been insufficient.

"The voice of the Consistoire in this matter is not strong enough," he alleged.

Similar reproaches have been directed over the past year at CRIF, an umbrella organization bringing together Jewish institutions across France.

Following an explosion of anti-Semitic violence in October 2000, Henri Hajdenberg, the former CRIF president, came under criticism for downplaying arson and other attacks on Jewish sites as the consequence of "groups in the suburbs who try to spread what is happening in the Near East to France."

His perspective mirrored that of Interior Minister Daniel Vaillant, who at the time viewed the violence as juvenile delinquency, diminishing its ethno-religious motivations.

Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, sharply disagreed, arguing that the attacks were "more than just heat-of-the-moment crimes" and could have "a devastating impact on entire communities" if not dealt with properly.

Foxman's views now appear more persuasive to many in the Jewish community. The Consistoire's new emphasis on reassuring Parisian Jews reflects the increasing number of constituents who talk of leaving the city.

In the 19th district, the heart of the Sephardi community, worsening relations between Jews and Muslims can be detected in the increasing number of residents who refer to the area as mal frequent, a French expression for unsafe.

But if there is general agreement about the need to act, concrete plans are few. Calls for government intervention remain vague, but the implication is that authorities should beef up police patrols around Jewish sites and redouble efforts to apprehend and prosecute the perpetrators of hate crimes.

As this spring's French presidential election nears, such calls are becoming louder. On Nov. 12, the mainstream French daily Liberation ran an op-ed piece on the situation by Marc Knobel, vice president of the anti-racist organization LICRA and a researcher at the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Paris.

Knobel points to new research revealing how media images of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict motivate some Arab youths to commit anti-Semitic acts. Yet the ethnic hatred behind such acts is no less real, he says, and no less dangerous.

With no end to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in sight, Knobel implores the French government to take action before a larger and possibly deadly flare-up occurs.

A week before, Liberation had reported that the UEJF, France's largest student organization, had joined the campaign to spotlight anti-Semitic violence. With a book in the works that will catalog anti-Semitic incidents since October 2000, the UEJF has declared its intention to thrust the issue into the presidential debates.

At the same time, the students hope to develop a dialogue between Jews and Muslims in France, possibly preventing anti-Semitic acts from occurring.

There will be no issue of The CJN on Dec. 27

Speaking the truth about terrorism

The controversy over the use of the term "terrorism" continues. "I think you have to tell people what it is," said the Toronto Sun's Lorrie Goldstein on CBC Radio's This Morning (Nov. 20) about the need to speak the plain truth in defining terrorism. "If anybody has tried to muddy the waters about terrorism," Goldstein noted, "it has been Canadian, American and British officials who are making this distinction between the kind of terrorism that struck America and the kind in the Middle East."

According to Reports

But it is not just politicians who try to make this distinction. Many senior journalists are also guilty. Out of some misguided notion of neutrality, executives at Reuters and the BBC now refuse to apply the term even to the atrocities of Sept. 11.

Last month, Mark Damazer, BBC deputy director of news, stated that the BBC would lose its reputation for impartiality if it were to use such a "subjective" term (The Guardian, Nov.15). Damazer was also reported to have said that if the word "terrorism" was used in reference to Sept. 11, there would be implications for "the more subjective" acts of terror such as those carried out by Hamas or by Basque separatists.

One of these implications was expressed more bluntly by Reuters global news head Stephen Jukes. He admitted that "we don't want to jeopardize the safety of our staff. Our people are on the front lines in Gaza, the West Bank and Afghanistan. The minute we seem to be siding with one side or another, they're in danger." What Jukes acknowledged was fear – fear of intimidation and fear of retribution for calling terrorism what it is: terrorism.

When a zealot kills a doctor who performs abortions because he believes this will "save innocent lives," we do not relativize the crime by refusing to call him what he is – a murderer. A journalist who sympathizes with Hamas as "freedom fighters" and refuses to call the bombing of a pizzeria a terrorist act is in the same category.

A National Post editorial (Nov. 24) titled When is a terrorist not a terrorist? pointed out that the Organization of the Islamic Conference refused to endorse a UN General Assembly resolution against terrorism. This signalled that it did not "accept the notion that the slaughter of innocents is an unacceptable means of applying political pressure on Israel… If almost a third of the UN membership does not believe that blowing up a queue of young Russian immigrants waiting to enter a Tel Aviv disco is 'terrorism,' then what point is there of staging a conference and debating the fine points of resolutions?"

U.S. launches round two in peace process

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

With U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell having set out his vision for a Middle East settlement, the Bush administration has launched its second concerted drive in five months to defuse the intifadah and restart the moribund peace process.

Mideast Analysis

On Nov. 26, a week after Powell delivered his most wide-ranging speech on Israel's conflict with the Palestinians, a team of American envoys, led by Anthony Zinni and William Burns, arrived in Tel Aviv for negotations with Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA). Their arrival coincided with an upsurge of violence and renewed pledges by both sides to work for peace.

Washington's goal is nothing less than the achievement of an enduring ceasefire so that Israel and the Palestinians can get down to the business of resuming peace negotiations, which were broken off almost a year ago, before Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's election victory.

For now, the spotlight falls mainly on Zinni, a former general whose immediate predecessor failed to hammer out a lasting truce.

Last June, following a Tel Aviv suicide bombing that killed 21 civilians, George Tenet, the director of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, imposed a ceasefire. Violated within days by the Palestinians, it broke down in a hail of bullets.

After the Sept. 11 Arab terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., the United States sought to bring a measure of calm to the Middle East.

Eager to recruit Arab and Muslim states into a coalition against Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda terrorist network and its Taliban regime patron in Afghanistan, Washington exerted pressure on Israel and the Palestinians to staunch the bloodletting.

On Sept. 26, Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and PA President Yasser Arafat announced a ceasefire, the sixth in 12 months. But it, too, collapsed.

Then, spurred on by pressure from Arab allies like Saudi Arabia and Egypt to douse the fires of the intifadah, which has devastated the PA's economy, the Bush administration went into action.

Galvanized by British Prime Minister Tony Blair's advocacy of a "viable Palestinian state," U.S. President George Bush, in a Nov. 11 United Nations address, said: "We are working toward the day when two states – Israel and Palestine – live peacefully together within secure and recognized borders…"

With this speech, Bush broke new ground. It was a far cry from former president Ronald Reagan's 1982 proclamation that peace "cannot be achieved by the formation of a Palestinian state."

Subsequently, Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin called on Israel and the Palestinians to return to the negotiating table. At the UN, Peres came out unequivocal in favour of a Palestinian state.

Urging Israel and the Palestinians to " face up to some fundamental truths," Powell, in a Nov. 19 speech at the University of Louisville, outlined Washington's basic approach to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Powell's nuanced plan – which rests on a two-state solution – was, in general, greeted positively by Israel and the Palestinians.

In line with the Tenet plan, it calls on the PA to arrest, prosecute and punish terrorists and to halt incitement in the media. It also dismisses Arafat's demand for the "right of return." In this connection, Powell said that the Palestinians must recognize Israel's status as a "Jewish State."

On the flip side, Powell asked Israel to end its occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, stop building settlements there and accept a contiguous Palestinian state.

He noted that permanent-status issues, from Jerusalem to refugees, should be left for future talks.

If Zinni succeeds in imposing a workable ceasefire on the parties, the Mitchell process, with its emphasis on a cooling-off period and confidence-building measures leading to full-blown political talks, can be activated.

We are not there yet, but the long march toward a truce has begun.

Depression said to hit Jewish men, women equally

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although depression affects wice as many women as men in the general ommunity, it affects men and women equally n the Jewish community, says Dr. Lionel erber of the department of psychiatry at Sunybrook and Women's College Health ciences Centre.

"There are, however, few hard facts about he relationship between mood disorders and he Jewish community," he says.

Gerber spoke at a recent symposium titled ou are Not Alone, sponsored by the Mood isorders Association of Ontario. The day-ng symposium featured 11 psychiatrists and ocial workers from Sunnybrook.

It came about after Karen Liberman, presdent of the association and a keynote speaker t the symposium, spoke to The CJN last year bout her battle and subsequent recovery from linical depression.

She received about 100 phone calls as a esult of the article, she said, and thought that ewish people could benefit from coming ogether and learning about mood disorders.

Symposium topics included understandng depression and manic depression; psychotherapy; depression and the family; and epression in adolescents, the elderly and olocaust survivors.

Gerber said that although many Jewish eople are under a lot of pressure from their amilies, such stress does not cause an illness, but rather, brings it out. Pressure is hard to ear if you have a mood disorder.

"The Jewish psyche affects people, but it s not the cause of depression."

There is a lot of pressure in the Jewish ommunity for a person to get married and emain married, and to achieve in one's career, Gerber said.

He spoke of one man who kept getting ill because he would not take his depression medication regularly.

"It was not easy to do what was expected of him when he was depressed, so he felt like a failure for not achieving what his peers [achieved]. He also felt like a failure for having to take meds. It was a no-win situation.

"On the one hand, the Toronto Jewish community is involved with helping people, but on the other hand it is intolerant of people who do not continue with their career, their education or their marriage. It is a double-edged sword," said Gerber.

Dr. Anthony Levitt, a psychopharmacologist and acting chief of psychiatry at Sunnybrook, said he sees the devastation that a mood disorder can cause, "but I also see a lot of people who get better."

Although precisely what causes a mood disorder is unknown, Levitt said, mood disorders are accompanied by a disturbance in the central nervous system.

"A conductor in the central part of the brain is absent or not competent and this causes a disorganization of the brain function. The things that the brain co-ordinates are no longer co-ordinated. There are medications that can calm this brain cacophony."

Depression is an illness, he said, like asthma, diabetes or hypertension, but while five percent of the population have asthma, and five percent have diabetes, 26 percent suffer from depression.

"By 2010, depression will be the number one health problem in the world," he said.

Among the "constellation" of symptoms surrounding depression are low mood, low energy, loss of self-esteem, loss of concentration, impaired memory, sleep disturbance – either too much or too little sleep – and difficulty making decisions.

"It is a recurrent illness and it can be debilitating," Levitt said. "One out of four people in Ontario will experience depression in their lifetime, but the good news is that it is treatable. People can improve the quality of their lives."

Out of 100 people who suffer from depression, only half recognize that they have the illness, he said. "Out of the 50 who do recognize they are ill, only 25 will go to a doctor and only 12 will get appropriate treatment [such as psychotherapy or medication].

"We are talking about 12 out of 100 people getting properly treated. Nine-five percent of those 12 people, though, will eventually feel better. If others would come in, there would be a tremendous benefit to themselves and to society."

It is important not to give up on a treatment if it does not immediately work, Levitt said.

"Drugs are uniquely different and sometimes it takes many tries to get an adequate response, but my message is that there is treatment and there is hope."

A shallow look at Canadian Chassidim

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Though decimated by the Holocaust, the Chassidim have made a remarkable comeback.

In Canada, for instance, the tightly-knit Chassidic community is thriving, growing by leaps and bounds.

Keepers of the Faith: Canadian Chassidim, a Vision TV documentary scheduled to be broadcast on Wednesday, Dec. 10 at 9 p.m. and 11 p.m., delves into their pious, somewhat cloistered lifestyle.

Ian McLaren's sympathetic one-hour film is filtered through the prism of four members of the community.

• Saulie Zajdel, a Montreal city councillor, is reportedly the only Chassidic politician in all of North America.

• Nechama Kantor, a Montrealer, and her husband, Joseph, a Chassidic rabbi, run an outreach program in Bangkok, Thailand.

• Levy Teitelbaum, a Vancouver resident, is a kosher food inspector.

• Benny Kaplan, born and bred in Montreal, collects food for poor Jews.

Keepers of the Faith also offers a condensed history of the Chassidic movement. It is brief and superficial, nothing more than a fleeting addendum. The portraits, however, are quite interesting.

Zajdel, the father of five children, has been in politics for 15 years. Although many of his constituents are Jewish, he claims he is not there "just for the Jews."

Indeed, Zajdel shows up at a mosque, in the company of the mayor of Montreal, serving the needs of Muslim Montrealers.

Of Canada's 17,000 Chassidim, 11,000 live in Montreal, the hub of Canadian Chassidism. Compared to other minorities, they have one of the highest birth rates in the country.

Nechama Kantor

Catering to this growth, Zajdel is seen at city hall, pleading for the expansion of a Belz synagogue.

The camera also follows Zajdel and his family to New York City, where they visit a Jewish gift shop and the grave of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the pre-eminent figure in modern Chassidism.

As Keepers of the Faith ends, Zajdel joins a joyous Simchat Torah celebration.

Kantor – a vivacious woman in her mid to late 20s – and her husband cater mainly to Israeli backpackers passing through Bangkok.

As we learn, the Kantors are among some 4,000 Chassidic men and women who have been posted to more than 100 countries.

Although she is committed to their work, she does not appear to be happy in Bangkok. "It would have been easier" in Canada or the United States rather than the hot and crowded Asian city, she concedes.

There are few amenities for Orthodox Jewish life in Thailand, and the heat and the smells are less than appealing.

As Nechama walks through a pungent outdoor market, she holds her nose, a gesture Thais would surely not appreciate. Her husband acknowledges, with more than a bit of understatement, that they have not "steeped" themselves in Thai culture.

The Kantors seem out of place in Thailand, but the impression is misleading. With gusto, they throw themselves into building a sukkah whose roof is fashioned of palm branches. As we bid the Kantors adieu, she says, "I wouldn't change Thailand for anything." Is she just posing for the camera?

The film's least developed segments deal with Teitelbaum and Kaplan.

Teitelbaum discusses the laws of kashrut, inspects a food plant whose gentile owner wants to expand into the kosher sector, inspects a fish market and a trailer truck, visits a botanical garden with his family and eats a meal in a restaurant.

Kaplan, bearded and bewhiskered, is a feisty, energetic, aggressive person who charges into wholesale food terminals, haggles facetiously with vendors and squeezes their cheeks, picks out produce in a hurry and lugs boxes of fruit to his car, all in the service of the less fortunate.

Judging by the Kaplan segment, Keepers of the Faith offers a glimpse of the Chassidic community, but really nothing more than that. The documentary is skin deep.

Popular kids' entertainers release Chanukah CD

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Instead of jumping on the annual Christmas bandwagon, Juno Award winning children's entertainers Judy and David are staying true to their Jewish roots.

On the weekend of Dec. 15 and 16, the husband-and-wife singing team, will be performing five afternoon concerts called Judy and David's Chanukah Party at the Leah Posluns Theatre to coincide with the release of their first Jewish-themed album, Rock N' Roll Matzah Ball.

"Other Jewish entertainers have done holiday concerts, which we had thought about doing, but we could not get comfortable with the idea of singing Christmas songs," says David Gershon, one half of the singing duo.

"We are Jewish and we felt it is OK to do our special concert series for our Jewish fans. We have been involved in the Jewish community as role models for kids. We felt that it would be a bit of a betrayal to them to then turn around and do a Christmas show."

Although Judy and David are no strangers to performing in synagogues – they lead services in song at Holy Blossom on a weekly basis when not on tour – these are their first highly promoted gala Chanukah concerts.

Joining Judy and David for the Chanukah concerts will be the children's choir from CharActors Theatre Troupe – a group of 25 amateur and professional singers under the direction of Shari Quellenberg, who have sung previously at Judy and David's secular concerts.

"It is not going to be a concert liturgical in nature. It will be fun and a little wacky," Gershon says.

"There might be elements for some people that have a spiritual side to them, but by and large, it is a concert that is a party. I know some of our fans, who are not Jewish are coming to check it out to learn about Chanukah."

Their Jewish friends and fans have long urged Judy and David to come out with a Jewish album, but a lack of time and funds prevented it.

When they decided to do the Chanukah concerts, they figured if they were ever going to do a Jewish album, it had to be now. So, after completing three albums this year alone – Songs from the Boom Box, Red's in the Hood and Beanstock (which included a guest appearance by Canadian recording artist Jann Arden) – they found time to record Rock N' Roll Matzah Ball, their 12th album.

It's an enhanced CD with a video, games and colouring sheets that can be played on computer and will be available by the middle of Chanukah, just in time for the Judy and David Chanukah Party concerts.

The eclectic album will include songs for Chanukah, Passover and Shabbat, as well as a number of joyous songs with a Jewish flavour and a few stirring ballads, one of which includes the vocal stylings of 10-year-old Tajja Isen.

In addition, Judy and David have added Jewish themes to, or have created Hebrew versions of, some of their past hits, including All Together Now and Standin' Up.

The new album's title song, Rock N' Roll Matzah Ball, is one of Gershon's that appeared on Judy and David's first album, Jump Up and Down.

"Rock N' Roll Matzah Ball is a silly nonsensical song," Gershon says "It just struck me that a matzah ball is like rock 'n' roll, especially the way my mom used to make them – they were nice and hard and they rolled.

"It was one of the only songs we've released that had a hint of Jewishness to it, yet we would travel places like Labrador, where I don't think there are Jewish people, and that would be one of their favourite songs. It ended up on our television series," he says, referring to Judy and David's Boom Box, which runs on YTV weekdays at 1 p.m.

As always, the duo will encourage their fans to sing along at their Chanukah concerts.

"What has been the mark of our career in the secular world and our style in the Jewish world is interactive, participatory and engaging music. We firmly believe music is not a spectator sport, especially for children," Gershon says.

Performances of Judy and David's Chanukah Party are on Dec. 15 at 1:30 and 4 p.m. and on Dec. 16 at 10:30 a.m., and 1:30 and 4 p.m. at the Leah Posluns Theatre at the Bathurst JCC, 4588 Bathurst Street. Tickets cost from $14 to $24 and are available through TicketMaster at 416-870-8000.

Heritage: Civilization and the Jews now available on video and DVD

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

After more than 20 years, the landmark PBS television series, Heritage: Civilization and the Jews, hosted by former Israeli foreign minister Abba Eban, has finally arrived on video.

This comprehensive history of the Jewish people was originally telecast as a nine-part miniseries and covers Jewish existence from biblical times to the modern era.

The series is a sweeping historical journey that follows the Jewish people from the time of Abraham through the Exodus and the glory times of David and Solomon to the destruction of the First and Second Temples. It then accompanies the Jews into exile, into the Golden Age in Spain, through the farthest reaches of Eastern Europe and the death camps of the Holocaust; and to the creation of the State of Israel.

The series is available on both VHS and DVD, with the DVD release including a bonus CD-ROM that contains historical documents, maps and explanatory essays and a fully searchable index, all from the Encyclopaedia Judaica.

The series was highly praised when it was first broadcast and won a number of prizes, including the coveted Peabody Award.

On VHS, it comes in a five-cassette boxed set. On DVD, it comes in a three-disc boxed set

Abba Eban himself has said the Heritage: Civilization and the Jews project: "is a matter of profound importance... audiences in the U.S. and around the world, both Jews and non-Jews, can now experience, through television and new technologies, the long, continuous, sombre, sometimes tragic, yet noble story of the Jewish journey across the theatre of history."

This series is available now in video stores or from Morningstar Entertainment Inc. in Toronto.

Rivka Golani: talented musician, artist, performer

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Rivka Golani first started playing viola, finding pieces to play was one of her biggest challenges.

Making it a personal quest to increase the repertoire of music for the viola, Golani has had over 200 contemporary works commissioned for her, including over 40 concertos.

The most recent compositions couple her instrument with the double bass, cello, clarinet and percussion.

"Initially, it was possible to play violin and cello pieces on viola," she said. "But I would only do it when the music sounded at least as good, if not better."

By now, she said, there is plenty of music available, much of it very beautiful.

In Toronto recently as part of a Canadian tour, the performer has been credited for giving the viola a voice as a solo instrument.

"When I began, the viola was considered a sombre instrument used mainly in chamber music," she said.

"I had a completely different view. I found that the viola could have a voice of its own and almost anything could be done with it."

Golani said she finds it humorous that she is often assumed to be either a man or a large woman because the viola is larger than the violin.

Musicians learn to make their instruments a part of their body, she said. "Viola has more to do with flexibility and approach to the instrument than with size."

Born in Tel Aviv, Golani started studying the violin when she was seven. She went on to become a violist with the Israel Philharmonic and then one of only a handful of world-renowned violists.

It was only in her fourth year at the music academy at Tel Aviv University that she switched to viola.

At that time, Golani was also considering a career in mathematics and visual arts and decided to give the viola one year before making a final decision. As it turned out, she never looked back.

"There was a tendency for some people to switch to viola because they couldn't make it on violin.

"I don't believe that if someone isn't talented on one instrument they will suddenly become talented on another," she said. "I believe that certain instruments suit different personalities and [when I began] I felt very strongly that the viola was appropriate for me."

While she dropped the study of math, visual art remained a part of Golani's life. Her abstract paintings hint at her personality as a performer – wild expressionism dominates her work.

Ironically, Golani has found that her artwork is continuously stolen even though she considers painting as only a hobby.

"I'm probably the most stolen non-painter around," she said.

As a violist, Golani travels around the world performing and recording. And while she has been living mainly in England for the past 14 years, she hardly considers herself English.

"The Queen isn't waiting for me and I'm not waiting for her," Golani quipped.

Wherever she goes the artist considers herself a Canadian/Israeli.

"I fell in love with Canada," she said, "when I first came to North American as part of the Israel Youth Orchestra." In 1974 she moved to Toronto and lived in the city until she moved to England.

"The Canadian world fascinates me," Golani said.

"There is a sense of space and fantastic natural beauty, as well as a feel of a new developing place which is extremely inspiring."

Because of her tendency to perform Canadian composers, such as Milton Barnes and Srul Irving Glick, Golani feels that many view her as the queen of contemporary music. However, she feels that in many ways she's never stopped working on all periods.

Her most recent recording is of Bach's Solo Suites, originally written for unaccompanied cello.

"It's important to discover the maximum with the viola in every context," she said.

In that regard, Golani said, it's important for her to appear in large places as well as small venues.

With a musical legacy she can be proud of, Golani noted that great artists aren't only made in New York.

"I don't believe in the notion of stardom," she said.

"I've always believed that wherever there are communities of people that are interested in music, it's our duty to go and perform."

Business Profile

Film office head keeps Toronto in pictures

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Toronto, to paraphrase Mayor Mel Lastman, is Hollywood North.

In terms of film and television productions, Toronto ranks third in North America behind Los Angeles and New York.

Toronto's success is due to several factors: tax incentives, the cheap Canadian dollar, an abundant supply of accomplished actors and skilled technicians and its generic American appearance.

Last year, American and Canadian production companies spent a whopping $1.3 billion in Toronto for 7,532 shooting days – churning out 33 feature films, 62 television movies, seven TV mini-series, 86 television specials, as well as 50 TV series, 109 music videos and 451 TV commercials.

It was enough to keep 28,000 Torontonians working regularly.

The Toronto Film and Television Office, headed by film commissioner Rhonda Silverstone since 1997, co-ordinates the activities of visiting production companies.

It issues location filming permits – 3,799 last year – and ensures that city bylaws are respected. It also promotes Toronto as a venue.

Movies like X-Men and Century Hotel, and TV mini series like Haven and Nero Wolfe, have been filmed here, while actors ranging from Burt Reynolds and William Macy to Sophia Loren and Jennifer Lopez have passed through.

Most recently, Jeremy Irons was here to make Against the Current, a cable television movie. Last week, Richard Gere, Catherine Zeta-Jones and Renee Zellweger arrived to shoot Chicago, a feature film.

Silverstone, a 48-year-old graduate of Sheridan College and the University of Toronto, manages a staff of eight who ensure that everything runs smoothly.

"Americans like working in Toronto," said Silverstone, a petite woman with a lustrous mane of brunette hair who might herself be mistaken for a seasoned actress.

"We have the right northeastern American city look, a similar culture and language, very experienced crews and actors and all the suppliers. We can also shoot 35 to 40 productions at the same time."

Toronto will also go to great lengths to accommodate the wishes of a director or producer.

For Driven, starring Sylvester Stallone and Gina Gershon, University Avenue was closed so that racing cars could career up and down that thoroughfare.

For Resident Evil, with Milla Jovovich, Adelaide Street's overhead wires were removed to facilitate a spectacular vehicle pileup.

Rhonda Silverstone and Sly Stallone [Alan Markfield photo]

Film companies, however, do not have free rein.

They must notify affected residents, occupants and businesses in advance as to the duration and location of filming.

In addition, they must provide information about planned special effects, road and lane closures and sidewalk usage.

Once production in a residential area is in full swing, there are rules and regulations to be followed.

Lighting should be oriented away from homes. Legislation governing noise levels must be honoured.

Equipment and vehicles should be at least 30 metres away from a subway entrance or bus and streetcar stop and must never block fire hydrants or be parked along fire routes.

When Silverstone is not attending to such details, she is usually rushing off to trade shows in Los Angeles, New York, Banff and Ottawa, promoting Toronto's virtues as Canada's largest film and television production centre.

"It's never boring, and there's always something challenging," she said.

One of the perks of her job is meeting the stars. "I don't really have in-depth conversations with them, but my kids are thrilled to meet them."

When Jackie Chan was here recently for The Tuxedo, she introduced him to her 10-year-old son, Judd.

Silverstone and her husband, business executive Nathan Rapoport, have two other boys: Jesse, 14, and Jason, 7.

She was born in Toronto to Alexander (George) – a real estate agent – and Helen Silverstone and studied at Bathurst Heights High School.

Silverstone lived in Israel on Kibbutz Beit Hashita for almost a year, from August 1973 to May 1974, working in its olive and pickle factory. She was in Israel during the Yom Kippur War.

After a stint at Sheridan College's School of Design, she studied an eclectic array of liberal arts subjects at the University of Toronto. With a BA in hand, she was hired by the Toronto International Film Festival.

Revenues have risen 8% per year

In 1981, two years after its establishment, she became an administrative assistant at the Toronto Film and Television Office on the ground floor of city hall.

Silverstone is not quite sure how Toronto interacted with film companies before 1979.

"People just showed up, filming at all hours of the day and night," she speculated. "So there was a need for this office."

The number of film productions shot in Toronto has grown exponentially, from 79 in 1991 to 238 – excluding music videos and TV commercials – in 2000.

On average, revenues have risen 8 percent a year. But now the future suddenly looks somewhat uncertain after Sept. 11.

"This year, we're OK," she said, "but it'll be interesting to see what happens in 2002. Will the Americans get on planes and come here?"

There are other potential clouds on the horizon, Silverstone said.

The federal government is thinking of possibly phasing out a tax shelter that enables film investors to defer paying taxes for 10 years. If enacted, this would definitely be a blow to the industry.

And, of late, Washington has launched a campaign to keep would-be "runaway" film and television productions in the United States.

Silverstone does not seem unduly worried by this latest development.

"I've been told that we'll get a piece of the pie," she said. "But it'll be smaller."

Jews and Muslims reconcile – and tell jokes along the way

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A Toronto actor and stand-up comic who arranged two evenings of Jewish and Muslim comedy at Clinton's nightclub says the show was so successful that he has received several offers to bring it to New York.

By day a freelance television actor, Noam Rosen, 27, has received a flood of e-mails from "all sorts of peace organizations and interfaith dialogues" and others in the United States after an article about the comedy night appeared in the New York Times.

Billed as the Mideast Optimist Jewish Muslim Comedy Night, the show featured Jewish and Muslim comics who poked fun at sacrosanct political issues and religious stereotypes. Although few of the comics ventured to discuss Sept. 11 directly, Osama bin Laden and other Muslim fundamentalists were the targets of some punchlines.

"It was a full house and people loved it," said Rosen. "It was a good crowd – lots of Muslims, lots of Christians, lots of Jews, even an Israeli or two. And people got most of the humour. It was brilliant."

Toronto comic Rasul Somji, 22, a former observant Muslim born in Tanzania, made a joke about Osama bin Laden, saying he had a tall skinny, bearded uncle he was ready to turn over to authorities for the reward. He also said that his Christian girlfriend gave him a presents last Christmas – "and being Muslim, I gave her a hostage."

Initially skeptical about the show, Somji now agrees that such borderline humour can be remarkably therapeutic. "Ever since that [the first] show, I think we should do more of it. Noam has a point here – comedy can be a cure. Now I see there's a great deal of truth to what he was talking about."

Toronto comic Alex Nussbaum, 29, said that even the bitter enmity of Israelis and Palestinians can be mined as a source of humour. "Skirmishes come and go but deep religious hatred is forever," he observed. The object, he said, is to get people to laugh at themselves and to lighten up about a tense situation as a means of healing.

Rosen used the comedy night to publicize a new Web site, www.mideastoptimist.com, which provides links to articles about the Middle East that have a positive outlook. Although he studied to be an immunologist, he calls himself an expert on Middle East politics and diplomacy, and asserts that the mainstream media thrive on presenting biased and negative accounts of the Middle East conflict.

Worst possible slant on the Middle East situation

Earlier this month, Rosen responded to an Internet appeal from the British Broadcasting Corporation for suitable questions for an interview with Jordan's King Abdullah, and was chosen to ask his questions directly to the King on air. Rosen watches the BBC's World Report nightly and said the network delights in putting the worst possible slant on the Middle East situation.

"When the BBC gets good news about the Middle East, they bury it. And when there's bad news, it's like a good football game to them. They're so happy, they drool. They should be ashamed of themselves."

Rosen said he and his stand-up troupe are eager to perform in the United States and may soon have an engagement in New York. "I think New Yorkers really need a laugh," he said. "They've had a hard time."

CHAT girls undefeated; win school championship

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's too early to be calling them a dynasty, but what a year it was for the CHAT Cougars, the girls basketball team that represents the Richmond Hill school in the York Region Athletic Association (YRAA).

In their first year in the league, the Cougars slam-dunked the opposition and registered a perfect 14-0 record en route to the league championship. The Cougars dominated the YRAA, which consists of both private and public schools, and played better in the playoffs than the scores in their two games would indicate, said coach Paul Simmons.

Playing on their opposition's home court in the championship match, CHAT withstood a late surge and defeated Sacred Heart 42-38.

The Cougars were never behind in the game and though Sacred Heart gave them a scare narrowing CHAT's 15-point, third quarter lead – the Cougars held on for the victory.

In the semi-final game on home court, the Cougars eked out a three-point win over Toronto Waldorf.

Sometimes a narrow victory over a team you should dominate can serve as a wake-up call, and that's what happened to the Cougars after their semi-final win, Simmons said.

The narrow margin of victory set the stage for the title match, toughening the girls mentally and showing them they have to play hard from beginning to end, he said.

The groundwork for the Cougars' dream season can be traced back even earlier to a series of exhibitions the Grade 9 girls played last year in the YRAA, Simmons said. New to the league and younger than their opponents, the Cougars squeaked out a single win and got "pounded" in all their other games. Nevertheless, the experience proved valuable, Simmons said.

With a new crop of Grade 9s joining the (now) Grade 10 girls, the Cougars began implementing the strategy he and assistant coach Steve Drooker developed, Simmons said. Team play, a strong passing attack and good choices in shot-making were stressed, as was an emphasis on defence.

"This enabled me to put together a team capable of executing more complex defensive zones and attacking patterns." Their trapping 2-3 defensive zone could be expanded into a 1-2-1-1 full court press and then collapse again into a 2-3 zone, he explained.

As the season progressed, the team began developing the cohesion they would need in the playoffs.

Although Simmons stressed teamwork, much of the team's offense was generated by centre Laura Henrich, a Grade 10 dynamo who was Cougars' top star. "She's the fastest [girl] I've had the pleasure of coaching," Simmons said. "She anticipates well, has great court vision and when push comes to shove, she can put the ball in the hole."

CHAT's success shocked a lot of teams in the league, and even Simmons admits to being a little surprised at how well they played and how quickly they improved.

Their victory was celebrated last week at a lunch hour rally, attended by many of the school's 351 students, in which the Cougars' championship pennant was unveiled.

The members of the CHAT Cougars are: Joanna Ticker, Henrich, Jessica Goldberg, Mira Goldberg, Jacklyn Glick, Tali Bogler, Rachel Wayne, Orly Burke, Rachel Freedman, Gilla Shapiro, Galia Amoils, Sheri Krell, Adina Savdie and Mariya Borshiver. Shera Goldberg is the team's manager.

Athletes inducted into Jewish hall of fame

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Eight athletes and sports personalities have been elected to the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

International inductees include:

• Tatiana Lysenko, a Ukrainian gymnast who won three Olympic medals at the 1992 games;

• Victor Zinger, who was goalkeeper on five consecutive Soviet Union world championship hockey teams, from 1965 through 1969; and

• Kenneth Gradon, who served for almost two decades as president of Maccabi Europe and of Maccabi Great Britain.

The Americans to be inducted are:

• Harry Lewis, a welterweight boxing champion from 1908 to 1913;

• Eugene Selznick, who in 1956 became the first American elected to the honorary All-World Volleyball Team. He was named an All-American every year from 1951 to 1964;

• Julia Jones Pugliese, national collegiate fencing champion and coach at New York University from 1931 to 1938;

• Allen Tolmich, a world-class hurdler, who broke a series of world and American records in the late 1930s; and

• Joseph Shane, known as "the father of tennis in Israel." He built the original tennis complex in Ramat Hasharon.

Since 1979, more than 300 athletes and sports personalities have been elected to the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame, whose museum is located on the campus of the Wingate Institute for Physical Education and Sport in Netanya, Israel.

Your taxes at work

Did you know your tax dollars are being used to poison the minds of a whole new generation of Palestinian children?

It's true. A recent study by the New York-based Centre for Monitoring the Impact of Peace (CMIP) shows that brand new textbooks used in Palestinian schools – funded with help from Canada – encourage children from the earliest school age to hate Jews, glorify martyrs and fight for the "liberation" of Palestine (i.e. all Israel). Israel itself is never even mentioned.

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

As reported by Southam (and The CJN) last week, the study found that in 58 new textbooks and two teachers' guides for grades 1, 2, 6, 7 and 11 published in the last two years by the Palestinian Authority (PA), Israel doesn't exist, and neither does the concept of peace. While the study concedes the PA has removed some anti-Semitic stereotypes from Egyptian and Jordanian books used in West Bank and Gaza schools, no positive or even neutral images of Jews and Israelis have been introduced.

(A similar report by CMIP a year ago on 360 textbooks used in Israeli schools found dozens of examples of sensitivity to Palestinian claims, and efforts to present Arab culture in a positive light. No book called for violence.)

The Palestinian texts, on the other hand, are replete with images of violence and hatred, and reinforce negative views of Israelis, even in subjects which have nothing to do with history and politics, the CMIP analysis shows. The PA's curriculum "does not teach the acceptance of Israel's existence, and instead of working to erase hateful stereotypes, it is instilling them into the next generation's consciousness," rues CMIP spokesperson Yohanan Manor. Consider:

• A Grade 1 science book shows a magnifying glass enlarging text which reads "Palestine is Arab."

• A Grade 2 language textbook asks children to describe a series of brightly coloured pictures in which Israelis uproot trees, expel Palestinians and destroy their houses.

• A Grade 7 book lists Christian and Muslim holy places in "Palestine," but no Jewish ones.

• The same book refers to "the attempt to Judaize Muslim religious places," such as the Western Wall and the Tomb of the Patriarchs.

In other books, Jewish immigration to Palestine since the 16th century is described as "infiltration," while Hebrew is referred to as a dialect rather than a language. Every map in every subject, from Grade 2 math to Grade 7 geography, marks the entire area of Israel, including the West Bank and Gaza, as Palestine, with no Israeli cities shown.

This toxic sludge is being consumed by young minds despite commitments made by the PA in the May, 1994 Cairo Agreement, in which both sides undertook to "ensure that their educational systems contribute to the peace between Israel and the Palestinian people."

The textbooks are used in 1,300 schools administered by the PA, and in 261 others run by the United Nations Relief & Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA).

Here's where your money comes in. The annual budget of the Middle East program at the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) is $10 million – money targeted for sanitation, vocational training, technical education and general "peacebuilding." Since 1993, Canada has contributed $165 million in direct aid to Palestinian development programs, including education. Ottawa has also committed millions to UNRWA.

This past May, Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley presented PA Chairman Yasser Arafat with $5 million, to be channeled through the World Bank, to shore up job creation, water systems, clinics – and schools. At the time, Canada gamely noted that children represent 50 percent of the population in the territories, and "have been suffering from extreme anxiety, nervous tension, physical ailments and behavioural problems."

Time to ask your member of Parliament how these books are supposed to help.

About Parenting

Rebecca Katz

Dear Rebecca,

For the winter holidays, we are travelling to France with our children, aged 2½ and six months. I am just now beginning to doubt our decision to travel abroad with them. I am concerned about being in a foreign place with young children and not packing appropriately for our travels.

Concerned parent

Dear Concerned parent,

Travelling with little ones can be a pleasurable experience if you are organized and patient. We took our children to Europe last winter break and I can give you a few tips we learned from our mistakes.

If you have not acquainted yourself with the cities you will be visiting doing so may alleviate your concern about being in a foreign place with the kids. Pick up a couple of travel guides on France, or read up about the places you will be visiting on the Internet.

The flight to France is a long one for a young child, but you can pass the time smoothly if you bring some activities, snacks, and treats. New activities and toys will likely hold your toddler's interest longer than ones he or she is familiar with from home. As well, don't forget your children's favourite stuffed animals and blankets.

If you are flying coach and have not requested that your family sit in spacious bulkhead seats, you should do so. Most airlines provide bassinets for infants, but they can only be used in those seats.

If you will be renting a car, you will want to pack or rent car seats for your children. For walking, umbrella strollers are the easiest to carry when travelling, but in many European cities the sidewalks are cobblestone, and it can be a difficult task to push a stroller with tiny wheels on that surface.

Do not forget to arrange for travel insurance, and, in case of emergency, find out where a children's hospital is located in the city you are visiting.

I recommend that you pack a large bottle of children's acetaminophen or whatever you use for fever, since your brand will likely not be carried in France. It would also be wise to travel with children's Benadryl in case they have an allergic reaction to something.

If your infant is on formula, it would be convenient to pack a brush to wash the bottles and enough supply of the milk to last your whole trip. You may want to call the manufacturer to find out if your formula is carried in the cities you are visiting.

GREETINGS 5762

A statement of identity, a call to the soul

The eve of Chanukah is a most fitting occasion for us to publish the results of the annual Israel Experience Photo Contest. And it is with great pleasure that we do so.

Now in its fourth year, the contest is well entrenched in the Israel experiences of our youth. The photos that appear in this supplement help shed some light on the myriad, life-changing moments experienced by our children during their visits to Israel.

But the photos are themselves a form of light, a bulwark of warmth and illumination against the chill and darkness of the encroaching winter. And like the candles of the chanukiyah, they are both a profound statement of identity and a call to the soul.

In one of those rare fusions of coincidence and irony, the photo on this page by Stephen Levy titled Sunrise to Life is the most perfect of all visual clarions.

Israel and Judaism, Israelis and Jews are under siege: a siege that resorts to and revives chilling images of classic, hateful, medieval anti-Semitism.

EDITORIAL

Jerusalem cannot be for the Jews, for there were no Jews in Jerusalem, Israel's enemies persistently say.

But the photos in this supplement are a rebuke to our enemies even as they are a summons to us all.

"Arise," Levy's photo tells us. "Arise to the new day. Arise to the infinite possibilities and the freedoms that come with each new day. Arise, as well, to the responsibilities that are the price we must pay for those freedoms."

Jews around the world will soon celebrate Chanukah, the holiday whose complicated, multi-edged lessons also include the sustaining, millennial belief that the few can triumph against the many.

Unshakable, that belief is part of the light that emanates from these photos and that we feel on this holiday.

We thank all the young travellers for going to Israel and for sharing those special life-changing moments with us. We thank God, too, for having brought us to this day. Chag samayach.

The winning photos and a number of honourable mentions appear throughout this supplement. The Israel Experience Photo Contest is co-sponsored by UIA Federations Canada, Canada Israel Experience, El Al Airlines, Roots Canada and The CJN.

After Durban: a profile of South African Jewry

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

This article first appeared in Ha'aretz in late September after the U.N. Conference Against Racism concluded in Durban.

Marlene Bethlehem, president of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, has three children. The eldest, Louise, 37, immigrated to Israel 16 years ago to get away from apartheid. The second daughter, Lael, 33, remained to fight apartheid; today she protects the nation's forests. The youngest, Keith, 32, planned on staying in South Africa before Bethlehem's brother Ronnie was kidnapped and murdered four years ago.

"He asked me, 'Do you want these murders to come still closer to you?'" Bethlehem says. "Within four months, he was set up in London, partly because his wife is English."

Bella Miller, a 76-year-old widow from Durban, also has children who have left the country.

"I have three children," she says. "When Howard, my eldest son, had his car stolen, he decided to leave the country. A year later he was settled in Washington. My second son, Ivan, who lived in Johannesburg, also had his car stolen, but he decided to remain and improve security arrangements. The youngest son, Michael, lives in Cape Town; he's still single and likes to enjoy himself."

Miller adds that a car belonging to one of her nephews was also stolen. Immediately after it happened, "he phoned his wife and told her to put the apartment up for sale," she says. "They immigrated to Israel, because their children have pretty good Hebrew."

When Miller speaks about cars being stolen, she is referring to the armed robbery of vehicles, one of the most prevalent forms of crime in South Africa. The spate of car theft has reached such alarming proportions that local police squads have set up special units to deal with the epidemic. Since special security devices are installed in cars, criminals have started robbing them directly from their owners, at gunpoint. Drivers in South Africa are at risk when they enter and leave their automobiles; cars idling at traffic lights and intersections are also targeted.

Car theft, however, isn't the only widespread form of crime in the country. With unemployment rates high, many young people resort to crime. Home security systems are conspicuous, particularly in wealthy areas. Many homeowners place warning signs at their entrances, yet many also enclose their homes with fences, walls and, sometimes, barbed wire.

Jewish communal institutions also use such heavy security measures. For instance, a preschool institution in the Johannesburg suburb of Glenhazel (an affluent area where many Jews live) is encircled by an electronic fence. A guard posted by the nursery school's entrance opens its bolted, steel door only after first receiving a go-ahead from the secretary's office inside, where electronic surveillance monitors are mounted.

Crime, however, isn't the only threat to the quality of life in South Africa. Many fear that the country's economic future is far from secure. Though during seven years of democratic rule the inflation rate has dropped from 18 percent to seven percent, the new government's privatization programs and other policies have aggravated unemployment levels, and stirred grave concerns about possible mass layoffs in the future. Fears about the economy's future have been exacerbated by the government's commitment to affirmative action policies to offset the legacy of apartheid discrimination.

Jewish emigration part of a general trend

South Africans are primarily worried about the instability of the local currency, the rand. Devaluation of the rand began during the apartheid period, when South Africa's economy was boycotted by the international community. Its value continues to sag today, due to a lack of foreign investment and also to so-called "regional influences," meaning the blatant lack of stability of neighbouring countries, especially Zimbabwe.

Recoiling from this inauspicious mix of rising crime rates and economic uncertainty, many South Africans have emigrated. Jewish community representatives quarrel about the causes of this flight. While Miller and Frank Schneider, another retired Jew from Durban, say that their children have left because of crime, Jonathan Russon, an accountant from Johannesburg, believes that most of his Jewish peers have left to "search for more stable salary levels and currencies." Yet whether the exodus is rooted in social, political or economic determinants, Jews are leaving to find a more secure future.

Other white South Africans leave generally for the same reasons. Jonathan Ribin, a Jewish musician from Johannesburg, notes that a community of 12,000 non-Jewish white immigrants from South Africa is taking root today in Perth, Australia. Jews tend not to have special reasons to leave, since anti-Semitism is rare in the country.

Recent signs of an anti-Semitic trend have been limited almost exclusively to Cape Town, on the southern tip of the country. A group of Muslim extremists, the Pajad, is responsible for Cape Town's exceptional status. Though the group originally devoted its efforts to causes such as the war against drugs, it has recently become more militant. There have also been anti-Semitic radio broadcasts in Cape Town in recent months, and while the international anti-racism conference was taking place in Durban, a Jewish doctor in Cape Town was assaulted and badly injured by a band of Muslim radicals.

Yet anti-Semitism in Cape Town remains limited to a string of isolated incidents, and there is no noticeable anti-Semitic trend in the country as a whole. Trends in the Johannesburg suburb of Glenhazel indicate that the country's Jewish community is not concerned about the possibility of an anti-Semitic upsurge. Numerous Glenhazel Jews wear kippot in public. The Jewish community there recently sponsored a fair in the local mall, selling gifts and special items in preparation for the High Holy Days and Sukkot. The fair, which featured performances of Chassidic songs and a shofar-blowing contest, was widely publicized by organizers unworried of a hostile backlash.

Jewish emigration from South Africa, then, is part of a general trend of white departure. Yet the Jews began to leave long before the collapse of the apartheid regime. In June of 1976, riots flared in the township of Soweto, outside of Johannesburg, and many saw that as a sign of troubled times ahead.

"Before apartheid collapsed, many people, like my eldest daughter, left because they couldn't accept the regime," Bethlehem says. "And in recent years, many, like my youngest child, have been leaving because they fear that the present government isn't able to preserve law and order."

Though it is difficult to identify the precise causes of the South African Jewish community's emigration, the bottom line can be seen in the numbers: in 25 years, a community of 120,000 people has dwindled to 80,000 (some say that the current number is even smaller).

Most of the emigrants are young people. Looking for a better future, young Jewish South Africans first depart from relatively small cities and towns across the country that have hosted modest Jewish communities throughout the past century. Jews who remain in South Africa are concentrated heavily in two communities, Johannesburg (60,000) and Cape Town (50,000). The smaller communities are shrinking.

Yet those who depart from these small communities do not always end up in Johannesburg or Cape Town. And many young Jews who leave the country for good have their parents' blessing.

"All over the world, parents usually want their children to remain close by, but we ourselves and other parents like us have persuaded our children to leave because they don't have a future here," Schneider says.

Young Jews who leave have parents' blessing

Many families are far-flung, with members settled in a bewildering array of locales around the globe. Bethlehem – with a daughter in Israel, a son in London and a daughter in Johannesburg – is a case in point. Her friend Gale Goldberg has a son in Toronto, a son in Los Angeles, a daughter in Australia and a daughter who lived in Israel before returning recently to South Africa.

For such parents, annual vacations become globetrotting affairs, a series of shuttle visits between children in different countries and continents. Even parents of lesser economic means scrape together the funds to finance such global excursions to see their children.

"Some women go out and work so that by the end of the year they're able to afford such trips," South Africa's Chief Rabbi Cyril Harris says.

Some elderly parents who require supervision and medical care have been adversely affected by this global scattering of South African Jews. It may be that some, or all, of their children live overseas. In some cases, children are unable to provide for their aging parents, so the burden falls upon the organized Jewish community. Meanwhile, Jewish communal organizations have their own economic worries – they are troubled by the devaluation of the rand, the cessation of government subsidies to private social welfare and educational institutions, and by the flight of many former donors, wealthy South African Jews who have left the country. Jewish social welfare and education institutions are saddled today with heavy debts; donors who remain in the country are besieged by ever-increasing demands.

Up to now, the organized Jewish community has met these challenges with great success. Jewish homes for seniors admit all members of the community, whatever their income level (this model applies to many Jewish communities around the globe; unfortunately it is not in effect in Israel). The Chabad movement, which has a strong presence in South Africa, operates a special housing complex for people of all ages who have been unable to purchase apartments on their own.

The Jewish community's relationship with the black community poses its own challenges. Like other whites, Jews have little social contact with blacks.

"While apartheid was repealed on a legal level, it remains in effect in social terms," explains Errol Goodman, a senior Jewish community leader. "Jews, like all other whites, shut themselves away in their own neighbourhoods. They are leaving state schools and transferring to private educational facilities, because when blacks entered the state school system, its level declined – that was natural, since in previous generations blacks received just a minimal amount of education."

David Ackerman, a 22-year-old Jewish student from Durban who is active in the Zionist Federation, does not miss the apartheid regime in any way. Yet like many of his older peers, he harbours some doubts about the new government.

"For my father, the change of power was a personal trauma," he recalls. "Not because he supported apartheid. He simply claimed, as somebody affiliated through work with Durban's Technicon, that lecturers ought to be hired by virtue of their abilities, and not because of skin color. Taking that position was enough – he was accused of racism. Students hit him; and in the end he had to leave his job, apparently to vacate it to a black instructor. Though he found work at a private institution, the episode was, for him, traumatic."

Asked whether he believes that his parents and their peers could have done more in the struggle against apartheid, Ackerman says: "They knew that the regime was awful, but they couldn't do anything about it, since it was a totalitarian government. They were a small minority, one which was frightened about an upsurge of anti-Semitism, akin to what characterized the regime here during the Nazi period. And you can't ignore the fact that Jews, like all the other whites, profited from apartheid. They had a very comfortable daily life."

When South Africa's chief rabbi, Cyril Harris, arrived from Britain, he delivered an apology in the Jewish community's name for its not having done enough to defeat apartheid. Ackerman's grandfather wrote an article criticizing him, claiming that the community could not have done more.

Today, the Jewish community sponsors a number of initiatives to assist the nation's black population. For instance, Rabbi Harris has been instrumental in establishing Tikkun, an organization that works for the benefit of black communities. Tikkun's activities include the establishment of a co-operative for growing organic vegetables, a support centre for youth at risk, a medical centre for pregnant women and special classroom instruction for children who have reading difficulties. The ORT education organization has also joined efforts on behalf of black South Africans, establishing a vocational training centre for blacks in Johannesburg.

But these are relatively isolated initiatives. In terms of attitude and social networks, the Jewish community as a whole remains detached from the black community, raising the question: how do South African Jews really view their place in the state? Do those who choose to remain do so simply because they have no alternative – due to a lack of economic resources or an inability to transfer their business abroad? Or do they genuinely see themselves and their children as being part of the "new South Africa," which is now governed by the black majority?

Jewish community leaders issue clear declarations in support of the latter, partly because Jewish leaders don't want to be suspected of disloyalty and partly because the community is composed of people who have decided to stay in South Africa and link their own personal future to the fate of the country.

During the annual meeting of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies last month, board leaders emphatically expressed their belief and commitment to the "new South Africa." SAJBD chairman Russel Gaddin declared: "Our community has so much to offer – so much experience and knowledge – which can be harnessed to build the new South Africa... As citizens of the country and as human beings, don't Jews bear an obligation to improve the lot of the state's vast majority?"

Striking a similar note, Bethlehem says: "I definitely view myself as a proud South African. I am particularly proud of the way in which the state's dramatic transformation, and the reconciliation which came following the political change, came about peacefully. I am definitely connected to the land, and the landscape."

The Jewish community played a part in that political change, which in turn brought about changes in attitude. Cape Town's Jewish Museum, which opened a few years ago, documents Jewish history in the country. Helen Friedman, an anti-apartheid activist who continues to help blacks today, says that whereas 10 years ago, no one, including members of the Jewish community, was interested in her activism, today she has received recognition for her efforts.

"I have in the past five years received a lot of love and backing, and most of the people who finance my support organization are Jewish," Friedman says.

SAJDP director-general Judah Kaye astutely analyzes the Jewish community's dilemma: "We got used to viewing South Africa as a western country, as a land which has a western culture. The challenge we face is to become accustomed to life in an African state."

There are many indications that the community is finding it hard to make this transition. The South African Jew lives in what Marvin Smith, former SAJDP president, calls "internal exile." His body, Smith explains, is in South Africa, but his soul is enclosed in western "bubbles" that he has contrived. Community members live in elegant, affluent, and heavily protected houses that are located in American-style suburbs, they work in fortress-like office buildings where international business deals are made, and they try to remain sealed off, protected from aspects of the African environment outside soaring levels of AIDS, unemployment, poverty and crime).

Religious profile of community has strengthened

Arguably, the trend of "returning to religion" which has taken root in the Jewish community, particularly in Johannesburg, reflects this impulse to cut loose from the local setting. The South African Jewish community has long been characterized by its unusually strong religious and Zionist commitments. A majority of its members, even those who travel to synagogue on Shabbat by automobile, define themselves as Orthodox. A large portion of the community's members attended Jewish day schools that stressed Hebrew lessons and the strengthening of bonds with Israel. Zionist youth movements have enjoyed extraordinarily strong membership rates. Though intermarriage rates, which traditionally have been very low, have risen somewhat today, they remain at 15 percent – as compared to the 50 percent intermarriage figure that looms in the United States and other western countries.

The dominant social, religious, ideological and educational trends were affected by apartheid and its legacy. As Rabbi Harris puts it, the trends are explained "by the generally isolated character of society in South Africa. Separation hasn't existed only between blacks and whites: the blacks themselves were separated along tribal lines. Muslims also keep to themselves."

Under seven years of black rule, the Jewish community's religious profile has strengthened. Institutions encouraging Jews to become Orthodox – Chabad, Or Samayach, Aish HaTorah – are flourishing in Johannesburg, recruiting hundreds of new members each year. Increasing numbers of people keep the laws of kashrut and Shabbat. Many agree with Ackerman, depicting the process as "a desire to clutch something that is well-known." Religious frameworks, he notes, "provide a sense of social security which offsets the general uncertainty and fears about the future."

Yet despite the strong Jewish and Zionist components in the community's identity, Israel is not the destination preferred by most who choose to leave. Most emigrants head for Australia, Canada and Britain; if a green card is available, they set off for the United States. Israel receives just 20 percent of those who leave.

A number of explanations are put forth to account for Israel's relatively low level of popularity among emigrants, who want English-language countries and are deterred by Hebrew. Devaluation of the rand means that a large villa in South Africa is sold for around $200,000, a price that fetches not much more than a modest apartment in many parts of Israel. It seems that the main factor spoiling Israel's appeal is what many refer to simply as "the good life." Goodman puts it this way: "The community here is very spoiled. We have a good, comfortable life. If people decide to leave, they don't want to go to a place where life is hard, like Israel."

Israel researchers move forward with stem cell research

By WENDY ELLIMAN

President George W. Bush deliberated for months over the complexities of providing federal funds for stem cell research. His ruling on Aug. 9 was a compromise: research on the 64 existing stem cell lines will be financed by the taxpayer, but no new lines may be created with government funds. His decision, he explained, had been made "with great care... because embryonic stem cell research holds great promise, but also the potential of great evil."

In Israel, where two research centres – the Hadassah Medical Organization and the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology – are among the 10 worldwide to hold existing embryonic stem cell lines, the U.S. ruling has had a major impact on future research.

What, then, is Israel's take on the ethical uncertainties that so deeply trouble the U.S. president?

The debate centres on the right to life of the human embryo: when its stem cells are removed, the embryo dies.

In 1998, stem cells – building blocks for all human tissue – were first successfully extracted from human embryos and maintained in the laboratory. Since then, 64 stem cell lines able to reproduce themselves infinitely in the laboratory have been extracted.

With laboratory material to work on, scientists worldwide have used different combinations of chemical growth factors to urge these embryonic stem cells to specialize. They have developed them into about half the human body's 220 different cell types, a first stage, they believe, in developing cures for disorders that include heart disease, stroke, diabetes, certain cancers, multiple sclerosis, muscular dystrophy, osteo-arthritis and Parkinson's and Lou Gehrig's diseases.

Impassioned opposition to stem cell research comes from pro-lifers, who believe that embryos possess souls. Because removing stem cells kills the embryo, stem cell harvesting is thus human experimentation and murder.

In Jewish belief, this is a non-issue, says Israel Prize laureate Prof. Michel Revel, a molecular geneticist at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot and chair of the bioethics advisory committee of Israel's National Academy of Sciences and Humanities. Judaism teaches that the soul enters the embryo at 40 days of age, he says. Embryos just a few days old, comprising some 150 cells and no bigger than a pinhead, "are not, therefore, considered human beings."

Gad Potashnik, professor of obstetrics and gynecology at the faculty of health sciences at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU), is very involved in the ethical considerations of stem cell research and he represented Israel at a bioethics symposium organized by the European community. Judaism defines an embryo as such only after it has existed for 14 days, he says, not from the moment of fertilization.

"In any case, the embryos used for research are surplus from in vitro fertilization [IVF]; they have been stored in fertility clinics and are too old to be viable," says nephrologist Dr. Karl Skorecki, director of the Rappaport Family Institute for Medical Research at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa. "In other words, they've never been in a uterus, which is a very important distinction."

Working within a Jewish ethical framework

"Clearly, the issue is extremely sensitive," says Skorecki's colleague, Dr. Joseph Itskovits. "We don't act in a vacuum, and we always obtain the proper consents."

This extremely sensitive issue is more than theoretical in Israel. Researchers at the Technion and the Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Centre in Jerusalem were among the first worldwide to isolate embryonic stem cells and maintain stem cell lines.

Itskovits and Skorecki led the Technion team that developed their lines into insulin-producing pancreatic cells with the potential to heal diabetics. And Itskovits and Prof. Smadar Cohen, of BGU's biotechnology engineering department and the Institute for Applied Biosciences, are using embryonic stem cells to produce human heart muscle cells to help heal scarring after a heart attack.

Dr. Benjamin Reubinoff, of Hadassah's obstetrics and gynecology department and the Goldyne Savad Institute of Gene Therapy, has produced nerve cells from Hadassah's six stem cell lines. These, he hopes, will one day cure neurological diseases such as Parkinson's, Alzheimer's and multiple sclerosis. Together with his research partners from Australia and Singapore, Reubinoff hailed Bush's decision.

"By virtue of our ability to supply our embryonic stem cell lines to researchers in the United States and other countries worldwide, we hope to support and participate in the promotion of futuristic research," Reubinoff says.

At BGU, Potashnik is collaborating with geneticist Prof. Rifka Carmi, dean of the university's faculty of health sciences, on a proposal for a study to create a stem cell line that would circumvent the ethical concerns of harming an embryo with the potential to become a human being.

They have been working on a procedure known as Preimplantation Genetic Diagnosis (PGD), a technique that enables scientists to take a single cell from a two-day-old embryo without affecting other cells. That one cell, however, can reveal if the embryo

Weizmann scientists develop DNA based computers

By TAMARA TRAUBMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Researchers from the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot and the Technion in Haifa have developed a computer so tiny that a trillion of them could fit into a laboratory test tube. The "computers" are biological molecules, using DNA for software and enzymes for hardware, and can solve a billion mathematical problems a second.

Such tiny devices could one day fit into cells and supervise biological processes, or even synthesize drugs. DNA strands exist in almost every body cell – they are biological software that tell each cell and molecule what to do.

"If you look at the mechanism of a cell, a lot of what goes on inside is computation. We don't need to teach the cell new tricks, we just need to put the existing tricks in the right order," says Prof. Ehud Shapiro of the Weizmann Institute, who headed the research.

Some scientists believe DNA-based computers could have an advantage over existing computers based on silicon chips. Artificial chips have reached their limits and can't get any smaller. But, say the scientists, tiny DNA strands can store huge amounts of information in minuscule space – one cubic centimeter of DNA can store more information than a trillion CDs.

Shapiro says the molecular computer is the first of its kind. Although computers with DNA input and output have been made before, they have always involved a laborious series of reactions, each requiring human supervision. "Previous biological computers were the same size as the room in which the supervisors and computer equipment worked," said Shapiro. "With the new method, all you need do to get an answer is put all the ingredients into a test tube, mix them together, and check to see what the output is."

For now biological computers only know how to answer simple questions with a "yes" or "no" response. A typical question would be: In the sequence AAB is there an equal number of As and Bs?

Nevertheless, several researchers worldwide have hailed the computers as an important new development. "They work better than anything I've seen so far," said Eric Baum, a computer scientist at the NEC Research Institute in Princeton, N.J. Although he questions whether biomolecular computers will ever become really useful, he believes they are a "step in the right direction."

Shapiro and a growing number of other scientists believe DNA-based computers may lead to a number of useful applications – they could be planted inside cells, where they would watch for irregularities or even synthesize drugs.

The computer simulates the cell's natural mechanisms with an accuracy level of 99.8 percent. Natural DNA processes also involve inaccuracies which are corrected by other genes, says Shapiro, and it is almost impossible to reach absolute accuracy using biological systems. However, for the uses for which the computers are designated, this level of accuracy is adequate.

So how does such a computer work? Let's say the computer wants to know whether the number of times a B DNA type appears in a DNA section is odd or even. The DNA section – the "input" – is inserted into a chemical solution along with enzymes to be used as the computer's "hardware." Other DNA sections are added, which act as "software."

A software section sticks to the input with the help of an enzyme. If the tip of the input is B, the input will be labeled as having an odd number of B sequences. Another enzyme then cuts the section and reveals the next sequence. Each time B appears, the label on the input changes from "even" to "odd" and back again. Once the computer has dissected the entire input, it can determine whether the sequence appeared an even or odd number of times according to the last label – the "output."

is affected with a certain genetic disease or not. For some genetic disorders, however, one cell is not sufficient and a cell line will greatly improve the diagnostic results.

Under a 1998 Israeli law, "research that is not intended to produce a human being or to clone one is legal," says Israel Health Ministry legal advisor Mira Hibener-Harel.

With the rush of progress since then, however, 10 Israeli experts in science, medicine, civil and Jewish law, philosophy and ethics spent eight months earlier this year drawing up more specific guidelines for the therapeutic use of embryonic stem cells in Israel. Their recommendations, accepted by Israel's National Academy of Sciences and Humanities in September, are now the basis for Health Ministry regulations for stem cell research in Israel.

Revel, who served on the team, summarizes its main recommendations. First, as in organ transplantation, where organs are removed from the donor by one medical team and transplanted into the recipient by another, so in stem cell research, the team removing ova or developing IVF embryos must be distinct from that working with stem cells. Second, no attempt may be made to fertilize ova from aborted female embryos. Third, viable embryos may not be used for research. And fourth, embryos may not be specifically created for scientific experimentation or therapy.

"While researchers today are ethical, we must guard against those in the future who may try to advance their careers or incomes by performing procedures that violate ethical rules," says Revel.

Potashnik is optimistic about the future of stem cell research in Israel. "I can tell you that the religious parties in Israel are open-minded and they are ready to put together efforts in order to find solutions. You know, for example, they will approve egg donation. And if you can overcome some of the requirements they put forward, I don't think that it is impossible to reach a consensus. Then we can go ahead and create these kinds of stem cells for the benefit of all mankind."

Ireland gets new chief rabbi

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

As the new chief rabbi of Ireland, Yaakov Pearlman has a grand title, but a much smaller community than the one he left in upstate New York.

Rochester, N.Y., where Rabbi Pearlman was spiritual leader of Light of Israel Congregation, has about 22,000 Jews. By contrast, he said, Ireland has between 1,300 and 1,400 Jews.

Before Rabbi Pearlman arrived in Dublin in mid-September, Ireland had been without a chief rabbi for nearly a year. His predecessor, Gavin Broder, left Dublin in October 2000 to become London chaplain of Hillel, the Jewish student organization.

The gap left the entire country without someone to lead the important rituals of communal life, Rabbi Broder said.

"The chief rabbi is effectively the only rabbi in Ireland," he said. "It makes the job specification a very big challenge. It's a 24-hour-a-day job."

"There is a tremendous amount of work that needs to be done in many areas," Rabbi Pearlman said. "Things have been neglected, and the community suffers. Things we take for granted in [the United States] are not taken for granted here."

It has been difficult, for example, to get kosher food, and conversions have been put on hold. Observant Jews have been importing frozen kosher meat from France.

England has not been allowed to export meat for most of this year due to an outbreak of foot and mouth disease.

And bringing meat in from far away is expensive, Rabbi Pearlman said.

The first kosher slaughter of animals in Ireland for more than a year occured recently when a shochet was brought in from England.

A slaughterhouse was made kosher for several days as the shochet slaughtered some 400 animals, some for use in Ireland and some for export to England.

At least three young couples with one non-Jewish partner have had marriages delayed because there has been no opportunity for conversion.

"They have been waiting until a chief rabbi arrived," Rabbi Pearlman said. "I have to monitor it, sanction what they are doing and recommend them for conversion. It's a long haul."

The numbers might not sound significant to North American ears, Rabbi Pearlman said, but "for a city like Dublin, two or three couples is quite a number."

While day-to-day matters such as kashrut and conversion are important in the Irish Jewish community, Rabbi Broder says assimilation is a much bigger problem.

Rabbi Pearlman has to "try to hold the community together," Rabbi Broder said. "The community is dwindling and has been for some time."

The two cities in England with large Jewish populations have drawn young people away from Ireland, Rabbi Pearlman said.

"We have two very strong communities in close proximity to ours," he said. "Usually, young couples get married and they move to London or Manchester."

In an attempt to reverse this trend, the Irish Jewish community has established a committee to try to attract Jews to Ireland, and lists Dublin's attractions for Jews on its Web site.

"Dublin is booming," Rabbi Pearlman said. "It's a good place to live and do business."

And, he said, "In Ireland, overt anti-Semitism is absolutely nonexistent."

Some Jews have arrived from South Africa, Rabbi Pearlman said. Rabbi Broder pointed out that there also is an Israeli community doing business in Ireland.

Rabbi Pearlman doesn't underestimate the difficulties facing Irish Jewry, but said he is optimistic. He took the job in Dublin, he said, because he was looking for a challenge.

A native of Manchester, England, he became the youngest rabbi in Britain when he was ordained at 20.

He then moved to the United States, where he earned a master's degree in Jewish history at Hofstra University in New York and a PhD in education from the University of California at San Diego.

After completing his doctorate, he first moved to Providence, R.I., where he held a pulpit for nine years and then to Rochester, where he spent 22 years, first at Beth Joseph and then at Light of Israel.

"That was a very fine position which I could well have stayed with" until retirement, Rabbi Pearlman said. "But I reached a point where I was looking for another challenge, and there comes a point in one's life where there is a drive to go back to one's roots."

He contacted the chief rabbi in London, Jonathan Sacks, to ask about openings in Britain.

Ireland hadn't occurred to him, he said, but he got a call from London asking if he would be interested in Dublin, and he decided to accept.

Being chief rabbi of Ireland means more than just ministering to the Jewish community, Rabbi Pearlman has found.

"There's almost a diplomatic profile, attending functions on behalf of the community," Rabbi Broder said.

Rabbi Pearlman agreed.

"Representation of Jews to the secular world is very important," he said. "It's a very high-profile position. People look up to the chief rabbi with tremendous respect."

Chanukah's heroes and heroines took on Hellenism

By SHARON KANON
Israel Press Service

Bravery and unflinching adherence to Torah laws characterized the Jewish heroes and heroines in the Chanukah story. Daring and defiant, they refused to give in to religious persecution and oppression and set in motion the rebellion and surprise victory of the Jewish patriots.

The villain in the tale, Antiochus Epiphanes (a Syrian Greek), heir to the rule of Alexander the Great, persecuted the Jews in an effort to thrust Hellenism on them. He changed the name of Jerusalem to Antioch, stole the gold altar and gold menorah from the Temple (169 BCE), desecrated the holy site with idol worship and the sacrifice of pigs, and prohibited circumcision and the observance of Shabbat.

Hellenistic culture was dazzling – material wealth, poetry, drama, sculpture, philosophy, sports and literature – and one can see why some Jewish residents of Judea fell victim to its lures, even participating naked (like the Greek athletes) in sports events. Some went as far as to "undo" their circumcision.

One of the first heroes to set an example of defiance against the Greeks was Elazar, a 90 year-old scribe, who refused to eat pork. "I shall not violate the sacred oaths of my ancestors who swore to observe the Torah, not even if you cut my eyes out and burn my insides… You shall not defile the sacred lips of my old age…" (The Book of Maccabees IV, written in the first century BCE in Greek.)

When it was suggested that he pretend to eat pork, to save his life, Elazar refused. "And so he died, leaving in his death a model of nobility and a memorial of virtue not only to the young but to the mass of his nation." (II Maccabees)

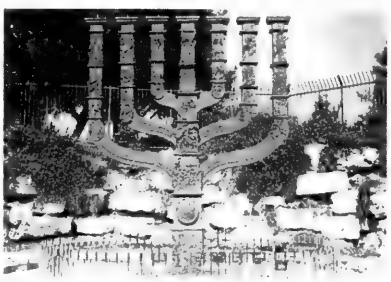
Mattathias, an aging Hebrew priest who had left Jerusalem with his five sons to live in Modi'in, was present when Greek soldiers came and demanded that the Jews sacrifice a pig to their pagan god. When a Jew stepped forward to make the sacrifice, he instinctively drew his sword and killed him. Mattathias and his sons fled to a nearby cave and readied themselves to fight the Greeks. They were determined to preserve the exclusive worship of Judaism and battle the Greeks both militarily and religiously.

The elderly Mattathias died within a year and never saw the success of the revolt he began. His son Judah, a brilliant military strategist, took over as leader. Not deterred by the heavily-armed enemy army of 20,000 to 80,000 men, he led his small army of 3,000. With cunning and prayer and under Judah's inspired leadership, the Jews were able to successfully confront the Greeks and eventually recapture the Temple.

"They come against us full of hubris and lawlessness, to destroy us, our wives and our children and to plunder us," said Judah. "But we are fighting for our lives and our laws. God himself will crush them…" (I Maccabees 3:16-22).

Later, when the Jewish guerrillas were pitted against the Greek army, another Elazar seized the moment. The younger brother of Judah the Maccabee crept under a Greek general's elephant and slew it with a spear.

Women were pivotal in the Chanukah story. Two Chanas stood out for their heroism. Torture did not break the will of Chana or her seven sons who refused to eat treif or bow down to Zeus. (The melodramatic narrative of multi-martyrdom is told in II Maccabees 7.)



Chana, the daughter of Mattathias, is given credit for inciting the actual rebellion. She stripped off her clothes in public after her wedding to shame her brothers and incite them to rebel against the Greek decree that a Jewish bride go directly to the local official for 'first night privileges.' "You are ashamed of my nakedness, but not ashamed to deliver me to the uncircumcised Greek official?" she asked incredulously.

Happy Chanukah

Exactly three years from the date that Antiochus initiated idol worship and desecrated the altar of the Temple, Judah the Maccabee organized its rededication. The event, held on the 25th day of Kislev, 164 BCE (recorded in Maccabees I), was made festive with harps, lutes and cymbals.

Improvising a menorah, the Hasmoneans took iron rods, covered with zinc, and inserted wicks. Searching for oil, they found only one bottle of oil sealed by the High Priest, enough for one day's lighting... "a miracle happened, and there was light from it for eight days. In the following year, they established eight festival days," wrote the Rabbis in the Babylonian Talmud (Shabbat).

Chanukah, which literally means "dedication," did not get its name until over 100 years after this miraculous event, when Josephus the historian referred to it as the Festival of Lights, symbolizing religious freedom.

The Maccabean heroes and heroines fought for Jewish beliefs, traditions and values, bringing to their struggle commitment, vitality and dynamism.

"For the Jew, there is no greater sin than the sin of detachment," says Mordechai Gafni, a young Orthodox rabbi involved with spiritual renewal. "The basic Hebraic posture in the world is passionate involvement in the realness of life." It is this passion, centuries after the Maccabean victory, that enables Jewish families everywhere to continue to celebrate the festival of Chanukah as free men and women.

Renaissance man elected chief rabbi of Rome

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

A Jewish scholar who is also a medical doctor has been elected the new chief rabbi of Rome.

Dr. Riccardo Di Segni, 52, elected to the post last month, will succeed 86-year-old Elio Toaff. Rabbi Di Segni has been director of Italy's rabbinical college since 1999.

Rabbi Toaff retired after 50 years in Italy's most prominent Jewish religious post. With some 15,000 Jews, Rome's Jewish community is the largest in Italy.

'It is certain that I will need everyone's help'

Married with three children, Rabbi Di Segni is chief radiologist at a major Rome hospital. The native of Rome studied medicine at the University of Minnesota.

Rabbi Di Segni has long been involved in interfaith relations. He has written or edited numerous scholarly works and liturgical texts, including three editions of a guide to Jewish dietary laws.

Rabbi Di Segni said he aims to safeguard the memory of a Jewish community that dates back more than 2,000 years.

"The choice of a chief rabbi for the Rome community is a guarantee for our traditions," Rabbi Di Segni, who formally takes office in February, told a Jewish club after his election.

"It is certain that I will need everyone's help, because I can't accomplish anything on my own."

He said he hoped to be able to continue his medical career as well as carry out his responsibilities as chief rabbi.

"In doing so, he will resume an old Sephardic tradition according to which a rabbi should also work" outside of his rabbinic duties, said Tullia Zevi, past president of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities.

"He is the best person for this post," said Amos Luzzatto, current president of the union.

Candlelight is the symbol of Jewish civilization

In observing Chanukah, each of us is called upon to light the candles and we are commanded to display the lit menorah publicly. Why this need for individual action and for publicity? And why is light the holiday's central motif?

The candlelight, I think, can be seen as the symbol of Jewish civilization – a common past, immemorial beliefs and practices, an eternal people, an everlasting State of Israel, and a single destiny. Over two thousand years ago, the rulers of the Seleucid Empire sought to extinguish the Jewish identity. They would have succeeded, had a heroic Judah Maccabee not emerged to thwart their destructive plans.

The emphasis on individual obligation tells us that we cannot always count on a Judah Maccabee to arise from our midst. To preserve our civilization and ensure our survival, therefore, each of us in every generation must take upon ourselves the role of Judah Maccabee. In that way the Jewish people truly is the sum of each one of its parts.

Furthermore, we light the menorah for all to see as an act of unabashed self-affirmation, thereby demonstrating to others as well as to ourselves self-assurance and pride in being Jewish. We also do so because we are meant to be a light unto the nations. Rooted in our values, we fulfill the responsibility of contributing in every way to the societies of which we are such an integral part.

At great cost, Sept. 11 awakened the world to those forces of darkness that the State of Israel has been confronting for all too long. Israel has been defeating these forces every day through the bright light of confidence and perseverance that burns brightly in each Israeli. It is from the Maccabean heroism of our brothers and sisters in Israel that we, and the world, must draw inspiration. It is from them that we learn the true miracle of Chanukah that, just as light dispels the darkness, so the human spirit will always triumph over evil.

A happy Chanukah to one and all.

Rome's Jews date back to Maccabees

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The election of Dr. Riccardo Di Segni as the new chief rabbi of Rome opens the latest chapter in the tumultuous life of a Jewish community that traces its history back to the days of the Maccabees.

Rabbi Di Segni was elected earlier this month to replace Rabbi Elio Toaff, who is retiring at age 86 after 50 years in Italy's most prominent Jewish religious post.

The new chief rabbi stressed his sense of duty in becoming the religious leader of what is considered the oldest continuous Jewish community in Europe.

"I will be the guardian of the memory of this community, which has never moved from here for more than 2,000 years," he said. "We have resisted everything, including infamy. We are faithful and proud of these places."

While Jews may have settled in Rome in the third century BCE, it was the Maccabees' successful revolt against the Syrian king Antiochus in the second century BCE that put the community on the map.

The festival of Chanukah was established on the 25th of Kislev, 165 BCE, when Judah Maccabee, his brothers and his volunteer army held a ceremony to rededicate the Temple after their victory.

Only four years later, in 161 BCE, Judah sent a diplomatic mission to Rome in an attempt to forge an alliance against the Syrians and preserve the Jews' precarious independence.

"It was natural to solicit the sympathy and support of the great new power in the west," the scholar Cecil Roth wrote in his History of the Jews in Italy.

The names of the Maccabees' Jewish ambassadors are known: Jason ben Eleazar and Eupolemos ben Johanan.

Written accounts tell how they appeared before the Roman Senate and received pledges of friendship and protection.

"These details are by no means insignificant," Roth wrote. "These are the first Jews to be in Italy, or to visit Europe, who are known to us by name," and are "the spiritual ancestors of western Jewry as a whole."

Further diplomatic missions were dispatched in coming years by Judah's brothers Jonathan and Simon, who succeeded him.

In 139 BCE, Simon sent envoys to Rome "with a great shield of gold of a thousand pound weight to confirm the [alliance] with them."

From that time on, the Jewish presence in Rome has been constant. Today, Rome's 15,000 Jews make up the largest Jewish community in Italy, which has about 35,000 Jews in all.

Rome's Jewish community was much bigger in ancient times.

It swelled to some 50,000, or 10 percent of the population, after the arrival of Jewish slaves and prisoners brought back after the Romans – led by the Emperor Vespasian and his son Titus – conquered Jerusalem and, in 70 C.E., destroyed the Second Temple.

The Roman Forum's Arch of Titus, which commemorates the sack of Jerusalem, has become one of the most powerful symbols of the Diaspora. Its carvings depict the emperor's triumphant procession carrying loot from the Temple, including a large, seven-branched menorah.

The arch became such a powerful symbol that Roman Jews refused to walk under it.

It was only in 1948, with the founding of the State of Israel, that they passed through it in a solemn procession – in the direction opposite to that taken by the triumphant ancient processions.

The menorah on the arch served as the model for the menorah symbol used on the emblem of the State of Israel.

Other archeological remains, including a synagogue and Jewish catacombs, also bear testimony to the antiquity of Rome's Jewish community.

The synagogue, located at the site of Rome's ancient port, Ostia Antica, was discovered in 1961. It is believed to date from the latter part of the first century C.E., and was remodeled at the end of the third century.

Rome's Jewish community was bigger in ancient times

In ancient times, Ostia was a bustling port at the mouth of the Tiber, but its site today is inland because of the changing coastline. The remains on the ancient port form an archeological zone reminiscent of a miniature Pompeii.

The ruined synagogue has a clearly visible ark decorated with carvings of a menorah, lulav and shofar. There also is a room with an oven which may have been used to bake matzah.

Oil lamps decorated with menorahs also were found. One of the most interesting finds was a Greek inscription on a tablet, in which a local Jew named Mindi Faustos praises himself for having donated the ark.

The menorah, lulav and shofar were the three symbols most representative of Jews in ancient times, and they appear frequently on ancient Jewish tombs.

Five Jewish catacombs have survived from Roman times, mainly from the third and fourth centuries C.E.

In addition to Jewish symbols, they are decorated with vivid paintings showing animals, plants, geometric forms and even human figures.

The Vatican Museum has the largest collection of Hebrew inscriptions and epitaphs from the Jewish catacombs. Nearly 200 are on display, some showing exceptionally detailed relief carvings.

Many are decorated with representations of ritual objects, including the menorah plundered by the Romans from the temple in Jerusalem.

Brazilian Jews threatened by assimilation, not anti-Semitism

By ELIAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The recent international congress for Jews and Human Ecology, held in the city of Belem in northern Brazil, paralleled the situation of the entire Brazilian Jewish community: just as outside South America, few in the Jewish world know about Brazilian Jewry, few people know of the existence of an organization involved in the preservation of nature according to traditional Jewish values. And few know there is a city on the Amazon estuary whose name is the Portuguese version of Bethlehem, in which there is an old and established Jewish community with a Zionist past, started by North African Jews.

Usually, attention is focused on Argentina's Jewish community, which has suffered a great deal of persecution recently and which has seen many of its members emigrate from South America. Brazilian Jews, on the other hand, live in tranquillity. Their economic situation is better than that of Jews in most South American countries, which are undergoing an economic crisis. Many years of prosperity have reinforced the influence of the wealthy and the bankers while intellectuals have become marginal in public life. The disappearance of scholarly periodicals reflects this trend.

Yet Brazil has not been immune to economic crisis, and the budgets of many community institutions, funded mostly by the United Jewish Appeal, have suffered. The economic situation is to some degree responsible for the closing of the Jewish teachers' seminary. And though Brazilian Jews contend with little anti-Semitism – they have integrated into society and into the cultural elite – they are in danger of assimilation.

A survey of worldwide anti-Semitism for 1999 to 2000, published by Tel Aviv University, points out that Brazil has traditionally been characterized by a low degree of anti-Semitism. The few recent incidents have been restricted mainly to telephone threats on synagogues and the distribution of anti-Semitic material on the Internet.

A new study of the Jews of Brazil, edited by a Jewish professor from the University of Sao Paolo and published in 2001 by the World Jewish Congress, adds that dealing with anti-Semitism (and support of Israel) is easier now for Brazilian Jews than in the past, when public opinion was openly pro-Palestinian.

In recent weeks, the world – and particularly the Jews of Argentina and Brazil – have turned their attention to Foz do Iguazu, the "smuggler's capital," on the border between Argentina and Paraguay. Many Arab immigrants live in this city, which is suspected of being one of the centres of Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda network and possibly the source of the attacks against the Jewish community and the Israeli embassy in Argentina in 1992.

The first Jews arrived in Brazil around 1500, together with the first Portuguese settlers. New Christians who had fled the Inquisition, these Jews enjoyed relative freedom for many years. The size of today's Brazilian Jewish community is unclear. The yearbook of the American Jewish Committee, one of the official sources for Jewish demographic statistics all over the world, lists between 98,000 and 100,000. A Brazilian study, on the other hand, estimates the number at 160,000. This discrepancy reflects the uncertainty over how widespread assimilation is and how to define the term.

Most of Brazil's Jews live in Sao Paolo and in Rio de Janeiro – between 55,000 and 65,000 – although as noted, these are estimates. The community is considered hard-working and well-organized. The Jews are identified with the present liberal capitalist regime, although in the past, there were many Jews among the leaders of the leftist movements, the target of severe persecution by the military regime from 1969 to 1975. Brazil's Labour party still attracts many young Jews.

Whereas during the second half of the 20th century North American Jewry was characterized by movement from the centres of the large cities to the new suburbs, in Brazil the opposite happened: with the improvement in their economic situation, many Jews moved from the poor suburbs and small towns to the cities and the Jewish populations of Sao Paolo and Rio de Janeiro grew again. Recently, however, with deteriorating living conditions in the cities, Jews are again returning to the suburbs and establishing new Jewish institutions.

Although during the 1930s anti-Semitism existed among the social elites, which led to the closing of Brazil's borders to European refugees from Nazism, the Jews, for the most part, have not encountered obstacles to integration into the upper classes of Brazilian society. This, of course, contributes to the dimensions of assimilation.

The Word: The Story of Judith

By JONATHAN GRONER
Jewz.com

When most of us think of Chanukah, we think of the Maccabees – the High Priest Mattathias and his five sons – and their religious and military struggle against the Hellenist Syrians.

It's a pretty male-dominated story. But there is an additional Chanukah tradition in which a woman plays a central role as warrior.

The source for this tradition is the book of Judith. Judith is, of course, not part of the Jewish Bible, but is one of the books of the Apocrypha, a set of writings that, for one reason or another, were not included in the biblical canon.

Scholars think Judith was written in Hebrew around 150 BCE., roughly at the time of the Maccabees' revolt, and was translated into Greek. Only the Greek version survives as the basis for modern translations.

The Judith story can be summarized as follows. At an unspecified time in history, the powerful King Nebuchadnezzar of Assyria orders his general, Holofernes, to conquer the land of Judea.

Holofernes besieges the city of Bethulia and cuts off its water supply

Holofernes besieges the city of Bethulia and cuts off its water supply. The city's desperate leaders are approached by Judith, a particularly pious young widow, who says she has a secret plan to save the city.

Judith walks into the Assyrian camp and feigns surrender. She meets Holofernes and beguiles him with her beauty: "There is not such a woman from one end of the earth to the other, either for beauty of face or wisdom of speech!" he exclaims (Judith 11:21).

Holofernes invites Judith to his tent. He "was ravished with her and he was moved with great desire to possess her." (Judith 12:16). They drink wine together until Holofernes passes out. Then Judith cuts off his head with his sword and carries the head back to her city. The Assyrians are frightened, the Jews are emboldened, and the Jews plunder the Assyrian camp. Judith sings a song of praise to God. She never marries again, and she lives to the ripe age of 105.

Purely as a matter of narrative skill and literary style, Judith falls far short of the standards set by familiar biblical books such as Ruth and Esther. It takes sixteen chapters to tell the basically simple story, and the book is marred by considerable repetition and a good deal of extraneous detail. In fact, it becomes easier to appreciate the beauty and charm of the biblical narratives after reading through Judith a few times.

Interestingly, nowhere does the unknown author of this apocryphal Judith narrative mention King Antiochus, the Syrians, or the Maccabees. In fact, Nebuchadnezzar and the Assyrians form part of a much earlier historical era.

But over the centuries, the story has become associated with the Chanukah celebration for many people, perhaps because it reflects a triumph of relatively powerless Jews over a foreign enemy. Some Jews even have the custom of eating dairy foods on Chanukah to commemorate the tradition that Judith served salty cheese to Holofernes to make him thirsty for wine, a detail not mentioned in the version of the Judith story that survives in the Apocrypha.

The Judith story is reminiscent not so much of the national epic of the Maccabees as of a much older narrative in the book of Judges, one with which the author of Judith was no doubt familiar.

The Word: The Story of Judith

The fourth chapter of Judges recounts the victory of Deborah the prophet over the Canaanites and their general, Sisera. Although Deborah and her own general, Barak, lead the rout, Sisera is actually killed by Jael, a non-Jewish woman, who takes him into her tent, serves him milk, and plants a tent peg into his skull while he is sleeping. The eventual outcome is foretold by Deborah, in Judges 4:9, when she tells Barak, "For into the hand of a woman will the Lord deliver Sisera."

To a warrior of the time, to die in battle was heroic; to be killed by a woman was ignominious. That concept, and probably the specific verse in Judges, is clearly alluded to in Judith. Just before Judith crosses into the Assyrian camp, she prays to God, "Crush their arrogance by the hand of a woman." (Judith 9:10). And after she has killed the oppressor Holofernes, she takes his head out of her bag and says, "The Lord has struck him down by the hand of a woman." So Judith was acting in a noble and time-honoured tradition, one that the original readers of the book would recognize.

This story also has elements that resonate well with 21st century readers, especially Judith's skill and courage in operating under cover behind enemy lines. And strong women role models are always important.

But, it's worth noting that Judith, like Jael before her, achieved her goal by taking advantage of her feminine allure and playing on a man's weakness. Ruth and Esther succeeded in their tasks partly for the same reason. Deborah, on the other hand, won her military victory in the same way that a man would have – by superior strength and better tactics. Those of us who are raising young women should continue to recount the Judith story but should also recognize that there are other models for women's leadership.

In tense times, you can't be too careful

By ANDREW FAINER
Special to The CJN

For as long as I can remember, and the grey hair is coming in, uniformed police have stood outside the doors of synagogues on the High Holidays. This year, the first post- Sept. 11, there were more of them.

I assumed there would also be more plainclothes security people inside than usual. Kids love to talk to the uniformed police officers. I get a similar kick from spotting the plainclothes security. Because I attend a synagogue in Ottawa also attended by ambassadors, politicians and high-ranking civil servants, I often get a chance to do this. Even at regular Shabbat services, it's not uncommon to see square-shouldered types standing in the back row. They have plastic buds in their ears and telephone cords running into the jackets of their dark suits.

So imagine my excitement on Yom Kippur when I was able to detect a Secret-Service type guy at the back door to the sanctuary who didn't even wear an earpiece (no doubt he was sporting a more sophisticated transmitter/receiver running through his wire-rimmed glasses).

Normally I sit in the front next to my friend Harry, an optometrist. Because I came to services only after reading the 43 page "Attack on America" coverage, and because of the synagogue's no-reserved seats policy, I sat near the back of the sanctuary.

I soon noticed a man standing at the door. Other congregants came and went. He stood in the same place. He was middle aged, of average height with good posture, short hair and, as I said before, he wore wire-rimmed eyeglasses. He also wore a tallit belonging to the synagogue (rather than one that belonged to him) and similarly held in his hand a prayer book belonging to the synagogue.

His eyes constantly scanned the crowd. He did not greet people, nor did he turn away from them. He neither smiled nor scowled. Other than opening the door for a few old people, he stood there, watching as people passed by him.

Although I guess he could have been a Mountie – there are Jews in the RCMP – I figured he was Israeli because although he didn't open the prayer book, it seemed to rest naturally in his hands. He also swayed slightly when the cantor sang the more moving parts of the liturgy. The real giveaway of what he was up to occurred whenever the congregation as a whole rose to its feet. Each time he dropped down into a crouch to be able to see through the crowd and then straightened back up when the congregation sat back down.

I had intended to pray my hardest on what's generally considered the holiest day of the Jewish calendar. But I spent the better part of an hour observing this very observant fellow.

At this point my friend Harry the optometrist came looking for me. He took the seat beside me. It's obviously important that security measures remain secret, but I couldn't resist whispering to Harry, "See that guy, Secret Service."

"Black suit?" Harry asked.

"No, navy suit, with glasses. Watch how he's looking at everybody!"

"Unbelievable. I just fit him for contact lenses last week."

"I didn't think those glasses were real."

"Yeah," continued Harry, "and he upgraded my insurance policy. That's John B., my insurance agent for the last 15 years."

"Oh."

Am I an idiot, I thought to myself.

Worse yet, Harry called John B. over. "John B., this is Andrew Fainer. He thought you were a cop." Harry and John share a big smile.

John carried the smile back to his place at the door.

I reacted to my embarrassment by trying to make a joke of it all. I pointed to an old man. "Hey, Harry. That guy's an astronaut." Even as I was saying it, I realized how pathetic I was. Harry forced a chuckle.

I figured maybe it was best to quit with the jokes and just pray. Besides it was time for Musaf.

Everyone stands, except for John who starts to crouch again. With my eyes focused on the page, with great devotion, according to custom, and along with the hundreds of other congregants I bent my knees and as the first few words are being spoken in near silence.

I hear Harry whisper, "The guy beside you is a movie star." I'm on the aisle and Harry is the only guy beside me.

I burst out laughing, which cracks up Harry. Let's just say that not even Nicole Kidman sitting on his lap would make Harry a movie star. (Nor, if his wife is reading this, would it make him a happier person.)

Eventually I got back to "Blessed are you Lord, our God and the God of our forefathers..." I have to hope God likes a good laugh in tense times.

Still, you might think it's a strange paranoia to be imagining secret service agents all over the place.

As for imagined terrorists, well there was a fellow who came to the door recently week sporting a Hydro-Ottawa ID tag. He wanted to install a new meter with a built-in transmitter that allows electricity consumption to be measured by a passing vehicle.

Clean cut, with a trimmed beard and red hair, he was otherwise unremarkable except for what I thought might be a trace of an accent – his English was almost too perfect. I let him install the meter. Of course it could be an explosive device. I'm wondering whether to tell Harry of my suspicions.

Andrew Fainer is an Ottawa writer.

Volunteerism: acts consistent with God's nature

Part 1 of a 2-part series.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

V'chol mi she'oskim b'tzarchei tzibur b'emunah, Hakadosh Baruch Hu yeshaleim secharam. (And for all those who devote themselves faithfully to the needs of the community, the Holy One, blessed be He, will provide their reward.)

Since before the giving of the Torah on Mount Sinai, the importance of doing chesed, acts of loving-kindness done with no thought of reward, has been a paramount characteristic of Jewish life.

It is considered, in theological terms, imitatio dei, an act consistent with the intrinsic nature of God, explains Rabbi Nachum Berlat, director of pastoral care at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"God is our role model, and we walk in His ways. As He is kind and merciful, feeds the hungry, buries the dead [as He did Moses] and provides for the poor and the sick, so we do the same."

Seldom has the role of volunteers been so visible as when, during the horrific events of Sept. 11, off-duty police, firefighters, and medical personnel converged on what has been dubbed Ground Zero. Some paid for their altruism with their lives.

We have become accustomed to the men of Israel's chevrei kadishah appearing at terrorism sites to collect any last scrap of human remains for burial. Surely an unenviable task if there ever was one.

Volunteers founded Mount Sinai Hospital

Most of the volunteer work that people do is not nearly as dramatic as helping at the World Trade Center or at other scenes of violence. Nevertheless, we should recognize its significance.

In the late 1800s, when Toronto's Jewish community was in its infancy, government social services were virtually non-existent. As is so often the case, women stepped in to fill the gap, explained Stephen Speisman, outgoing director of the Ontario Jewish Archives and author of The Jews of Toronto: a history to 1937.

The Ladies' Montefiore Benevolent Society, which was associated with Holy Blossom synagogue, began in 1868. Its purpose at first was to assist the needy within the congregation. Then, when the newer immigrants came in the 1880s, its scope expanded to include the community as a whole.

"They provided funds, fuel and food – whatever was needed," Speisman said.

One must remember, said Speisman, that it didn't take much for a family to become needy. "There was no insurance, and little extended family. The family might be hit with an accident, or a fire."

By the 1880s, the men in the community founded a branch of the Anglo-Jewish Association, an organization then in London and Montreal that assisted immigrants who had wound up in England on their way from eastern Europe and were shipped off to Jewish farming colonies in the Canadian West.

The aim of the Toronto men was not totally altruistic, Speisman noted wryly, explaining that they were not keen on having compatriots around whom they saw as being somewhat lower class.

By 1899, east European women began to form their own charitable organizations. "They saw the Ladies' Montefiore as patronizing and their style as humiliating," Speisman said.

That style reflected the trend in North American society at the time of helping only people considered to be the "deserving poor" – those who, in the eyes of the establishment, had done everything possible to help themselves.

While that idea sounds justified at first blush, and indeed is echoed in today's philosophy of neo-conservativism, its ramifications were anathema to those who held the more traditional, more open-handed view of charity.

For instance, when inspectors from more established groups were sent to applicants' houses, they would make sure that, in the inspector's opinion, not only was there a real need, but that the household was morally upright as well.

If a Jewish family had brought silver Shabbat candlesticks from Europe, for example, they had to pawn them before being eligible for aid.

By contrast, the eastern European organizations also sent in inspectors, but their task was to make sure families were not too proud to ask for everything they needed.

It is difficult to imagine the Toronto Jewish community as it is today without the efforts of those willing to give their time and energy towards it in the past.

Volunteers founded Mount Sinai Hospital, and for years they acted as assistant cooks, porters, janitors and housekeepers, not to mention runners who took instruments to be sterilized at nearby hospitals. In the very early days, even many of the doctors – Jewish and non-Jewish – were volunteers.

Members of National Council of Jewish Women taught English and Canadian ways to immigrant Jewish girls, so they could more easily find jobs. They even provided athletic facilities.

A Zionist school and a sewing school were formed, organized and run by volunteers. During both world wars, Jewish organizations sent care packages to Jewish, and probably non-Jewish, soldiers.

At Eitz Chaim, founded originally as an afternoon cheder, the Halboshos Haromim, the ladies' auxiliary, both helped support the school, and provided clothing and shoes to

Happy Chanukah

Chanukah is a time to celebrate 'enduring courage and strength of the Jewish people'

By RALPH SHEDLETSKY

A message from the chair of the board, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Chanukah is a time when we celebrate the enduring courage and strength of the Jewish people and rejoice in the spirit of Jewish life.

This year, as Israel undergoes one of the most difficult periods in its history, we are more compelled than ever to remind ourselves of the bravery and resilience of Jews, especially those living in Israel.

At few times since its turbulent birth has Israel needed the kind of absolute support it requires today. As always, our community has responded to Israel's crisis with overwhelming support.

Our community's outstanding generosity, demonstrated through historically high gift increases, is ensuring that UJA Federation Campaign 2002 – Israel Now and Forever is well on its way to being our most successful ever. To date, we have raised more than $41 million dollars, thanks to the monumental efforts of thousands of donors and volunteers.

At this pivotal time I am particularly proud to be a part of a community that continues to surpass itself and exceed all expectations. I am grateful to live in a community that identifies so strongly with the broader Jewish world and links itself so closely with Israel and world Jewry.

On behalf of UJA Federation, I extend warm wishes for happy Chanukah.

children who were too embarrassed to come because their families were too poor to properly clothe them.

After World War I, one of the community's priorities was to create a place for the elderly whose families were either were not able to care for them or were not around at all. The cause was spurred on by the story of a Jewish woman who nearly starved to death in a Protestant old folks home because she ate only kosher food, and, since she spoke only Yiddish, could not make her wishes known.

In 1914, a group of men had established the Folks Farein, which, after starting as a literary and cultural society, a decade later provided kosher food, translation services and hostels for those travelling to the west.

A group of women, though, who perhaps had greater vision, established the Ezras Noshim Society, which raised funds to buy a building to house the elderly. Eventually, they bought three houses on Cecil Street to open a facility that grew to become the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Volunteers supplemented the work of the professional staff by helping to move patients, reading to the residents, cleaning and generally making things as home-like as possible. While the majority of the board were women, the president, as was considered appropriate at the time, was a man.

This was also the case at Mount Sinai, where only very recently was a photograph showing the first, almost exclusively female, board moved to a prominent place on the main floor.

It is important to note that one of the most vital jobs performed by the voluntary sector then, as now, was fundraising. This included going door to door asking for donations and organizing bazaars, teas and corporate appeals.

Parallels to 2001, both in the approach to those in need and in the roles of volunteers, are striking.

The CJN will examine modern volunteerism next week.

Bernard Lazare: A forgotten Jewish prophet

By BARUCH COHEN
Special to The CJN

Bernard Lazare was born in 1865 in Nimes, in southern France, to an assimilated family of Sephardi origin. He came to Paris at age 21 and within a few years, had achieved a literary reputation for excellence. He contributed critical essays to symbolist journals and published two volumes of poetry. The decade of Lazare's maturation was a period of increasing anti-Semitism in France, which culminated in the Dreyfus Affair in 1894. Lazare was the first to recognize and understand that the case was not only a judicial error, but also a political plot against the French Republic.

Little is known about Lazare's primary education. He most likely attended an ordinary state school where the teaching, if it ran true to pattern, would have been secular, ardently patriotic and Republican, and respectably middle-class in social and moral values. Generally speaking, the sort of religion practised in assimilated Jewish milieus did not conflict with the secular morality taught at school. Lazare had probably known this sort of religion at home, with two or three yearly visits to the temple, occasions for remembering the past and the dead, organizing charity for the living and thanking God for – the Revolution.

Home and school, secular and religious education clearly meshed, but Lazare was soon to rebel against both. The young Lazare had an instinctively rebellious nature and an anarchistic temperament. He was capable of great self-discipline and respected the authority of knowledge and true learning. In Stéphane Mallarmé's salon, Lazare found a sort of leisurely education of the mind that was to become his ideal, and that he later wished to extend to all. He passed his university baccalaureate in the sciences, and then turned immediately to literature, for he wanted to become a writer.

Bernard Lazare

At the École Normale Supérieure, he observed the intellectual elite who were trained to be conservative and traditionalist, and never departed from what they had learned at school. Lazare, however, continued to rebel against this conservative spirit, leading him to take flight in symbolism and to flirt with mysticism from many religious traditions. He soon became deeply committed to anarchism.

Much in Lazare's life could be seen as a reaction to his milieu and times. He tried on the garb of many roles before actively choosing a lifestyle for which his upbringing had scarcely prepared him. He came from a comfortable, middle-class home, yet as an anarchist, he was to be forever denouncing the comfort and wealth of the middle-class lifestyle.

As a Jew too, he was an odd man out. At first anti-Semitic and later Zionist, Lazare first chided French Jewry for not being assimilated enough to forget the religion of their ancestors, and later for being merely "synagogue Jews." Yet all the while, he insisted on every person's right to choose his cultural patrie.

Lazare's writing career reflects the evolution of his moral values, philosophies and political fervour. Among his first writings were attacks on the unwelcome Jewish refugees from eastern Europe, Poland, Russia and Romania, with their coarse manners, their strange customs and their allegedly parasitic ways. Only gradually did Lazare rid himself of his xenophobia.

His fight against the French anti-Semitic writers raised Jewish consciousness even as it antagonized the Jewish community. If he irritated Jewish sensibilities, he also sounded a call to Jews that helped to arouse a sense of Jewish nationhood. He also tried to forge a united Jewish pride, an essential component in the foundation of Zionism.

Published in 1894, Lazare's magnum opus, L'Antisémitisme, son histoire et ses causes (1894) (Anti-Semitism – Its History and Its Causes, London: Cambridge University Press, 1978), offered his views on the causes of anti-Semitism. This seminal work was a response to the anti-Semitic writings of Edouard Drumont whose newspaper La Libre Parole and his best-selling work, La France Juive, played upon and incited anti-Semitism in France.

The conviction of Alfred Dreyfus on Dec. 22, 1894, released an onslaught of abuse and racism from anti-Semitic writers. Lazare, who bitterly resented the insidious methods of the anti-Semitic writers, wasted no time in responding. For him, instead of presenting evidence, these writers used lies and innuendo. Lazare replied to an anti-Semitic article in L'Écho de Paris: "They don't discuss, they beat around the bush" (Dec. 31, 1894).

Lazare concluded Anti-Semitism – Its History and Its Causes with the hope that reason and a decline of chauvinistic nationalism would gradually lessen the importance given in his time to religious and ethnic differences.

He would soon be cruelly disappointed by calls from the mob of "Death to the Jews!" as Alfred Dreyfus was marched to the prison ship bound for Devil's Island. The event coincided with the publication of his article, The New Ghetto, in the daily La Justice. He was unaware that the founder of the Zionist movement, Theodor Herzl, had written a play with the same title, in which he also attacked anti-Semitism. For Lazare, as well as for Herzl, The New Ghetto served as a metaphor for the hostility aroused in an anti-Semitic Europe. Jews were accused everywhere – in Italy, Austria, Romania. If a single Jew was suspected of wrongdoing, Jews as a collective were indicted.

Lazare did not limit his fight against anti-Semitism to his writings. At the ceremony where Dreyfus was disgraced on Jan. 5, 1895, both Herzl and Lazare were present. Herzl's response

He struggled with socialist anti-Semites was to convene a Zionist congress and to write his classic Der Judenstaat (The Jewish State). Lazare wrote to him to offer his help with a French translation. He was one of Dreyfus' first supporters and published several books in an attempt to demonstrate his innocence, inlcuding Une erreur judiciaire – la vérité sur l'affaire Dreyfus (1896) and Comment on condamne un innocent (1898).

Herzl and Lazare met with Jewish philanthropists and Lazare arranged a meeting between Herzl and Baron Edmond de Rothschild, which secured significant financial support for the Zionist cause.

In 1896, Lazare changed his focus. Instead of protesting against gentile anti-Semitism, he began to criticize wealthy, assimilated Jews for their identification with Christian interests and their failure to support Dreyfus' cause.

Still another dimension of Lazare's battle was his struggle with the socialist anti-Semites, because of their tendency to believe the young Karl Marx's Jewish Question literally. (At the time of its writing, Marx believed all Jews were middle class).

Lazare spent his last years fighting anti-Semitism by moving directly into the political arena.

In 1902, he described the horrors of Jewish life in Romania, where increasingly stringent laws made it impossible for Jews to make a living. Les Juifs en Romanie (The Romanian Jews) was the first of his studies on Jewish condition across all of eastern Europe. It appeared on July 20, 1900, in L'Aurore, as part of a series of articles, including Roumains et Juifs, La Roumanie et les Juifs and Émigration juive de la Roumanie, following his first visit to Romania in June 1900. Lazare's idea of Zionism was to deal at once with such problems.

In Lazare's non-assimilationist attitude, there was hostility towards society as it was then organized. He taught Zionism as a revolutionary idea. His point was not merely that assimilation had proved impossible from both the Jewish and the non-Jewish point of view, but that the Jew must not, at any cost, assimilate. Lazare's concept of a Jewish nation is based on a series of lectures titled Le Nationalisme juif – Jewish Nationalism, given at the Association des Étudiants Israélites and published – apparently in its only number – in its publication, Kadimah.

In 1902, the article was published again, in Charles Péguy's Cahiers de la quinzaine. It expressed Lazare's revolt against assimilation. He hoped to generate enough passion to encourage favourable action, to arouse a sense of solidarity among Jews everywhere. This was Lazare's vital first step toward forming a collective Jewish appeal to action.

Lazare's criticism of his people was at least as bitter as Herzl's, though he never despised them and he did not share Herzl's idea that politics must be conducted from above. What Lazare sought was not an escape from anti-Semitism, but rather active resistance to it, a mobilization of the people against its foes. This was clearly shown by Lazare in the Dreyfus case, and later by his memoranda on the persecution of the Jews in Romania.

Lazare fought alongside Georges Clemenceau, Emile Zola and other intellectuals in Charles Péguy's circle, for a clear, unambiguous reversal of the original sentence in the Dreyfus Affair. Lazare refused to accept the pardon offered by the president of the Republic after the new trial for Dreyfus in 1899, even though French Jewry wanted to end the affair at any price and welcomed the pardon. A bitter conflict ensued between Lazare and the French Jewish community. Three years later, in 1906, after Lazare's death, when Clemenceau had become France's premier, the court of appeals exercised its power to review the decisions of all previous judicial bodies. After annulling the sentence passed at the 1899 trial, the court went one step further and acquitted Dreyfus of all charges.

In the fight for Dreyfus' acquittal, Lazare came to know the Jewish people and the Jews of France intimately, as well as the enemies of the Jewish people. The conclusion he drew from his experience was that Zionism offered the only possible solution to the untenable situation of the Jewish people.

Abandoned by the Dreyfus family, ostracized by the wealthy French Jews he antagonized, Lazare lived in poverty at the end of his life. He died of cancer in 1903, at the age of 38. His funeral was attended mainly by Romanian Jewish refugees who were grateful for his efforts in pleading their cause.

A champion of the oppressed

French Zionism lost in him "the only French Jew of distinction which it ever attracted," according to Baruch Hagani in Bernard Lazare – 1865-1903, Paris, 1919.

Lazare was thus a fighter of anti-Semitism, a Zionist and a champion of the oppressed. Charley Péguy called him a prophet. He wrote: "He was a fellow who had the very habits of freedom in his skin. Never have I seen a man believe to such a degree, to such degree be certain, to such a degree be aware that a man's conscience is absolute, invincible, eternal, something free, that victorious and everlastingly triumphant it stands firm against all the greatness of the earth." (Job's Dungheap – Essays on Jewish Nationalism and Social Revolution with a Portrait of Bernard Lazare, New York: Schocken Books, 1948.)

I suggest, as Peguy does, that in a time of crisis for Israel and the world, Lazare was indeed a prophet. In his actions, in his politics, in his writings, Lazare was a partisan of impartiality – impartiality of law in the Dreyfus case, impartiality of law in the case of the religious orders. As a free man, Lazare taught us to defend ourselves when attacked, that only when we defend ourselves will we be able to defend the freedom of others. Perhaps this is how Lazare came to be, in the words of Albert Cremieux on June 16, 1933, one of "les plus belles consciences de notre temps" (Bernard Lazare, by Nelly Wilson, Cambridge University Press, 1978).

Bernard Lazare left a great legacy: peace at any price will not enable a people to survive. A people needs to resist the aggressor! He was a true prophet of Israel.

The Great Synagogue of Kiev

By ALLAN LEVINE

Don't tell Chief Rabbi of Kiev Moshe Rueven Azman that something can't be done. He doesn't take no for an answer.

Four years ago, when the Kiev Jewish community, after more than a century, regained control of the Brodsky Choral Synagogue or Great Synagogue in downtown Kiev, the building was in need of major renovations. Rabbi Azman, 35, had been promised financial help from the United States, but when that failed to materialize and when the wealthier members of the Kiev's 50,000 or so Jewish community did not come forward, he picked up a sledgehammer and started knocking down walls. As the news circulated, money began coming in from local Jewish businessman Vadim Rabinovich, among others.

Initial quotes for the reconstruction amounted to $4 million (US). Acting as his own contractor, negotiating with suppliers, builders and workmen, the Lubavitcher rabbi got the job done for $1.5 million (US).

The results are impressive. The Great Synagogue of Kiev, or the synagoga as the locals call it, has been restored to all its grandeur. Sitting proudly on the corner of Shota Rustaveli Street, it is a striking building of Gothic grey pillars and light beige brick. Inside, the marble floors shimmer amidst wood-panelling, fine furniture and a main sanctuary to rival any in the world. After all the years of Soviet control and Nazi destruction during World War II, the Great Synagogue is not only a testimony to Rabbi Azman's diligence, but more significantly, it is a symbol of the Kiev Jewish community's remarkable rebirth.

Moshe Azman had a typical Soviet upbringing

Moshe Azman had a typical Soviet upbringing. He was born in Leningrad (now St. Petersburg) in 1966 into a state-led environment that was decidedly anti-Jewish. He had no formal Jewish education and he didn't have a bar mitzvah when he turned 13 years old. He remembers only his grandparents speaking Yiddish. Nonetheless, he knew he was different from his Russian friends: the letter "j" was stamped on his internal passport.

"As a child, I knew I was a Jew and I got beaten up for it at school," he says.

A year after Rabbi Azman was born, the Israeli-Arab 1967 Six Day War broke out. Throughout the Diaspora, but especially in the former Soviet Union, this seemingly miraculous victory was vigorously applauded as an event of almost messianic proportions. It sparked, says former dissident Natan Sharansky, "a basic, eternal truth that personal freedom wasn't something you could achieve through assimilation. It was available only by reclaiming your historical roots."

Thereafter, the desire by Soviet Jews to immigrate to Israel grew stronger, as did the Soviet authorities' decision to halt the movement. And so "refuseniks" – Soviet Jews who were denied permission to leave the country, but opted to continue their dangerous fight for freedom – were born. Many, including Boris Kochubiyevsky, Yasha Kazakov, Edward Kuznetsov and Natan Sharansky, paid the ultimate price for their convictions and faith that one day they would live in Israel: they were imprisoned in Soviet jails and Siberian labour camps.

The Azman family first applied for permission to immigrate to Israel in 1979. That year, more than 50,000 Jews were allowed to leave, though not the Azmans. Their battle with immigration authorities was to drag on for eight more years, during which time Rabbi Azman discovered his faith and studied Judaism in secret with a group of like-minded friends. They learned Hebrew and Sabbath rituals and later studied Torah with two rabbis who had been imprisoned in Siberia for teaching Talmud. When their activities were eventually discovered by the KGB, they were publicly denounced as "provocateurs."

Yet official threats had no effect and in 1987, a year after he became a shochet, he and his new wife Chana, along with their parents, were allowed to go to Israel. Once there, he began his studies to become a rabbi, learning at the Shamir (now Gutnick) Talmudic Academy in Jerusalem. He spent two years in Toronto at the Jewish Russian Community Centre before returning to Israel to obtain his rabbinate certificate in 1994. Two years later, he returned to Kiev as a shaliach and took charge of the Great Synagogue – another significant and positive event in the synagogue's long and often tortured history.

It took until the reign of Czar Alexander II, the "Great Liberator," in 1859 before Jews, who had been ordered to reside in the Pale of Settlement in western Russia (present-day Belarus and Poland), were permitted to live within Kiev. Until then, the community had been kept small – Jews were required to have a special permit to enter the city – and temporary. Following Alexander II's succession of the throne, wealthier Jewish merchants and their families, as well as intellectuals and physicians, were allowed to live outside the Pale, including in Kiev, though they were kept under strict residence restrictions.

'Jews in Kiev suffered serious attack in 1881'

Thereafter, the community grew at a steady pace. Jews in Kiev, like Jews in much of the Pale, suffered serious attacks during the pogroms of 1881 that erupted after Czar Alexander II was assassinated. Still, they petitioned officials in 1886 for permission to build a new synagogue.

Though the request was initially denied, key members of the community persisted. The prime mover behind the project was Lazar Brodsky, the "sugar king," probably the wealthiest Jew in the city in that era. He and his five sons hired engineer Georgiy Shliefer, who created an Ashkenazi synagogue with a Roman appeal, high ceilings, pillars and large gallery for the women on the second level.

The Choral Synagogue or "Brodsky Shul," as it was more commonly known, opened in 1898. It became the synagogue for Kiev's Jewish elite and the centre for the cultural life of the community. But adhering to Brodsky's mandate, it also functioned as an institution to aid those in need, something Rabbi Azman is doing once more with his daily soup kitchens and support of the neighbourhood's impoverished children.

In 1917, the members of the Brodsky Shul, like the vast majority of the country's 3.5 million Jews, welcomed and participated in the revolutionary upheaval of 1917 that ultimately brought Vladimir Lenin and the Communists to power. The promises of equality and religious and national freedom were hailed as the deliverance of the people and as a miracle that would be recorded as one of the greatest events in the history of Israel. And though the Bolsheviks had initially pledged that Russia's various nationalities would be accorded the right of self-determination, this is not what Lenin, Joseph Stalin and Leon Trotsky quite had in mind.

Lenin, in particular, resented both the Jewish labour party, the Bund, as well as the more popular Zionist parties and organizations. A Jewish "nationality," the Bolshevik leader had argued more than a decade before his conquest of Russia, "is definitely reactionary not only when expounded by its consistent advocates [Zionist], but likewise on the lips of those who try to combine it with the ideas of Social Democracy [the Bundists]. This idea of a Jewish nationality runs counter to the interests of the Jewish proletariat, for it fosters among them, directly or indirectly, a spirit hostile to assimilation, the spirit of the 'ghetto.'"

As for Zionism, Lenin and every Soviet leader who followed him dismissed it as a dangerous bourgeoisie movement. In Stalin's opinion, there was a question as to whether Jews were even a nation.

"What national cohesion can there be between the Georgian, Daghestanian, Russian and American Jew?" he had asked in a 1913 essay. "If there is anything common to them left it is their religion, their common origin and certain relics of national character."

This was a view that was to have dramatic and devastating ramifications in the dark years ahead.

Slowly but methodically, the Soviets cast their wide net around Jewish cultural and religious institutions. In 1924, massive arrests and secret trials of prominent Zionists were carried out for "counterrevolutionary acts" in which guilty verdicts were more or less determined before the proceedings began – a soon-to-be-familiar feature of the Soviet regime. Hebrew schools were closed. Lenin's war on Russia's churches and synagogues began almost from the start of his reign. Property was seized and any resistance met with force and death. In the four-year period from 1921 to 1926, close to 800 synagogues were shut and Judaism was publicly denounced.

These closures included the closure of the Brodsky Synagogue, which would not be returned to the Kiev Jewish community for the next eight decades. Throughout this long period, the city's Jews suffered first at the hands of Stalin and then under the Nazi occupation. A ten minute or so car ride from the synagogue are the death pits of Babi Yar, where at the end of September 1941, Nazi death squads, the Einsatzgruppen and their local helpers, murdered more than 33,000 of Kiev's Jews in two days. (Only since the fall of the Sovit Union, has the fact that most of the victims at Babi Yar were Jewish been properly acknowledged in the memorial.) For the duration of the war, the Nazis used the Brodsky Synagogue as a stable to house their horses.

In 1946, once Kiev was again under Soviet control, the synagogue was made into a children's theatre and after extensive renovations became the home for the Kiev State Puppet Theatre. Forty years later, it hardly resembled a synagogue at all.

The dramatic events of 1989 to 1991 that saw the collapse of the Soviet Union and the creation of the Republic of the Ukraine led to the restoration of Jewish property. In 1992, the upper floors of the Brodsky building again became a synagogue chapel and school, though it took many years of negotiation before the Puppet Theatre finally vacated the premises in December 1997 – one year after Rabbi Azman's arrival. The project to transform the first floor back into the synagogue sanctuary it was at the turn of the century then began in earnest.

Rabbi Azman says his main goal is to reconnect Kiev's Jews with the synagogue.

"Our aim is to give them back their Yiddishkeit," he says.

Rabbi Azman looks at the various issues currently dividing and hampering North American Jewish communities – such as assimilation and intermarriage and the struggles between Orthodox, Conservative and Reform factions – with incredulity. From his perspective, there is not much to argue about.

"Either you follow Jewish life or you do not," he says. "It is as simple as that."

As the leader of the Great Synagogue and Community Centre, the rabbi's phone does not stop ringing. He often visits other eastern European Jewish centres to promote Jewish life and with the help of a synagogue worker, created a superb Internet Web site to highlight the synagogue's work and achievements.

Kiev may never have as dynamic a community as it did before 1939, but Rabbi Azman deserves much of the credit for a rebirth that only ten years ago would have seemed highly unlikely.

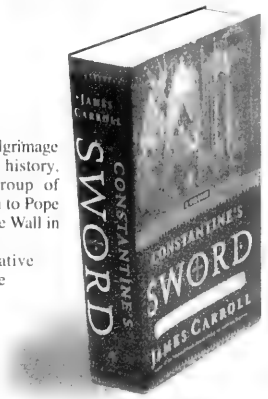
Author calls for a Vatican III



By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

About Books

It may seem strange that a book that traces the history of the Catholic Church should begin – more or less– in late 1979 in a field not far from Krakow, Poland.

And it may seem even stranger that a book that uses the Cross as a symbol for all that's wrong with the Church should be written by a former priest who is still a devout Catholic.

In Constantine's Sword, The Church and The Jews (Houghland Miffin $39.95), author James Carroll takes us on a personal pilgrimage through 2,000 years of Church history, from its beginnings by a group of panicked disciples in Jerusalem to Pope John Paul II's visit to the Temple Wall in Jerusalem.

The narrative begins on the grounds of Auschwitz in 1979 where Pope John Paul II is celebrating mass in front of a million of his countrymen on an altar where a 20-foot-cross was later erected, a cross that created such controversy that a law was required to make its existence permanent.

"What does the Cross of Jesus mean at such a place?" the author asks. "What does it mean to Jews? What does it mean to Christians?... If Auschwitz has become such a sacred center of Jewish identity, what does the Cross there imply about the relations between Jews and Christians, and between Judaism and Christianity?"

It is with these three questions that Carroll begins his journey through Christian history. In over 700 pages, Carroll does a remarkably complete job of at least walking us through important milestones of the two millennia.

He starts from Christianity's humble beginnings as a Jewish sect, moving on to Paul, who first spread the word to gentiles, to Constantine, who made the Church equal to the Roman Empire and was first to use the Cross as a symbol of the Church, to the works of St. Augustine and Thomas Aquinas. He continues with the Crusades, the Expulsion of 1492 and the Inquisition; the ghetto in Rome; the Reformation and Counter-Reformation; Voltaire, Luther and the Enlightenment; Bismark, Germany and the rise of Hitler; Vatican II to the present.

But Carroll is not just writing a history book. His take on all of them is specifically geared to show how these history-shaping events relate to the Church's current relationship with Judaism and how they led up to the Shoah.

Carroll sets up a monumental task for himself, and he handles it well – interspersing history with his own personal pilgrimage through various Catholic shrines in Europe.

But he doesn't stop there. His biggest challenge is one he offers to the Catholic Church: that no talk of reckoning with Judaism is complete without a new synod – a Vatican III.

Carroll takes it upon himself to set the agenda for Vatican III, putting forth five items for discussion:

• Anti-Judaism in the New Testament: Readers of the Gospels must be made aware, he says, of the context in which they were written: that the writers of the Gospels were in a fight for survival against the rabbinical – Pharisee – tradition of Judaism.

Happy Chanukah

"[The Gospels'] offensive character is part of what the Church must learn not only to admit but to claim. The anti-Jewish texts of the New Testament show that the Church – even in its first generation, was capable of betraying the message of Jesus, establishing once and for all that "the Church as such can sin."

• Church and Power: The Church, he says, has never come fully to terms with the contradiction it embraced when the Roman imperium and Roman Catholicism became the same thing (Constantine, 312 CE). Speaking about Papal infallibility, Carroll writes, "Instead of hoping that the doctrine will wither into disuse over time, Vatican III should repeal it."

• A New Christology: Jesus' saving act, he writes, was not dying on the Cross, but his disclosure of the divine love available to all. The Church should dispense with its supersessionist philosophy that the "New Testament" supersedes that of the "Old."

"A new Christology, faithfully based in the Scriptures... will in no way support supersessionism. The shift initiated by Vatican III will [lead to] an authentic respect for other religions as true expressions of God 'beckoning' the human heart."

• Holiness of Democracy: Although Pope John Paul II was partially responsible for the end of communism, Carroll writes, the Church has been suspicious of democracy and pluralism. Truth, he believes, is not absolute, and criticism is far more relevant to truth-seeking than conformity to dictation from above.

"If mystery is at the core of religion, then ambiguity, paradox and even doubt are not enemies of the faith, but aspects of it."

• Repentance: Pope John Paul II's apology for the Shoah, failed, Carroll writes, because "it puts responsibility for failure on the Church's children, not the Church." While he acknowledges the profound significance of the Pope's apology, he says it falls far short of a true repentance.

These are all well argued points, and like Pope John Paul's apology, well meaning; but surely Carroll knows they are wishful thinking. Nevertheless, these five arguments are a summary of what Carroll believes are the failings of the Church – a Church that he still loves dearly and sincerely wishes to see corrected.

The Flame

"Jeremy, do you want me to light your menorah for you this year?" Avital asked.

Jeremy looked down at the scar on his left hand. He still remembered the day he had fallen into the fireplace, although he had only been three at the time. He had been running across the living room when he tripped. He remembered the emergency room, strangely quiet as the doctors scurried through...

"No way," he shot back at his younger sister. "What do you think I am, scared?"

"You were last year."

Jeremy sat on his bed, alone. He was scared. He sighed. He had mixed feelings about Chanukah. He loved eating latkes and playing dreidel with his sister (and winning, too!). But lighting the menorah... he had tried once, when he was six. He had gingerly accepted the candle from his father, holding it by the tip, as far away from the flame as possible. Still, he could feel the heat. A sudden draft had sent the flame towards his hand, and he had screamed and dropped the candle. Last year he had made a menorah in school. But he had refused to light it. Avital had lit it for him.

"I'm not scared," he said to himself. "I'm not." But he was. "Why can't I just admit it to myself? I am scared. I'm a chicken. And I'll be one forever." He felt helpless, trapped. He stopped thinking about menorahs. Who cared about them, anyway? Chanukah was about latkes, dreidels, Judah Maccabee... Judah Maccabee. He was brave. He wasn't scared of anything. He must have been born that way. Or was he? Maybe he was scared to fight King Antiochus, but he did anyway. Maybe you can be brave even if you're scared....

"I'm lighting my menorah tonight," he told his father.

Abba seemed both relieved and apprehensive. "Are you sure?" he asked.

"Yes. But give me a long candle."

That night, Jeremy's father said the brachot and lit his first candle. His mother did the same. Now it was Jeremy's turn. Imma handed him the burning candle. Cautiously he accepted it. He could feel the heat of the flickering flame, and desperately hoped it wouldn't blow toward him. If it did, he knew he would drop it. It did. His fingertips seemed to catch fire as the flame leapt towards them. He closed his eyes, his hand begging to release the fire, to let go. He didn't. His fingers weren't on fire, he realized. It only felt that way. His father extended the siddur, and Jeremy began saying the brachah. The candle dripped hot wax onto the aluminum foil sheets underneath the menorahs. The candle's getting shorter, he realized. Still, he continued saying the brachot.

"...laz'man hazeh," he finished.

"Amen," his family answered.

Now it was time. Slowly he stretched out his hand toward the lone candle waiting for him in his menorah. For an instant, the wicks touched, and then he withdrew his hand. A tiny flame hovered on the wick. It spread upwards, slowly growing. Jeremy stared as it became as big as the flame on Abba's menorah. He continued staring....

"My turn! You're taking too long," burst out Avital. She took the shammash from his hand, made the brachot, and lit her own small menorah. Then they all sang Haneirot Hallalu and Ma'oz Tzur together. Imma went into the kitchen to get latkes, and while they waited, Jeremy and Avital started a game of dreidel.

Jeremy smiled. "Chanukah is my favourite holiday," he thought.

Recommended Chanukah reading

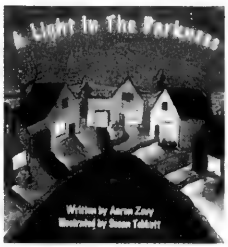
By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

One of the nicest Chanukah presents, I think, has to be books, especially when the books talk about Chanukah now, rather than Chanukah in the past. Of course, the history is the most important thing, but if you already know about the Maccabees, the miracle of the oil that lasted for eight days and the story of Chana and her seven sons, then it is fun to read something different.

Here are two books that are really terrific: A Light in the Darkness, by Aaron Zevy (Tumbleweed Press, 1998) and Chanukah Lights Everywhere, by Michael Rosen (Harcourt, 2001).

In A Light in the Darkness, you will read about two little boys, Josh Siegel, and his next door neighbour, Willy Jackson (who tells the story). Josh, who is Jewish, and Willy, who is a black Christian, become best friends. They like to do things together, like eating junk food, playing basketball and watching videos.

When Chanukah comes around, Josh tells Willy all about the story of Chanukah. Even better, the Siegels invite Willy to join them in lighting the chanukiyah, singing songs, and eating potato latkes.



When Willy goes home, he sees that Mr. Siegel has put the chanukiyah on a table by the living room window.

Then the trouble starts. For two nights, someone throws a rock through the Siegels' window, breaking the window and knocking over the chanukiyah.

Everyone on the street is very upset. A police officer even suggests that Mr. Siegel should not put the chanukiyah in the window anymore. Willy's parents explain to him that "some people are scared of things they don't understand," and that "ignorance was a real dangerous thing."

Willy gets a wonderful idea. He and his little sister, Marti, take their allowance money, and bought a whole bunch of chanukiyot – one for each house on the street.

They take them around to the neighbours, and for the rest of Chanukah, every house has a chanukiyah shining in its front window.

A Light in the Darkness is a true story. When Jewish homes in Billings, Mont., were vandalized, like they are in the book, the townspeople banded together in the same way to fight the hate. Can you imagine a whole town lit up by chanukiyot?

In the back of the book, there is a picture of the real Josh and Willy, carrying banners that say "Racism: Not in Our Town."

Chanukah Lights Everywhere does not tell as important a story, but it is just as real. It is about how a five-year-old boy, his sister, and his mother and father celebrate Chanukah and how much he enjoys it.

On each of the eight days of Chanukah, something wonderful happens – the four of them (and their cat) light the candles together; their grandparents and their cousins come; and they take a walk down the street and see lots of other houses with chanukiyot. The boy also visits his friend who celebrates Christmas, realizing that "Chanukah is also about the joy of different religions sharing a street," and he watches the stars in the sky, probably God's chanukiyah, he thinks.

The boy also helps his mother make latkes and plays dreidel with his sister.

As a special treat in the book, Melissa Iwai, who drew the pictures, hid a reminder in each picture that on Chanukah "the warm lights spread far beyond the menorah."

Both Chanukah Lights Everywhere and A Light in the Darkness are great books to give as presents, to ask your parents for, or to get from the library.

Canadian Jewry stronger than ever, new book says

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

About Books

Community leaders' worries about Jewish continuity and unity are blown out of proportion, according to academic Morton Weinfeld's highly optimistic new book Like Everyone Else... But Different: The Paradoxical Success of Canadian Jews (McClelland & Stewart).

In contrast to the gloom-and-doom prognostications that dominate most discussion about the Jewish future, Weinfeld states unequivocally that things have never been better for Canadian Jews.

"Jewish life in Canada today is as good as it has been anywhere since the Golden Age of Spain," he states in the book's introduction.

He notes that Jews enjoy full participation in Canadian public life and yet maintain a strong cultural life of their own. And it's the only community in the Diaspora that continues to grow.

Weinfeld calls Canadian Jews "the multicultural group par excellence," a model for other ethnic groups because of their unparalleled network of organizations, schools and other institutions.

Like Everyone Else is a thorough assessment of the Canadian Jewish condition, and Jewish readers will finish it feeling good about themselves.

The book can serve as a primer on Canadian Jewish life. Weinfeld tries to explain Judaism, Jewish communal and family life, education, ties to Israel, and relations (or lack of them) with non-Jews.

Weinfeld has a professional interest in the subject (he has taught a unique course on the sociology of North American Jewry since 1977 at McGill University) and takes obvious delight in exploring his own Jewish identity.

The book is not a history of the community, although there are historical anecdotes, nor is it an examination of the community by city or region. There are only passing references to communities outside Quebec and Ontario, and it's very focused on the culture of the Jewish majority: those of Askenazi Eastern European origin.

There are also no personality profiles or interviews with community leaders, a deliberate move, Weinfeld says.

The book is filled with factual information, although it suffers somewhat from a lack of up-to-date data. Most figures come from the 1991 Canadian census and studies going back to the 1980s.

And some of his observations are not unique to Canada and could be applied to Jews in the United States and perhaps other western countries.

What makes the book fresh are Weinfeld's own observations and assessments.

The book is interspersed with personal notes about Weinfeld and his family's strong sense of Jewishness, despite contradictions, such as his keeping a kosher home yet having a fondness for bacon.

It's all part of the "paradox" he identifies: Canadian Jews can be as secular or as observant as they wish, and that mixture is good for the community as a whole.

Jewish success, Weinfeld contends, has less to do with economic and professional achievement against historic discrimination (he doubts things were ever very bad for Jews in Canada), than with Jews' ability to accept themselves in their diversity and thus feel more comfortable with others.

Although scholarly and copiously footnoted, the book is aimed at a broad audience. Weinfeld actually had his curious non-Jewish colleagues in mind when he began writing. Yet, his opinions are controversial enough to make the book interesting for Jews.

Weinfeld rejects forecasts that the number of Jews will decline because of intermarriage, low birthrates and assimilation.

Even mixed marriage, while he does not advocate it, is not necessarily totally negative, he believes. The number of non-Jews who convert after marrying Jews is significant, but even among those who don't convert, many adopt a Jewish way of life, he notes, thereby adding to the community. Weinfeld commends Reform temples for doing the community's thankless "dirty work" of reaching out to interfaith couples.

Weinfeld says intermarriage is a fact the community must face. Doors should be opened, not closed, to such couples, he believes.

Similarly, what some see as disunity – the tensions between Orthodox and non-Orthodox, for example – Weinfeld sees as healthy dynamism. He suggests the divisions among Jews were far more serious in the past and yet the community survived.

Weinfeld may draw flak from community fundraisers for his skepticism about the level of Jewish poverty, which has been estimated at 17 per cent nationally.

He speculates many of the "poor" are under-reporting their income.

Others, especially the elderly, may have low incomes but own homes or other assets. What's more, Weinfeld points out, a high proportion of Jews are students whose incomes are "misleadingly" low.

Weinfeld also makes the unpopular case that anti-Semitism is not a problem for Canadian Jews. If anything, he senses a growing "philo-Semitism."

The "victimization" many still feel, he argues, has more to do with Jews' own self-image than their actual experience.

A child of Holocaust survivors, Weinfeld skewers his peers for whom the Holocaust is "now a trendy, low-cost way for some largely secular Jewish intellectuals to identify publicly as Jews... This 'Holocaust chic' is the ultimate in political correctness for Jews who do not want to be too Jewish."

Weinfeld examines some areas not often covered by academics, such as the singles scene, gay and lesbian issues, food and Jewish humour, as well as some distinctly Canadian Jewish traditions, like trying to keep up with the Stanley Cup playoffs during the seders (at least, during the NHL's pre-expansion days).

Palestinian media marches to 'drumbeat of war'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A little over three weeks ago, Itamar Marcus took note of a film that was making its first appearance on official Palestinian television.

Produced in the Palestinian territories, the film shows adolescent boys wearing military camouflage marching and singing, interspersed with clips of regular soldiers, also marching to a military beat.

For Marcus, the film's message was ominous and clear, if hardly novel. As he interpreted it, its purpose was to "encourage children to see themselves as soldiers in the future and in the present… It's encouraging another generation of fighters."

Marcus, founder and director of Palestinian Media Watch (PMW), an Israeli NGO that monitors Arab-language TV, radio and newspapers, has seen it all before: the public declarations of peace by Arab spokespersons in English, and the drumbeat of war in the Palestinians' own Arab-language media.

That drumbeat, Marcus contends, has been ongoing since 1993, when Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat agreed to the Oslo accords and returned from exile in Tunisia to lead the Palestinian national movement.

Already at that time, he said, the Arafat-led PA decided to encourage a maximalist political ideology while encouraging violence and martyrdom to attain it.

Largely ignored by the West in the euphoria of Oslo, Palestinian incitement has recently drawn the attention of the highest echelons of U.S. leadership.

Chrétien approved Geneva vote, Day charges

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada's endorsement last week of a declaration that called on Israel to refrain from violating the Geneva conventions came directly from Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, charges Opposition leader Stockwell Day.

The Geneva declaration last Wednesday effectively accused Israel of grave breaches of rules of war as they relate to civilians in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and eastern Jerusalem.

"On something of this significance, nothing is done without the prime minister's scrutiny and approval," Day said in a telephone interview last Thursday. "It's far too sensitive an issue. No minister would try and slide through an approach like this without clear and direct approval from the prime minister."

Stockwell Day

The CJN's calls to the Prime Minister's Office for comment were referred to Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley's office.

"Mr. Manley is the foreign minister, and foreign policy decisions are taken by him, in consultation with people in his office," spokesperson Jennifer Sloan said tersely. Asked whether there's any evidence supporting Day's contention that it was Chrétien who approved Canada's backing of the resolution, Sloan said, "No."

The prime minister tried last week to soften the effect of Canada's support for the declaration, saying Canadian delegates objected to aspects of the text that criticized Israel.

"Our representative there made it clear that this resolution, as far as it concerned Israel, was

Israeli Convicted

BRAMPTON — An Israeli citizen was convicted here recently of trying to smuggle diamonds into Canada. Ronnie Reuben Kohn was arrested Nov. 27 when diamonds worth $200,000 were found in his briefcase after he arrived on a flight from Israel. Kohn, 54, of Tel Aviv, pleaded guilty and was ordered to pay a $35,000 fine before being released.

ISRAEL

Port Cancelled

JERUSALEM — A French-Dutch consortium has canceled a project to build a port in the Gaza Strip. The "persistent insecurity" in the Gaza Strip makes construction, which has been suspended since last October, "impossible," the consortium stated.

Leave Law Alone

JERUSALEM — Israel's Law of Return should not be tightened, says a leading official with the Jewish Agency for Israel. Sallai Meridor said tightening the law, which currently recognizes as Jewish anybody with at least one Jewish grandparent, would "close the door on those who wish to be part of the Jewish people, particularly to immigrants from the former Soviet Union."

Gold Next Envoy?

JERUSALEM — Israel's ambassador to Washington, David Ivry, will return from his posting early next month, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres have agreed. A senior government source said Peres has withdrawn his objection to Sharon's nominee to replace Ivry, Dore Gold. Gold was an advisor to former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who later appointed him to be Israel's ambassador to the United Nations.

WORLD

Conference Planned

PARIS — French Prime Minister Lionel Jospin has announced plans for an international conference on the Holocaust. In a speech to French Jewish leaders this month, Jospin also stated that he will use the conference, scheduled for October 2002, to inaugurate a program for dedicating one day in each school year to the memory of the Holocaust and to the prevention of crimes against humanity.

Regev New Head

NEW YORK — Rabbi Uri Regev, the longtime director of the Israel Religious Action Centre, will head the World Union for Progressive Judaism. An outspoken advocate for liberal Judaism in Israel, Rabbi Regev will become executive director of the umbrella agency for all Reform, liberal and Reconstructionist organizations in 40 countries.

Memorial Vandalized

NICE — Vandals painted a swastika on a memorial here to a Jewish hero of the French Resistance. The desecration of the marble plaque honouring Raymond Fresco coincided with an event marking the anniversary of his death. Fresco was captured by the Nazis in 1943 and then tortured and killed when he refused to reveal any information.

New Commission?

VATICAN — The Vatican is trying to put together a new interfaith team to study its World War II archives, according to the New York Jewish Week. The last group of Jewish and Catholic scholars studying the archives, including the University of Toronto's Michael Marrus, disbanded over the summer after the Vatican said it needed more time to organize and catalogue the archives.

Ottawa Freezes Mideast Groups' Funds

OTTAWA — Canada has frozen the assets of Hamas and of three organizations with alleged ties to Middle East terror groups, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien said last week.

"We have frozen the assets of Hamas," Chrétien said following a cabinet meeting.

However, Canada, like Britain, makes a distinction between Hamas military operations and its charitable, social and political initiatives. But "for the terrorist contributions, it's all frozen," the prime minister said.

Hamas claimed responsibility for the Dec. 1 and Dec. 2 suicide bombings in Israel that killed 25 people and wounded about 200.

In a statement, the federal government said the decision to freeze assets was taken by the cabinet on the recommendation of Canadian intelligence and security officials. But it was not clear yet what, if any, holdings the targeted organizations have in this country, a finance department spokesperson said.

The three organizations are Al Aqsa Islamic Bank, Beit El-Mal Holdings and the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development.

Earlier last week, U.S. President George W. Bush announced that U.S. authorities were freezing the assets of the organizations because of their alleged links to Hamas.

Solidarity rally for Israel draws 3,000

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Speaker after speaker at last Sunday's Israel Solidarity Rally for Freedom supported both Israel's right to live free from violence and the worldwide struggle against terrorism.

The rally, sponsored by Israel Now, a consortium of community organizations under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel, had been originally scheduled for early fall, but was postponed in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Speakers included Art Eggleton, Minister of National Defence; MP Irwin Cotler; Major Cindy Rosen of the U.S. Marine Corps; Consul General of Israel Meir Romem; and Dan Meridor, Minister, Government of Israel.

Terrorism came to North America on Sept. 11, said Eggleton, and we felt at home what others have been feeling for so long.

"Israel has been facing these wanton acts for many years but its spirit is far mightier than any force that tries to destroy it.

"Terrorism has no home and it knows no boundaries. It must be confronted," he told an audience of 3,000 at Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

Canada has taken up the cause of terrorism, he said, and has committed over 3,000 troops, the largest operation since the Korean War.

'Terrorism has no home and it knows no boundaries. It must be confronted'

"Terrorists and those who harbour them must be responsible," he said. "Canada and Canadians stand firmly with Israel, and we must remain a viable voice in the world if we want to make a difference."

Cotler, who took the stage to a standing ovation, said that the rally occurred as Israel was arising from a week of mourning. "The number of people injured and killed in

Reflections from the G.A. (4)

Elchanan Tenenboim was born in Poland in 1946. Three years later his parents brought him and his sister to Israel, where they eventually settled in Holon, a sandy suburb of Tel Aviv.

He served in the army; completed a degree in economics and political science at Hebrew University; did post-graduate studies in Business Administration at Tel Aviv University; married Esther when he was 25 and had two children, Keren (now 26) and Ory (now 20).

Among the social causes in which Elchanan has been involved is the Israeli Scout movement, which he even once represented in the United States.

His curriculum vitae is accomplished, but stands out, in truth, for one quality: its plain, family-oriented ordinariness. In other words, Elchanan is an individual like most any of us, focused on providing for his family.

On Oct. 16, 2000, the Hezbollah in Lebanon announced it was holding him.

Sometime between Oct. 4, when Elchanan left Israel on business, and Oct. 16, Hezbollah kidnapped him.

At the recent G.A. in Washington, I met Elchanan's wife Esther, and his son, Ory. They had come to Washington along with the parents of Zacharia Baumel, an Israeli soldier held captive in Lebanon since June 11, 1982, to plead – literally – with the delegates to help secure the release of their loved ones and the release of all the Israeli soldiers being held by Hezbollah.

Ory addressed the more than 3,000 people at the plenary assembly. He held us all spellbound. Speaking without notes, in impeccable English, he directed his remarks beyond the crowded convention chamber. He was trying to penetrate the conscience of the western world.

He spoke not only on behalf of his father, but, as he repeatedly made clear, on behalf of all of Israel's MIAs.

The poignancy of Ory's plea was made all the more piercing by the news that, merely days before, the IDF had officially declared three of the MIAs – Adi Avitan, Omar Souad and Benny Avraham – to have been killed in action.

I sat down with Ory and his mother the day after he spoke to the plenary assembly. It was a very humbling experience.

Interviewing them, asking questions, eliciting information – even for the benevolent purpose of trying to help them – seemed to be an unjustifiable intrusion into their private agony.

Elchanan Tenenboim

As it turned out, they were both much more composed than I. As I fumbled for the right phrases, they answered all questions politely, with a smile.

In fact, they have travelled a great deal inside Israel and, of late, in Europe to mobilize world opinion to the cause of helping secure the release of their husband and father. This was their first such trip to North America.

Ory and Esther Tenenboim

Ory had just recently returned from a meeting in London with British Prime Minister Tony Blair. The meeting was arranged through the offices of Jonathan Sachs, Chief Rabbi of the United Kingdom, and lasted for about 20 minutes. Ory left the meeting convinced that Blair would try to intervene in their case.

While in England, Ory also spoke at a number of different Jewish institutions and to various youth groups. He was well-received by all.

Esther is planning to bring their message more frequently to Europe. She has already spoken in France and in Germany, where she too was well received.

But at the end of the meetings, at the end of the rallies, at the end of the interviews, at the end of the visits, is the return to Israel to a home made insufferably incomplete by the gratuitous cruelty of Elchanan's kidnappers.

Esther and Elchanan have been married for 30 years. He has a severe medical condition and the Red Cross has been refused access to him. "We have had no news about him, none. This is the worst thing of all. But I need to be strong. The children mustn't see me crying," Esther said.

She finds her strength increasingly from the mutual support provided by the other families in Israel in similar situations. They meet regularly. Two days before she left for Washington, she had met with the Avraham, Avitan and Souad families.

Hezbollah had been bargaining with Israel over the release of the soldiers, knowing all the while the boys were dead.

Esther does not articulate her worst fear. But it hangs in the conversation, unspoken but acknowledged by the urgency in her eyes. She and Ory need our help.

And we must help them. The fate of Elchanan Tenenboim and the MIAs of Israel must not fall from the public's mind or conscience.

Anti-Semitism used as part of Arab statecraft: rabbi

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last week in Geneva, at a meeting of NGOs attending a conference on Israel and the Palestinians, the chair of the conference raised his fists in the face of a Jewish representative and threatened him.

Calling Shimon Samuels, director of international relations for the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, a "Zionist agent," conference chair Rajie Sourani continued: "I am a Palestinian terrorist; ask your security people, you will see later."

Samuels, along with representatives of three other Jewish NGOs – B'nai Brith, Hadassah and UN Watch, a Geneva-based group affiliated with the American Jewish Committee – was turned away from the meeting, which had been organized by Palestinian groups. Though not a sanctioned UN event, it was billed as open to international NGOs.

Samuels' report on his run-in with the conference chair did not come as much of a surprise to Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

As he sees it, it's just the latest manifestation of a virulently anti-Jewish and anti-Israel agenda that has been playing out in international fora in recent years. Reminiscent of efforts in the 1970s by the PLO and its Arab supporters to deligitimize and marginalize Israel, the effort reached a peak in Durban earlier this summer, Rabbi Cooper said.

"The relentless, non-stop campaign of vilification of Israel, the demonization of Israel and Jews, of open anti-Semitism," is troubling, Rabbi Cooper said. But what's especially disturbing "is that it has now become part of Arab statecraft."

Furthermore, he continued, it is a top-down development in which the intellectual and political elites in Arab states and the Palestinian Authority mold public opinion by disseminating crude anti-Semitic stereotypes of Jews and Israel.

Abraham Cooper

The examples are many but one that has recently come to Rabbi Cooper's attention is a television series that aired in Abu Dhabi during Ramadan. Featuring actors portraying Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and an aide, wearing sidelocks, drinking blood, the show is a throwback to medieval European blood libels that led to violence against Jews, he said.

Official newspapers in Egypt, Jordan and the PA, among others, are rife with hatred of Jews and Holocaust-denial is rampant in the Arab world, he added.

These developments are not connected to the intifadah, he contended.

"The whole game plan that [alleges] Ariel Sharon is a war criminal, that Israel is guilty of ethnic cleansing, was put into play even as [former Israeli prime minister] Ehud Barak was putting out an offer of 95 percent of the territories," Rabbi Cooper stated.

Canada and other democracies must call the Arab world on their domestic propaganda, "to be aggressive and talk about the 'A' word (anti-Semitism)," he said. "We need Canada to take the lead in the international community to make it too expensive for the Arabs to use hatred of Jews as a basis of statecraft."

Rabbi Cooper was in Ottawa last week where he met with a number of officials from the Prime Minister's Office and presented them with evidence of the crude, racist nature of the Abu Dhabi TV series.

He noted a convergence of Jew-haters in the Arab world and among neo-Nazis is now developing. A linchpin in that relationship is Ahmed Huber, a longstanding neo-Nazi who converted to Islam 20 years ago. Huber was instrumental in attempting to schedule a "revisionist" Holocaust-denial conference in Beirut, which was cancelled after an international uproar, and in organizing a mass demonstration by neo-Nazis in a Jewish neighbourhood of Berlin two weeks ago.

Neo-Nazis and Arab anti-Semites are putting out feelers, seeking common ground and a possible strategic alliance. "We don't know where it will go," he said.

While the Palestinian sponsors of the NGO conference in Geneva were hoping to "pass it off as the voice of civil society," the meeting was largely a failure, said Andrew Srulevitch, executive director of UN Watch.

Only 20 NGOs attended, many of them from Arab countries, and organizers did not get the broad support they were seeking to politicize the humanitarian issues connected to the Geneva Convention, he said.

However, what's troubling, he noted, was that the office of Mary Robinson, the UN High Commissioner on Human Rights, agreed to re-schedule a later UN-sanctioned NGO meeting to accommodate an anti-Israel demonstration. The NGO meeting, a follow-up to the Durban conference, was delayed one day "to accommodate the Palestinians so they could get more people out for an anti-Israel protest," he said. "It was a very serious indication of bias that needs to be condemned."

The UN's NGO meeting, which was attended by Jewish NGOs, was muted in comparison to Durban. Srulevitch suggested non-Arab participants at Durban realized the conference was a failure because of its divisiveness and they tried to avoid a repetition.

Sybil Kessler, a representative of Hadassah WIZO, said the NGO meeting did hear from a Palestinian group that attacked Israel, but the overall focus of the meeting was on the concerns of other international groups.

Still, she said, the attacks on Israel make her feel "like you very existence causes a controversy. That's what makes the process so exclusionary."

CJC objects to 'biased' view of Mideast history in newsletter

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress is objecting to what it calls biased and inaccurate history about the Middle East in a union newsletter for Toronto public high school teachers.

The December issue of D12 Voice, a newsletter published by local 12 of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation (OSSTF) and distributed to 6,500 teachers, features an article that is being recommended as a resource to history and geography teachers to stimulate debate in classes.

The article, titled Why America is hated, lists a chronology of events that purport to explain the reasons behind "the deep seated sense of injustice in the Arab and Islamic worlds against the USA."

Why America is hated is reprinted from an article that originally appeared in Z Magazine, an American left-wing monthly for activists.

In a letter to OSSTF president Earl Manners, Ed Morgan, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said the article is "one-sided and merely reiterates much of the crude anti-Israel and anti-American propaganda so common in the Middle East."

Why America is hated begins in 1948 with the establishment of the State of Israel and ends in the present era with the statement "Israel uses U.S. arms in attempt to crush Palestinian uprising, killing hundreds of civilians."

In an interview, Manners said the article is not an appropriate lesson plan. He said that while he does not object to controversial issues being brought into the classroom, both sides needs to be presented.

Manners added that the local publishes the newsletter and steps are being taken to remove the OSSTF name from it, but there are no plans to cut funding to the local.

Doug Little, the newsletter's editor, told The CJN he has no reservations about having published the article and has no hesitation bringing political views into the classroom.

In a letter responding to CJC's complaints, Little, a teacher at Rosedale Heights Secondary School and a former school trustee, states that "the point of the piece is not to present a so called 'balanced' view of the Middle East."

Little writes that his local has "Jewish members on the ed. board, Jewish members on the executive board, and many Jewish members on its very active council. Most of them, however, [are] anti-Zionist in orientation."

The letter goes on to say that "we make no pretense of being 'objective.' We do not have a 'balanced' view of the Mike Harris regime. We do not have a 'balanced' view of oppression anywhere. We side with the oppressed and against the oppressor. We view America, and Israel as its agent, as the prime oppressor in this case in the Middle East."

Little also said the CJC should not "ask us to be 'balanced' in our approach. That is not our orientation so it will be a waste of your breath."

Allen Charney, a special education teacher at Maplewood High School in Scarborough, said issues dealing with curriculum fall outside the newsletter's mandate."The purpose of D12 Voice is to keep us informed of union-related issues."

Curriculum is developed by experts and should come to teachers through appropriate channels, Charney said, adding it is inappropriate for anyone to usurp the mandate of the newsletter in order to represent their own political views.

CJC has written a letter to Rosedale Heights asking the principal to take "whatever steps you deem necessary to ensure that the children in your school are educated with a balanced and reasonable perspective as called by the [Toronto District School] Board."

Calls to the principal and the school board were not returned before The CJN's deadline.

"Given the tragedy of Sept. 11 and [the Dec. 1 and Dec. 2] terrorist murder of 26 Israelis, Mr. Little's comments must be strongly condemned," the CJC said in a statement.

"If this is the position of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation and if this position is translated into public school classrooms, it is a scandal of the highest order. The Ontario public needs teachers who are educators, not political fanatics."

HEARTS OF STONE!

For Jews, this past year has been the most difficult in 50. Filled with bombings, terrorism, shock, sorrow and tears in Israel and New York - perhaps no one has suffered as much as The Schevischurder family in Israel.

They lost five members in the Jerusalem "Sbarro" bombing.

The parents were with 5 of their 8 children when a suicide bomber detonated a knapsack filled with nails and explosives. The mother and two daughters A"H were killed instantly. The father and son A"H lay mortally wounded and died after reciting the Shema Yisrael together. Two young girls aged 8 and 10 were injured, one very seriously.

The 3 brothers not with the family found their sisters in the hospital. Then they came together for the five concurrent funerals which took place on Mount Menuchot in Jerusalem.

The father Mati was a Jewish studies teacher and the mother Tzirel worked with deaf children. They left a small amount of life insurance. The remaining 5 children aged 8 to 21, are destitute and facing a crisis. The youngest girl faces many surgeries and long term therapy.

WON'T YOU PLEASE HELP?

We need every Jew to help these five orphans financially. We can defeat those with hearts of stone. Charitable tax receipts will be issued for donations of $18 and up. Please give generously. In the merit of this mitzva may you and all of Israel be blessed with a year of health, happiness and peace. Thank you.

MDA ambulance service seeks volunteers

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the last 14 months, Magen David Adom, the Israeli provider of emergency blood and paramedic services, has lost 57 ambulances while on duty in Israel and the Palestinian territories.

Targets of the Palestinian intifadah, the lost ambulances make up 11.5 percent of the MDA's 500-strong fleet, cutting into its ability to provide emergency services.

With only a small percentage of the MDA's annual budget underwritten by government, the organization has had to look to the private sector for help in keeping the ambulances rolling and the other services operating.

"All the ambulances and equipment, the stations they operate in, comes from donations," explained Yochai Porat, co-ordinator of foreign volunteers for MDA.

Porat, who was in Toronto recently as part of a one-month North American awareness campaign, said private donations, particularly from North America, play a big role in assuring Israelis of emergency services. Regular vehicles each cost $60,000 (US) while armoured ambulances, increasingly necessary given the attacks by Palestinians rioters, can each run $125,000 (US), he said.

MDA ambulances serve Israeli citizens on a non-denominational basis and travel outside the Green Line (the pre-1967 borders) to provide emergency services to both Jews and Palestinians, he said.

Ironically, one of the first MDA ambulances destroyed in the intifadah – "a famous incident" – occurred in September 2000 when the vehicle was stopped while on the way to tend to a Palestinian casualty. The car was stoned, abandoned by its drivers and torched by a mob, he said.

While providing aid to victims of the intifadah comes within the organization's mandate - MDA responded to the Sbarro Pizzeria attack and other terrorist assaults – much of MDA's work consists of typical emergency services provided by similar organizations around the world.

It collects, processes, tests and distributes 93 percent of all the blood units used in Israeli hospitals, and operates an embryo bank as well as a blood marrow bank.

Because of the limited financial support it receives from government, MDA relies to a large extent on the volunteer sector. In addition to its 1,500 employees, MDA has 8,000 volunteers, most of whom are involved in "field work," manning the vehicles that attend to people in distress, Porat said.

Part of Porat's job is recruiting volunteers from North America, who play a vital role as "first responders" to crisis situations.

Volunteers, who are generally between 18 and 25 years of age, receive eight days of training in emergency response and, once certified, are teamed with an Israeli as half of an ambulance's two-person complement.

The program includes various perks, including a three-day seminar at the end of the two-month stint, in which volunteers meet political figures, academics, and representatives from various Israeli and Palestinian communities. Field trips to the Golan Heights and other locales round out the volunteer experience, Porat said.

Tours and junkets are nice, but Porat believes the program's strongest selling point is its offer of a total immersion in Israeli life.

"It gives youth the opportunity to experience Israel from a different angle, not as a tourist or sightseer, but to live and be with the Israeli people," he said.

MDA's volunteers are given an apartment at a Jewish Agency absorption centre, which they share with a roommate, and they live independently while working their shift.

This past year, 17 Canadians participated in the program along with 20 Americans. Other foreign volunteers hailed from Australia, Belgium, Spain and the United Kingdom.

"It gives them an opportunity to really help the Israeli people," Porat explained. "We're in a battle for survival. In a way, we feel we're abandoned by the Jewish people. We rarely see Jewish people from abroad and when I see people from abroad, I feel very proud and strong."

MDA personnel are among the first to arrive on a disaster scene.

Canada has been an early supporter of MDA, with its participation in the volunteer program dating back to 1991 when 10 Canadians worked at the Jerusalem station. By 1999, 70 Canadians were volunteering at various MDA facilities.

Alan Spector, past president of the Toronto chapter of Canadian MDA, said the Canadian group ranks fourth among among Diaspora communities in support for the Israeli agency.

In the past 12 months, Toronto MDA delivered six ambulances to Israel while two more are partially paid for. Montreal shipped eight ambulances, while support groups in Hamilton, with one, and Vancouver, with two, have also contributed to the MDA fleet. Windsor is pooling its funds to be able to send another, Spector said.

The Chicago Jewish community is a particularly strong supporter of MDA, with funds for 18 ambulances raised during a recent blitz, he added.

A deplorable vote

There is no doubt that Israel considers Canada a friend, that bilateral relations between the two countries are sound and that Canada has probably aided Israel on occasion, behind the scenes, in ways that cannot be made public. But there is equally no doubt that Canada's near-constant support of various votes and resolutions, routinely, egregiously and falsely condemnatory of Israel in most multilateral, UN-sponsored settings, is an outrageous debasement of our Canadian values.

The most recent examples occurred last week.

At the annual General Assembly criticize-Israel voting ritual in New York, Canada supported 14 anti-Israel resolutions and abstained on five.

On Wednesday, in Geneva, the anti-Israel forces of the UN orchestrated the reconvening of the High Contracting Parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention. As most people know, the convention deals with the code of conduct for the "protection of civilian persons in times of war." It was propagated some 50 years ago to deal with the horrors of Nazi behaviour.

The meeting in Geneva condemned Israel as "an occupying power," calling on Israel to "refrain from committing grave breaches" of the convention including "willful killing, torture, unlawful deportation, collective penalties and unjustified restrictions of free movement."

Only once before, despite the myriad murderous, genocidal conflicts that have raged these past five decades since the convention was enshrined into international law, have the nations of the world convened to consider the application of convention rules. That was on July 15, 1999, also in Geneva, also to upbraid and isolate Israel. But that meeting lasted only 17 minutes and then it was adjourned. And Canada boycotted it.

The gathering last week was the resumption of this adjourned meeting. Last week, Canada supported the condemnation.

That decision was deplorable.

After Durban, there can no longer be even the pretense of justification for having cast a vote of support. If Durban taught us anything, it is that the torrents of anti-Semitic, anti-Israel language that have flowed unabated from the UN since 1967 have indeed poisoned the wells of international discourse, if not the minds and hearts of millions of unsuspecting people around the world.

"Assaultive speech is dangerous," MP Irwin Cotler has told us. And he is absolutely correct.

Why Canada would lend its name to this latest wave of "assaultive speech" is puzzling and disappointing. It makes a mockery of everything the government tried to achieve in Durban.The explanatory statements by the Canadian delegate after the vote were meaningless for they did not become part of the record. By having supported the Geneva declaration, the government has sided again with the forces that intend only to harm Israel.

It has also violated some of the fundamental democratic values for which our country stands: truth, fairness, justice and humanity.

Why I visit Cuba

Regarding Murray Teitel's article that Canadians should not vacation in Cuba ("An alternative to Cuba," CJN, Nov. 22), the Canadian Jewish Congress, along with Jewish visitors from France, the United States, Australia and Iran, has been helping the Jewish community in Cuba for many years. A boycott would hurt the average Cuban but would be more painful to the country's Jewish community. The funds spent by Canadian Jews help pay for millions of dollars of goods and services from Canada and Israel.

People ask me why I prefer Cuba to Florida. It is more peaceful, has less traffic and fewer muggings.

I agree with Teitel that we should support the State of Israel in every way, sometimes with helpful criticism, and with many visits.

Cuban leader Fidel Castro cannot be too virulently anti-Israel or he would not have allowed 400 Jews to emigrate there.

Cuba has been invaded, sabotaged, embargoed and is still a "threat" because Castro is not for sale like Fulgencio Batista or Don Augusto Pinochet Ugarte.

Balfour's political rights

I am writing in response to a letter by Isaac Josy about the Balfour Declaration (CJN, Nov. 15). Josy wrote that since the declaration does not mention any indentifiable group, it is testimony to the fact that no Arab entity existed in Palestine at the time. On the contrary: in 1917, 90 percent of the population of Palestine was Arab; the other 10 percent was made up of both Jews and Christians.

The omission of political rights in the clause stating that 'nothing be done to prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities' was done on purpose to protect the Jewish people in the early years when they were a minority.

A homeland for the Jewish people was necessary to ensure their protection against anti-Semitism. However, one must not believe that Palestine was a vacant land waiting to be settled. Palestinians had lived there for centuries and entire villages were destroyed in 1948. This must be acknowledged for a just settlement and peace to become realities in the Middle East.

Praises of the Jewish contribution

Since 1999, almost 400,000 people have visited Europe's largest Jewish museum in Berlin, the city where the Nazis planned the slaughter of all Jews. The zinc clad monument to 2,000 years of Jewish life on German soil became a legend even before its over 4,000 exhibits were installed. Its director, Michael Blumenthal, a former secretary of the U.S. treasury who fled Berlin in 1939 and returned in 1997, and its architect, American Daniel Libeskind, are both Jewish.

Some 850 dignitaries attended the museum's opening gala dinner. The full list of guests, published by a few German newspapers, included German President Johannes Rau, German Chancellor Gerhard Schroder and former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger.

"The museum will teach young people how much Jews have contributed to the country rather than focusing only on the Nazi Holocaust," Rau said. "The contribution of Jews to science, art and culture in Germany and Europe is extraordinary. The museum we open today to bring us closer to this culture in all its facets."

"What struck me is that European culture and also German culture would have been unthinkable without the Jewish contribution," Schroder said.

It is not very often that we hear or read about the great contribution of the Jewish people to the world. When an important personality is praised, Jewishness is seldom mentioned, but in criticism and scapegoating, it is never missed. That is why it gave me such pleasure to read the praises of our fellow Jews by German dignitaries.

Both parties must curb violence

The national board of the United Jewish People's Order condemns the three recent horrific suicide bombings in Israel claimed by Islamic Jihad and Hamas, and grieves the heavy loss of innocent civilian life. At the same time, we share the views expressed by commentators such as former U.S. assistant secretary of state Richard Murphy, who regretted that President George W. Bush and Secretary of State Colin Powell did not insist on Israeli restraint in responding to the bloody attacks, and criticized Israel Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's formula of "seven days without any violence" as an invitation to fanatics to undertake other murderous actions. We believe Israel should end the occupation.

The Palestinian Authority (PA) has declared a state of emergency and begun to round up suspected members of the two terrorist groups. It banned the carrying of weapons, except for police and security forces, and public demonstrations without permits. Swift action has to be taken to apprehend the organizers of the heinous acts.

But the PA's ability to rein in prospective terrorists is hampered by Palestinian aspirations to statehood and Israel's denial of UN resolutions. These factors have strengthened the violent extremist elements in Palestinian society. Their influence has grown since the outbreak of the second intifadah 14 months ago. Clearly, they have not curbed terrorist violence, but rather have led to its unprecedented expansion. Only an immediate unconditional return to the bargaining table, with simultaneous moves by both parties to curb violence and repressive acts, can relaunch the tortuous road to peace and co-existence between Israelis and Palestinians, each with a state of their own.

'We get attacked, we hurt, then we go back to living'

By RABBI J. BENJAMIN FRIEDBERG

The year was 1943. The place, the ghetto of Vilna. It was springtime, and a small group of Yiddish writers got together to see who had written what in honour of spring – the renewal of life. What a bizarre scene! In the middle of this Nazi hell – most of the Jews of Vilna had already been killed – a few surviving writers got together, probably in some hidden hole, to discuss "writing for spring," no less.

After most of the writers had read their literary creations, the leader of the group turned to the youngest – Hirsch Glick, 23 years old – and said, "Hirsch, have you written anything?" "Yes, I have," he said. "Read it, Hirsch," said the leader. And so Hirsch Glick began to read, Sog nit keinmol az du gehst dem letsten veg ("Never say you're going on your last journey").

He was inspired by news of the Warsaw Ghetto revolt, which had filtered through to Vilna. Hirsch Glick's poem became The Jewish Partisan Song; his life ended in 1944. He was 24 years old.

Hirsch Glick, like his colleagues, like millions of other Jews, was caught in a problem that had no solution. The best he could do was something positive within that insoluble problem. The best he could do was to make the best of it.

In today's world, we have been brainwashed by everything around us to believe that every problem has a solution. The reality is that there are some problems that do not have solutions, and yet one must function within them.

The Palestinian-Israeli conflict, or more accurately, the Arab-Israeli conflict, has no solution and we must live with it. The reason is simple. They don't want us there. Period! And we don't intend to leave. Period! It's an old struggle, sometimes more intense like now, sometimes less intense. Where's the surprise?

There are any number of reasons why the Arabs cannot tolerate a Jewish state. An inherent principle in Islam is to conquer the world for Islam. Indeed, many Muslims now feel that they have the strength to do so and they mean to do it, as was made evident by the terrible terrorist atrocity on Sept. 11. Not every Muslim, of course, perhaps not even a majority believe in this Islamic goal. But there are enough Muslims for whom the Muslim principle of a war until the whole world is Muslim, resonates, especially today. U.S. President George W. Bush says correctly that America is not at war with Islam. But it is also true that Islam is at war with America, or if you will, with the non-Muslim world, especially the West, of which America is the epitome. Such a faith cannot tolerate a Jewish state.

Another of Islam's principles is that once a piece of land is ruled by Muslims, and then conquered by non-Muslims, Muslims may not rest until they have retaken that land. For hundreds of years, there have been discussions among Muslim thinkers about retaking Spain because it had once been ruled by Muslims. How much more so Jewish Israel, which is right in the middle of the Arab world, with its dangerous ideas of democracy and rule of law. Worse, it is a sovereign country ruled by the despised Jews. It's humiliating enough to be defeated by the strong Christian nations. But imagine the humiliation, to be defeated by the cowardly, conniving, untrustworthy Jews, as the Koran describes them. The Arabs believe fully that our stay in Israel is temporary. They will get rid of us, kill us, drive us out, or both. Is it possible? Of course! Whoever has the stronger will, will keep the land. Whoever loves the land more, will have it.

Jewish history from day one is a history of no solutions. We were always a minority, our monotheistic religion was a tiny minority. We had to struggle to keep it alive. We were scourged, humiliated, tortured, massacred, driven from one country to another. That's our history. No solution.

Yet Jewish tradition does in fact supply a solution. There is a wonderful midrash on the Akedah story. You remember how in the story God tests Abraham and tells him to sacrifice his son Isaac on Mount Moriah. Abraham obeys God, brings Isaac to the appointed place, and just as he is about to slaughter his son with the knife poised above him, God calls out to Abraham from heaven telling him to stop. Abraham looks around. The Bible tells us, "He saw a ram caught by its horns in a bush and Abraham sacrificed that ram in Isaac's place."

The Midrash comments on this verse and tells us that Abraham had been observing that ram all day. He saw it struggle and free itself from the bush, but then it got caught in another bush by its horns, freed itself, and was caught again, and so it happened any number of times. Said God to Abraham, "So your descendents shall be ensnared by the various kingdoms, Media, Greece, Rome, etc. Said Abraham to God, "Will it be so forever?" And God answered, "Ultimately they will be redeemed by the horn of the ram," that is, they will be redeemed by the sound of the shofar announcing the Mashiach – the Messiah. According to our tradition, that ram's horn will announce the Mashiach.

How is it, indeed, that of all the ancient peoples, it was the Jews who came up with the idea of the Messiah? It is no doubt that they felt that in the ordinary course of human events they could not solve their problem. The solution had to be supernatural, beyond the normal. This Jewish attitude goes back a long time. In the book of Isaiah, Chapter 11, the prophet speaks of a future ruler, a Mashiach if you will, who will be filled with the spirit of the Lord, "the spirit of wisdom and understanding and might. He [the Mashiach] will not judge by what his eyes see nor will he decide by what his ears hear." That is, he will not use the ordinary sensory tools of knowledge – his eyes and ears – because they're imperfect. In judging, he will use the "spirit of the Lord": perfection, absolute justice. But for that you have to wait for the Mashiach. In the ordinary course of events, by ordinary human means, there is no real solution, because the whole world is imperfect, the whole world has insoluble problems, and Jews especially so. Our tradition understood that.

Yet over the centuries, within the "no-solution" framework, we built and created a wonderful civilization, unequalled perhaps by any other. Wherever we went we built as though we would be there forever: institutions, large synagogues, schools, printing presses. We had our poets and scholars and philosophers. Intellectually and spiritually we fertilized the world. We built for forever until we had to leave and build again for "forever." It has been asked why we build such large synagogues and institutions when we know that it is all temporary. We do so because we want to create permanence within our "temporariness" so that we can live and create to the full and do our best. Wherever we went we built a Jerusalem.

So it must also be in Israel. Theodor Herzl wanted us to be a "normal" nation, by which he meant that there would no longer be a "Jewish problem," that is, there would no longer be anti-Semitism. A Jewish state would cure that. A Jewish state would make us a normal people.

Well, we have a state, but we are not a "normal" state. Most of the world would like to see us gone. Just look at the outpouring of Nazi-like Jew hatred in Durban, South Africa during the recent anti-racism conference. The Arabs certainly would like to see us disappear. They would destroy us if they could.

In a way I'm glad we're not "normal." What normal people could have done what we did under such circumstances? What normal country could have done what Israel did in 53 years? Many Jews ask, "So what's going to be?" That's a question we mustn't ask. It's a "treif" question. What's going to be? We carry on.

Israel must live its life, it must do its political maneuvering, it must exercise its physical strength, and thank God, there is now a place of Jewish power, which is one of the great differences between the present and the past 2,000 years. Israel must build its economy, its ecology, its educational institutions, its moral fibre, its links with other Jews. Israel must live well and positively.

We, too, in the Diaspora have to accept the reality that there is no solution to the conflict for the foreseeable future, and let that not interfere with our relations with Israel. A few shots here and a few shots there and many Diaspora Jews stop going to Israel. Is that dignified, is that nice for Jews to behave that way? The Jews of the Diaspora have not covered themselves with glory in the present situation. Shame on us! Jews should be lining up at the doors of El Al or other airlines to go to Israel. Where is our pride, where is our dignity?

In the early days of Jewish settlement in Eretz Yisrael, many chalutzim who were draining swamps came down with malaria. A reporter from a New York Yiddish newspaper asked one of them, "What do you do when you have an attack of malaria?" And he answered ,"I go into my room, I do my [malarial] shaking, and I go back to work." So it is with us, so it is with Israelis. We get attacked, we get hurt, we shake, and then we go back to living.

Rabbi Friedberg is the rabbi emeritus of Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Moderate Muslims must speak out

In a recent article published in The Jewish Week, Rabbi Ammiel Hirsch, the representative of North America's Reform Jewish community for issues pertaining to Israel and Zionism, wrote:

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

"Interfaith services, particularly in times of crisis, are powerful demonstrations of unity and common humanity. But we will not win the war on terrorism if we limit ourselves to these expressions alone. We must call for and expect courage and determination from moderate religious and communal leaders against extremists in their own communities.

"With all due respect to [U.S.] President [George W.] Bush's effort to emphasize that Islam means peace and tolerance, Muslims will not glean their understanding about Islam from the president. They are more likely to be influenced by their own religious leaders. These leaders cannot remain silent. This is their day. History has subpoenaed them now. The good people must finally drown out the radicals.

"It is essential that terrorism in all forms be condemned; therefore, terrorism against Israelis is as unacceptable as any other kind. We cannot be against bin Laden if we are not also against Hamas, Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and, increasingly, the PLO."

Terrorism, says Rabbi Hirsch, is an infectious disease which cannot be contained in one area of the globe. Formerly, perhaps, we could ignore hatred and intolerance in faraway lands. But we cannot do so any longer, for today's intolerance all too often leads to mass destruction.

Rabbi Hirsch further says: "You cannot tolerate suicide bombings against Jews in the West Bank and expect the Jews of Tel Aviv not to be harmed. You cannot tolerate suicide bombings against the Jews of Tel Aviv and expect people outside the Middle East not to be harmed. Suicide bombings and other forms of terrorism against Israelis radicalized and emboldened other fanatics and cowed the moderates. Terrorism against Israelis conditioned the world to violence, suicide and death. Terrorism against Israelis legitimized terrorism as a means to fight western values worldwide."

Anti-Semites have a habit of blaming Jews for most evils in the world. I wonder whether they will blame us also for being victims of intolerance. It would not be the first time that the victim, and not the aggressor, is deemed to be the guilty party.

We desperately need to hear from Canadians that religion can be a positive force for peace and tranquility and not the reason for bloodshed. Extremists often shout the loudest, but that does not make them right.

Moderate Muslims must rise to the challenge. If they do not, God help us!

Solidarity with Israel - More is Better

Sometimes, in smaller Jewish communities, it's not easy to engage the considerable, yet cautious spirit that lives within the people in the region. There will be times when the leaders of a community will reach out and seek support for a program or cause, but the community doesn't respond the way the leaders might have wanted.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

This was not the case with a recent speaker in Halifax.

Last week, the Atlantic Jewish Council and the Canada-Israel Committee jointly sponsored a lecture by Prof. Gerald Steinberg, director of the Middle East management and negotiation program at Israel's Bar-Ilan University. He spoke to the community on terrorism and the prospect for peace in the Middle East.

Steinberg enlightened us on many of the issues and shared his views. What was so refreshing was that Steinberg was able to separate the facts about the situation in Israel from his personal opinions.

As well, for the first time in awhile, there was a strong student turnout – about half the listeners were university students – and not just from the "other side." The Jews in attendance included some who were still energized from the General Assembly in Washington and some who had never really been active in the campus Jewish community.

Steinberg spent much of his lecture explaining why the Oslo peace process failed, emphasizing that one of the key reasons was a lack of desire for peace on the Palestinian side.

What impressed me about Steinberg was how he spoke and how he handled those who opposed his views. He remained diplomatic, respectful and dignified, unlike some of the pro-Palestinian audience members.

Beyond what he intended to actually say, Steinberg taught us a few things that night about how to deal with anti-Israel propagandists. During his talk, a well-known and radical critic of Israel in the audience essentially tried to take control of the lecture. But instead of addressing the substance of what this person was saying (which was, by the way, pure propaganda), Steinberg listened patiently until the person began talking in circles and then interrupted with the following words (or something similar): "This is exactly what I have been talking about!"

For the past year or so, whenever I have engaged in debates with critics of Israel, I have allowed myself to respond to many comments that contain obvious falsehoods. I have let myself "step onto their turf" by responding with information I have learned in my history and political science classes. But the reality is that by answering back with facts, I am simply admitting that there is a slight possibility that what these people are saying constitutes a viable opinion. Steinberg – who was not out to humiliate anyone, but simply to prove a point – gave one simple answer that made this individual sit down and caused most in the room to cheer.

Many of us in attendance that night had never felt so empowered as Jews as when Steinberg stood up for Israel. That simple and brief statement strengthened my own views and reinforced my support for the Jewish state.

Last year, I attended a rally for Middle East peace organized by the same critic of Israel who stood up and tried to take on Steinberg. After that rally, I reported about student apathy and the anti-Israel rhetoric on campus. It was a difficult column, one I felt guilty about even having to write.

But over the last few months, perhaps because of the increased targeting of Israeli youths by Palestinian suicide bombers, Halifax-area Jewish students have truly come together to show their solidarity for Israel. Hopefully, the next time we have a program like the one that featured Steinberg, we will get an even larger crowd.

We all grieve at the senseless murder of 25 innocent young Israelis in terror attacks in Haifa and Jerusalem on Dec. 1 and Dec. 2. U.S. President George W. Bush has declared that harbouring terrorism, anywhere in the world, is an act that will not go unpunished. Israel needs the support of its key ally, now more than ever. Let's hope Bush will honour his word.

The world of exams

Winter break is nearly upon us. Soon students will be able to be free of exam stress, breathe a satisfying sigh of relief and enjoy the soothing calm of relaxation. But until then we students need to commit to the gruelling, painstaking task of studying.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

Studying for exams is probably one of the worst possible things that I could think of doing. I loathe it. I would rather do just about anything else than study. Sitting for hours, at school or at home, staring at a daunting 600-page book, trying to pack strings of words and ideas into your brain, is not something that would appeal to most people. Somehow, though, students face that challenge, and we manage to pull it off, even though it seems the end will never be near.

One of the biggest problems with studying is procrastination. (How many times have you said that word during exam time?) It is quite amazing how easy it is to get sidetracked. For example, if you happen to choose the always popular "study-during-the-commercials" method, it is easy to find yourself thinking about how the mutual fund ad you just watched was as interesting as most Oscar-winning movies. OK, maybe that's not the best example, because you are probably procrastinating just by sitting in front of the TV.

And what about that friend who doesn't have a heavy exam schedule and wants to go out? How many exam-time conversations have you had that start like this? A friend says "Let's go to a movie tonight." In a less than convincing tone, you reply, "No, I really have to study." Your friend counters with "Oh, come on, you've been studying all day. What's a couple hours going to do anyway?" You then think for a moment, and, with a defeated look on your face, you say, "Fine, but then I'm coming home and studying till 4 a.m." (Of course, you come home, check your e-mail and then fall asleep with the books beside you.)

Ah, exam time. It is such a different time than the rest of the year. You may literally not see daylight for a couple of weeks. You will also see a minimal number of friends and you definitely won't see any family.

If you go to school, you'll get there before the sun goes up to get your "study spot" and you don't dare think of returning home until at least midnight (or if it's the night before an exam, then don't expect to be home at all). As soon as exams end, you actually need about an hour just to re-adjust to sunlight.

As many of you know, exams come in many shapes and sizes. There is the standard multiple-choice exam, the short answer/long answer exam and, my favourite, the open-book exam.

I have taken my fair share of all of these and I can say that I hate multiple choice, but I don't mind the latter two.

Multiple choice is one of the most deceptive tests a professor can give. It looks easy – after all, you have the answer right in front of you – but all the other answers are so close to being right that you tear out your hair trying to figure out which one is the "best possible answer." Needless to say, I have had several epic battles with the multiple-choice exam.

One of my favourite exam stories is the urban legend in which there is only one question on a final exam: "Why?" While the others work diligently, trying to answer the all-encompassing question, one savvy student writes, "Why not?" and gets full marks. (I swear this happened to my cousin.)

Soon, although it doesn't seem soon enough, all this worrying and cramming will be over. Then come the post-exam parties, seeing all those movies you are missing, the festivities on New Year's Eve, the bliss of sleeping in, the first day of school and then… that's right, all that stress strikes back before you know it.

I can't wait until summer…

A cornucopia of books...

Books, like movies, are like all-terrain vehicles, transporting you to places far and near, familiar and different, to destinations that otherwise would be inaccessible. In this spirit, publishers have been busy churning out an eclectic selection for all tastes. Enjoy the ride.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Derek Penslar, a professor of Jewish history at the University of Toronto, has written an important volume in Shylock's Children: Economics and Jewish Identity in Modern Europe (University of California Press). In a tour de force of erudition, he produces a work that clarifies and expands our understanding of seminal economic, political and social forces in a changing world.

The Jewish Political Tradition (Yale University Press) is the first of a four-volume series that explores, in considerable depth, Jewish philosophy from biblical times to the present. The essays are by scholars from different fields.

In Jazz Age Jews (Princeton University), Michael Alexander investigates a paradox in the psychology of American Jews. Although they penetrated and attained success in mainstream society, they never quite shed their "outsider" status. By examining the lives and careers of jurist Felix Frankfurter, mobster Arnold Rothstein and entertainer Al Jolson, who helped define the 1920s, he contributes a lively interpretation of U.S. Jewish history.

Abraham Lincoln Polonsky, a prominent American film director and screenwriter, was blacklisted by the McCarthyist purges and banished from Hollywood. In A Very Dangerous Citizen (University of California Press), Paul Buhle and Dave Wagner skilfully examine his life as they study the relationship between art and politics and anti-communism and anti-Semitism in 1940s America.

Tel Aviv University political scientist Abraham Ben-Zvi, in Decades of Transition: Eisenhower, Kennedy and the Origins of the American-Israeli Alliance (Columbia University Press), refutes a long-held theory. He claims that Dwight Eisenhower, rather than John F. Kennedy, forged Washington's pro-Israel policy, not for domestic but for strategic reasons.

Tom Segev, one of Israel's best revisionist historians, gauges the impact of the Holocaust on Israel's politics, ideology and identity in the paperback edition of The Seventh Million (Fitzhenry & Whiteside).

In another paperback book, Raquela: A Woman of Israel (Random House), seasoned foreign correspondent Ruth Gruber profiles Raquela Prywes, a courageous and determined ninth-generation Israeli who was a battlefield nurse and founder of Beersheva's first hospital.

Rabbi David Hartman, an eloquent spokesman of religious pluralism in Israel, grapples with this charged topic in Israelis and the Jewish Tradition (Yale University Press). Far from just analyzing the tensions dividing secular and religious Jews, he shows how bridges of understanding can be built between these diverse communities.

What does it mean to be Jewish in the 21st century? Ari Goldman, a former reporter for The New York Times and now a lecturer at the Columbia School of Journalism, thoughtfully ponders this question in Being Jewish: The Spiritual and Cultural Practice of Judaism Today (Simon & Schuster).

In The Jewish Cultural Tapestry (Oxford University Press), Steven Lowenstein illuminates Jewish folkways on five continents. He sheds light on Jewish languages, names, religious practice, cuisine, costumes, music, appearance and ancestry and modernity and tradition. A perceptive work.

Long rooted in religious and cultural values, as well as in medical science, circumcision remains a somewhat contentious procedure outside Jewish and Muslim circles. David Gollaher, in Circumcision: A History of the World's Most Controversial Surgery (HarperCollins), tells the story of a ritual whose effects on health and sexual function are still much debated.

The flight of the Israelites from slavery in Egypt, as told in Exodus, is the subject of Avivh Gottlieb Zornberg's The Particulars of Rapture (Doubleday). Mixing midrashic sources with literary allusions and psychological insights, she leaves us with an original interpretation of biblical and rabbinic traditions.

Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, a renowned Talmudist, has written a formidable primer in A Guide To Jewish Prayer (Random House). It contains a useful glossary and bibliography.

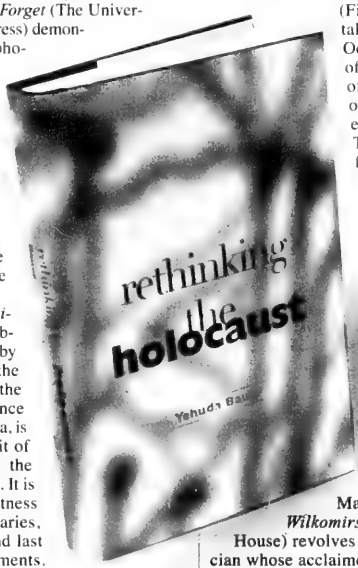
Web of Life: Folklore and Midrash in Rabbinic Literature (Stanford University Press), by Galit Hasan-Rokem, focuses on Jewish culture during the Mishnah period in Palestine through the prism of a sublime text, Lamentations Rabbah.

Menstrual Purity: Rabbinic and Christian Reconstructions of Biblical Gender (Stanford University Press), by Charlotte Elissheva Fonrobert, offers a new take on this subject and on related topics such as female physiology and anatomy. A revealing companion volume, Jewish Marriage in Antiquity (Princeton University Press), by Michael Satlow, places it in a cultural milieu stretching from 500 BCE to 614 CE. He argues that different Jewish communities, having been influenced by non-Jewish neighbours, constructed their own Jewish marriage rituals.

Is the Bible an abstraction or based on facts? Ask Bruce Feiler. In a fascinating book, Walking the Bible: A Journey By Land Through the Five Books of Moses (HarperCollins), he embarks on a perilous journey through five countries in search of the Bible's roots.

Practical reference books are always useful and helpful. How To Be A Jewish Parent (Random House), by Anita Diamant, is a road-map to raising joyful children within Judaism. What to Do When You're Dating a Jew (Random House), by Vikki Weiss and Jennider Block, is a witty and informative handbook designed for non-Jews whose object of affection is Jewish. The JPSS Dictionary of Jewish Words (Jewish Publication Society), by Joyce Eisenberg and Ellen Scolnic, bristles with over 1,000 entries about Jewish holidays, life-cycle events, culture, history and worship.

From the standpoint of scholarship, the Holocaust has become a cottage industry. The latest books: Yehuda Bauer's Rethinking the Holocaust (Yale University Press) offers a reappraisal of fundamental issues. Randolph Brahm's The Nazis' Last Victims: The Holocaust in Hungary (Wayne State University Press), based on a 1994 conference on the deportation of Hungarian Jewry, scrutinizes the experiences of victims, perpetrators, collaborators, rescuers, resisters and bystanders. Harold Marcuse's Legacies of Dachau: The Uses and Abuses of a Concentration Camp, 1933-2001 (Cambridge University Press) examines the shoah through the continuum of Western and German history. Barbie Zelizer's Remembering to Forget (The University of Chicago Press) demonstrates how the photographs depicting the liberation of concentration camps became the basis of Holocaust memory.



Holocaust memoirs are still rolling off the presses. The newest ones:

Scrolls of Testimony (Jewish Publication Society), by Abba Kovner, the commander of the Jewish resistance movement in Vilna, is a moving portrait of Jews living in the shadows of death. It is based on eyewitness accounts, diaries, poems, songs and last wills and testaments.

Wartime Experiences in Lithuania (Valenine Mitchell) is the inspirational story of Rivka Lozansky Bogomolnaya, a Jewish woman who escaped from a ghetto and somehow survived. The translation is by Torontonian Miriam Beckerman. The Miracle Visa (Gefen) turns on the flight of a Jewish family from Lithuania to Japan after receiving a transit visa from the legendary Japanese diplomat Sempo Sugihara. The author, Yukata Taniuchi, is Japanese. Rich Cohen's The Avengers (Random House), now available in paperback, profiles Jewish partisans during the Holocaust.

Speak You Also (Fitzhenry & Whiteside) and Leap to Life (ArdorScribendi) are poignant and gripping memoirs by Paul Steinberg and Joseph Rebhun of survival in Auschwitz and the forests of Poland. The Nazi Officer's Wife (HarperCollins), by Edith Hahn Beer, is the incredible tale of an Austrian Jewish woman who emerged from a ghetto and a labour camp, married a Nazi party member and survived by the skin of her teeth. An Unbroken Chain (Fitzhenry & Whiteside) takes the writer, Henry Oertelt, from the streets of Berlin and the horrors of persecution in Nazi-occupied Europe to liberation by the U.S. Third Army and freedom in America.

In My Hands (Random House) is about a brave Polish resister, Irene Gut Opdyke, who saves Jews in Nazi-occupied Poland. Resisting Hitler (Oxford University Press), by Shareen Blair Brysac, turns on Mildred Harnack, an American woman in Nazi Germany who helped German Jews and political dissidents. Stefan Maechler's The Wilkomirski Affair (Random House) revolves around a Swiss musician whose acclaimed Holocaust memoir, Fragments, was exposed as a hoax.

Two reference books worth buying, both published by Oxford University Press: The Oxford Companion to United States History, edited by Paul Boyer, is a superb compendium packed with golden nuggets of data in the form of succinct essays. Good Fiction Guide, edited by Jane Rogers, brims with informative essays and entries on more than 1,000 writers ranging from James Agee to Richard

Turning rogues into role models

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

Well over a century after the fact, there can be little pain in admitting that a distant cousin of mine, born to wealth and social status, was the subject of a spectacular bankruptcy proceeding in London, England in the 1860s.

An account of his failed business affairs appeared in the London Times. I suspect the report must have horrified his family, for it amplified the man's ruin; but I confess that I was fascinated to read it. I have no later intelligence regarding the fate of my relative, but I hope he ended up on the positive side of the ledger.

Such a newspaper account might serve to corroborate the existence of someone who would otherwise have vanished into the fabric of time; for that reason it usually makes a welcome addition to a family history. Criminal court records, stories from the Police Gazette, even "wanted" posters, may likewise increase our knowledge of a relative who did not always walk on the sunny side of the street.

Many people avoid genealogy because they imagine they will find horse thieves, rogues and jailbirds perched in the leafy bowers of their family trees. Genealogists sometimes joke about creative ways to bowdlerize the truth when an uncommon villain appears in a family history that has been lovingly prepared for tender darling children and grandchildren.

What is there to say about a great uncle who was executed in the electric chair? Many genealogists would agree that a bit of tact is required; some would go further and call for the spin-doctors.

"Great Uncle Hymie," they would write, "occupied a chair of applied electronics at an important government institution. He was attached to his position by the strongest of ties, and his death came as a great shock."

The following advice, on How to Be Creative with Troublesome Kin, recently circulated on the Internet. It referred to a great great uncle, whom we shall call Solomon Starr.

Convicted of stealing horses, Solomon Starr was sent to penitentiary in Edmonton in 1885, but escaped in 1887. While at large, he robbed the Canadian Pacific Railway six times. Apprehended by a team of Pinkerton detectives, he was convicted of train robbery and hanged in 1889.

The tale puts a fairly ugly blot on the family escutcheon, does it not? But according to the Internet source, our great great uncle's story can easily be embellished and made respectable, as follows:

"Solomon Starr was a famous cowboy in the territories of the great Canadian North West. His business empire grew to include acquisition of valuable equestrian assets and he had intimate dealings with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

"Beginning in 1885, he devoted several years to service at a government facility, finally taking leave to resume his dealings with the railroad. In 1887, he was a key player in a vital investigation run by the renowned Pinkerton Detective Agency.

"In 1889, Uncle Solomon passed away during an important civic function held in his honor when the platform upon which he was standing collapsed."

In all seriousness, the truth, judiciously doled out in little or large amounts, is usually the best policy.

Seeking survivor stories: The Toronto-based Shtetl Foundation of Canada is seeking Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union to provide personal testimonies from pre-World War II until their immigration to North America.

The personal testimonies will be used for the Shtetl Museum, located in Rishon Le-Zion, Israel, which is building a full-sized replica of a shtetl as a model of east European life and history. For details, phone Pnina Zilberman, 416-616-5195.

Roosevelt and the spies

Roosevelt's Secret War: FDR and World War II Espionage*, by Joseph E. Persico Random House, 2001

Books
Bernard Baskin

The author of this continually absorbing and informative book is convinced that the disaster at Pearl Harbor "was the most stunning failure of intelligence in American history, likely in the history of warfare" (This evaluation, of course, was made before the calamity of Sept. 11). The blow by the Japanese navy was devastating. The backbone of the American fleet in the Pacific – 18 ships, including four battleships and more than 2,000 men – were destroyed in less than a day.

Did president Franklin Roosevelt have prior knowledge of the impending attack? There is a chain of evidence that indicates he withheld vital evidence. Certainly, he was eager to bring the United States into the war with Germany, despite the majority of Americans who favoured neutrality. A poll taken just 1½ months before the attack revealed only 17 percent of Americans favoured war with Germany. Roosevelt would have been hard-pressed to push a declaration of war against an enemy in Europe through the U.S. Congress when the country had just been plunged into war in the Pacific.

The author insists that all revisionist claims are incorrect, all conspiracy theories without foundation. He writes, "There is no evidence whatever that Roosevelt wanted a war in the Pacific. What he wanted was the United States to enter the war in Europe – a war with Japan would have been a monumental distraction."

Joseph Persico is a seasoned historian and Roosevelt's Secret War is concerned with the president's involvement in World War II espionage in all its many forms. He is an unfailing admirer of Roosevelt and is sure that the president's acute and unfailing interest in intelligence shaped the war's decisions and helped to frame the peace that followed.

Among the major advantages that helped the Allies to victory was "Magic," the American ability to read Japanese cables. These included the revealing messages the Japanese ambassador to Berlin sent home with much valuable and secret information. Another was the British ability to read German military communications enciphered with the Enigma machine, code-named Ultra. "These two achievements constituted the great intelligence triumph of the Allies during the war."

Persico estimates that Soviet agents managed to acquire some 10,000 pages of technical data related to the Manhattan Project. This stolen treasure enabled Stalin's scientists to save up to four years in developing their own atom bomb. The first nuclear weapon the Soviets exploded was a virtual twin of the U.S. one detonated at Alamogordo.

Could the president have done more to save Jews seeking refuge in the United States or bomb train rails leading to death camps? The author reminds readers that Roosevelt remained foremost a politician who dared not get too far ahead of his constituents. Barely out of the Depression, still haunted by unemployment, most Americans were not eager to open the floodgates to job competition from immigrants, including oppressed Jews.

As to bombing rail lines, this simple solution, argues Persico, ignores certain realities. "Throughout the war, the Germans were to display a dismaying swiftness in restoring rail lines just hours after a bombing. And when lines were ruptured, the Jews and other Nazi victims were marched to their deaths."

On December 8, 1942, Roosevelt finally and publicly condemned the Nazi extermination of the Jews and declared America's policy – those perpetuating mass murder would be dealt with as criminals when the fighting ended. In the meantime, Roosevelt's principal response to ending the mass murder of the Jews was to win the war.

This well-researched book (it has over 75 pages of source notes), written on a broad canvas, seems to cover every important intelligence operation of the war, as well as the personalities most closely involved. It is popular in style and of unfailing interest.

Dreidels and the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Whether you call it a dreidel or a sevivon, Chanukah's special four-sided top never fails to instil lovely memories in children and bring back delightful ones in the not-so-young. That's why it's no surprise that there are so many wonderful pages devoted to dreidels on the World Wide Web. Today, the best ones.

How did the dreidel become associated with the holiday of Chanukah? The World Zionist Organization site mentions one explanation. "One anecdote recalls the dreidel from the times when the Syrians prohibited the Jews from studying Torah. When the Syrians saw a group of Jews together, they checked to see that they were not studying. The Jews would hide their books and take out their dreidels and trick the Syrians into thinking they were just playing a game" [http://www.wzo.org.il/en/resources/view.asp?id=47].

In her article, Poker, Dreidel and Hannukah, Robin Treistman explains why Judaism, which normally frowns on gambling, actually promotes a child-sized version of it at this time of year [http://www.wzo.org.il/en/resources/view.asp?id=499]. And you'll find more history, plus rules for the game at the ForEveryJew Web site [http://www.foreveryjew.com/chanukah.html].

You can buy dreidels in practically any shape and material, but you can also make your own paper dreidel. Just print out the pattern, colour it, cut it out, assemble it and spin away [http://www.holidays.net/chanukah/pattern.html].

If truth be told, these paper dreidels aren't the best spinners. So Rita Milos Brownstein has some great suggestions about what you can do with them: string them like paper lanterns on yarn or ribbon, use them as place cards at your Chanukah latke party or just fill them with candy [http://www.jewish.com/chanukah/paper.shtml].

Nothing can replace the visceral thrill of spinning your own dreidel. But since everything seems to have gone hi-tech these days, you can try your luck on your computer with some virtual dreidels. Choose from the TorahTots version [http://torahtots.com/holidays/chanuka/dreidel.html], the one at Judaism 101 [http://www.jewfaq.org/dreidel/] or the ShockDreidel Game [http://www.dnai.com/%7Edunda/SW/ShockDreidel.html].

You can also download the more sophisticated dreidel game (for Windows and Macintosh.) Since this is shareware, you are expected to pay for this game if you enjoy it and decide to keep it [http://www.dnai.com/%7Edunda/products.html].

I found another online game that should please dreidel lovers. The Dreidel Slide Puzzle challenges you to unscramble the pieces to make a picture of a dreidel [http://www.primarygames.com/holidays/hanukkah/sliders/start.htm].

Although the classic Chanukah foods are latkes and the jelly-filled soufganiot (donuts), there's no reason you can't indulge your passion for dreidels. The Jewish Community Centre Web site has recipes for classic Dreidel Cookies along with ideas for Dreidel Toast and Fruity Dreidels that make good use of strawberries, bananas and canned pears [http://www.jcca.org/thisnewmonth/kislevdreidelcookies.htm].

For almost a century, the American Lung Association has run the Christmas Seals campaign to promote lung health. In 1998, the association launched a Chanukah Seals campaign. You can take a look at the stamps with their dreidel and menorah designs and print them out. And it's still not too late to e-mail them as free electronic postcards [http://www.chanukahseals.org/send_00.html].

What would Chanukah be without the music – and two of the holiday's sweetest tunes, which pay homage to the little toy? First, sing along to Sevivon, Sov, Sov, Sov with both Hebrew and English lyrics [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/chanukah/chantunes2.htm]. And then try all three verses of I Have a Little Dreidel [http://www.rainmall.com/hanukkah/hanusong.htm].

Oh, and if you've never had a little dreidel (and made it out of clay), it's never too late! Just follow the instructions, make your Little Dreidel and have a wonderful holiday [http://www.chadiscrafts.com/fun/chanukah.html].

A letter to the Palestinians

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

After World War II, when the United Nations allowed us Jews to have a national homeland in ancestral Israel, the plan was for both our nations – Palestinians and Jews – to live side by side. Under the partition plan, Jews would have their country and the Palestinians would have theirs.

This notion that the Jews were going to have a country caused the Arab world to unilaterally declare war on Israel.

It was you who started the war, it was you who lost the war and it is you who continue the war today by attacking us. You were defeated every time wars were fought against us, and yet you persisted with more wars and faced more defeats. Since our birth, Israel has been in a constant state of war.

Imagine if you had accepted the idea of sharing this land! Would you too have built modern cities, hospitals and universities? Would you have turned a desert into lush fields and forests instead of languishing in camps of squalor and deprivation?

Throughout our history, we Jews have been oppressed and occupied many times. We have never occupied other people. Certainly we have no wish to occupy you. And so in spite of all your wars and all your terror we have always held out the hope that peaceful coexistence can be achieved.

You remember Madrid; there was Oslo, there was Camp David, and certainly, you can't forget the White House lawn. We offered you land, a country, independence and autonomy. We even offered to share our beloved Jerusalem with you as a capital. Yet even this, you refused.

Is your vision of Israel exclusively one of a Palestinian state? Do you really think we will give you the whole country? Should we even share with you at this time a small part of a state, as your snipers insist on killing our citizens while they drive the roads and your suicide bombers blow themselves up, killing our youth out on a stroll?

A hypocritical and cynical world that has always preached restraint, finally understands Israel. It says, defend yourself and root out terror.

Now we strike at you. We do not, however, cheer from our rooftops as you did when the Scuds were coming down on us. We do not sing and dance on the streets as you did when the Twin Towers collapsed, killing thousands of civilians. Instead, the images of panic on your street that we see, distress us.

When our forefather Jacob met Esau in battle, he declared he was "very afraid and distressed." Afraid to be killed, distressed to be forced to kill. Similarly, while we have no wish to be the aggressors, at the same time we will not allow you to kill, maim and terrorize our people. Our forays into your areas are not retaliatory; this is not tit for tat. We are simply and reluctantly saying, enough!

Still, as Jews we will continue to long for peace. We will not despair and never, ever give up. We will await the time when you will recognize the futility of aggression and terror. The day will come, please God, when you and your leaders will be wise enough and courageous enough to end the battle, stop killing and build life.

Missionaries launch new conversion offensive

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews for Judaism, the counter-missionary group, is warning of an aggressive new campaign to recruit Jews to Christianity, best seen in an upcoming conference by Chosen People Ministries (CPM).

CPM, a Jews for Jesus-type group with an office on Sheppard Avenue West, has been putting up posters and distributing invitations to "an open forum discussion on a unique approach to Jewish spirituality," scheduled to take this place this Sunday at the Barbara Frum Library on Covington Road near Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue.

Posters touting the program are titled "Jewish...Chosen...And? Finding our Our Way in Uncertain Times." Two sessions are advertised, one called "Really, IS there a God?" and the other, "More than chicken soup – is there something special about Jewish spirituality?"

Jews for Judaism says the material is deceptive because it does not mention Jesus or Christianity.

"It looks very spiritual. It looks like a Jewish program," warns Rabbi Michael Skobac, director of education at Jews for Judaism.

He says the CPM effort is "very much in your face. It's in the heart of the Bathurst-Lawrence neighbourhood and very proactive."

Jews for Judaism says it's all part of an aggressive new worldwide campaign by CPM, dubbed "To the Jew First in the New Millennium," designed to lure Jews to evangelical Christianity.

"They're launching a new form of outreach, using Judaism as a hook," says Julius Ciss, executive director of Jews for Judaism. "They're not saying 'Jesus,' but 'belief in God.' The deception is supreme. It's sneaky and underhanded."

Ciss said the posters look like those "from any Jewish outreach group."

At a CPM program at an Ajax church last month, tape recorded by Ciss, a member of the group spoke about this Sunday's program.

"We've been thinking for a while of how we can reach out to Jewish people in Toronto...I'm wondering if you perhaps have a Jewish friend, that this might be an appropriate thing to bring them to."

Regarding the session called "Really, IS there a God?" the young woman said, "That's a question that Jewish people today need to deal with, especially Jewish people my age. [Jews] have lost hope or sense that they really have something real to the idea that there is a God. And before they can even care if Jesus is the messiah, they need to figure out [whether] they believe in a God."

The woman said the program will explore "rabbinic Judaism versus biblical Judaism."

Jews for Judaism says those are code words used in the so-called Hebrew-Christian movement to denote, respectively, contemporary Judaism and Christianity.

Rabbi Skobac said he was approached earlier this year by a member of CPM's Toronto branch who asked whether Jews for Judaism would co-sponsor the program.

"I was incredulous," Rabbi Skobac said. "I told him he must be either very naive or very foolish."

Jews for Judaism will be at Sunday's program, handing out material and speaking to those attending, Ciss said.

CPM is currently embroiled in a legal fight over its attempt to trademark a stylized menorah as its official logo. Opposing the move are Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith. The case will be heard in Federal Court in Toronto next April.

Rabbi Skobac says CPM's main rival, Jews for Jesus, has also launched an aggressive global campaign, called Behold Your God, which also targets Jews for conversion.

Israeli political system slammed

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Paul Eidelberg believes there are fundamental flaws in the Israeli political system.

He was here recently as the 2001 Dr. Max and Gianna Glassman Israel Exchange Scholar under the auspices of the University of Toronto's Jewish Studies Program.

On a certain Web site, Eidelberg is presented as a professor who teaches at Bar Illan (sic) University.

Bar-Ilan University spokesperson David Weinberg said that Eidelberg is not a professor at Bar-Ilan and has not taught there in over 20 years.

In a lecture delivered at U of T, Eidelberg, president of the Foundation for Constitutional Democracy in Jerusalem, stated that without a constitution "the way the existing parliament is structured in Israel, politicians are more concerned with campaigning for re-election than with issues of real concern."

Furthermore, he said, since March 1992, the Supreme Court has made decisions that an executive body should make.

Eidelberg said that fundamental flaws in the system have allowed political leaders such as Yossi Beilin, Shulamit Aloni and Ehud Barak to betray their voters.

"There is no law in Israel that requires ratification of an agreement," Eidelberg said. Elected officials can sign treaties and thereby bind the Israeli public.

Pointing to Arab countries as models, Eidelberg stated that Israel should only allow "Jews to determine what goes on in their country."

He recommends a parliamentary system which would allow for an upper branch of government which would consist solely of Jews.

This upper branch of government would be able to amend or reject any laws which were passed by the lower house in order to preserve the Jewish character of the country.

Eidelberg also delivered lectures at Shaarei Shomayim and B'nai Torah synagogues.

In choosing Eidelberg as a speaker, Prof. David Novak, Shiff Chair of the Jewish Studies Program at the University of Toronto, said that it was important that Eidelberg's views be "out there" and available to the public, rather than "buried in innuendo."

Associated on Leslie Street closing

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After 17 years, the Danilack Education Centre will be closing its doors as a branch of Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto.

A letter that was sent home informed parents that the Leslie Street school was sold to the Canadian Memorial Chiropractic College.

Proceeds from the sale of the building will go into a major renovation being planned at the Hurwich Education Centre at Bathurst Street and Finch Avenue. The school plans to use the residual proceeds to ensure the future needs of the school, said Arthur Landa, Associated's executive director.

Named after Aba and Esther Danilack, who were saved from the Holocaust when Associated offered Aba a teaching job in 1939, the Leslie Street campus initially opened up because it was felt that the Jewish community was moving north and east.

"However, about eight years ago, we started to see a change in demographics," said Randy E. Speigel, director of development and public relations.

"There was a drop in our enrolment, which correlated with the vast reduction in the number of young Jewish families moving into this neighbourhood," Speigel said. "The area became geared to an older population."

Enrolment was further affected by the northbound movement of the community and by the increase in niche schools, Landa said.

Two years ago, Danilack became a middle school, focusing on grades 6, 7 and 8. Upon completion of its renovation, the Hurwich Education Centre will house the middle school.

With 2,200 children currently registered at Associated, Landa said a move to Bathurst Street will better serve this constituency.

Associated has to be responsive to the ebbs and flows in the population, Speigel said.

Educators to meet for conference

TORONTO — For the first time ever, the Solomon Schechter Day School Association will meet in Canada for its annual conference.

Over 50 educators will meet in Toronto on Dec. 16 to 18 at the United Synagogue Day School, the largest Solomon Schechter day school in North America, to study and pray together, as well as to discuss the needs they face as leaders of Schechter schools.

Some of the highlights of the event will include lectures by York University professor Alex Pomson on Ongoing Professional Learning for Ourselves and Our Staff, and How Leaders Sustain their Teachers and Students by Ontario Institute of Studies in Education (OISE) professor Andrew Hargreaves.

CLARIFICATION

In the article, "Educators meet for professional development day" (CJN, Nov. 29), a statement attributed to Sharon Dembo was unclear. It should have read that when teachers are listening to students... a minute could then be spent responding to create a bond between teacher and pupil, Dembo said.

קפריסין 2001

חרובים

חרובים קשורים אצלי לעצי בר שאפשר לקטוף מהם את הפרי היבש הזה ולכרסם בתקווה שלא לאבד סתימה או שתיים בשיניים. זה הפרי שעור לחוני המעגל ולצדיקים שכמותו להתקיים במדבר 40 שנה. ביניהן, חוץ מלטעום אני לא מאמין שגמרתי חרוב אחד בחיי. ועל כן מה רבה היתה תדהמתי לגלות שבקפריסין החרוב הוא ענף יצוא מרכזי, ומכיוון ממנו ריבות וחחליפי שוקולד ומה לא. וכך למדתי שהחרוב קשור קשר עמוק לוחב. נרעיני החרוב והים בגודלם בין אם החרוב גדול או קטן. קראט של זהב שוקל עשרים וארבעה גרעיני חרוב . "קראט" הוא חרוב ביוונית. אבל שיישאר בינינו. שלא תגידו שלא מלמדים אתכם דברים שימושיים בטור הזה.

מגן דויד והצלב האדום

ד"ר ברנאדין הילי היתה מנהלת הצלב האדום האמריקני עד להתפטרותה בעקבות אירועי ה 11 בספטמבר. מסתבר עכשיו, ממאמר שפרסם שר החוץ לשעבר האמריקני, לורנס אינלבורגר, שעם כניסתה לתפקידה לפני כשנתיים גילתה הילי שהצלב האדום האמריקני תומך בחרם רב השנים במגן דויד אדום כסמל שירותי החירום הישראליים. נגד הדיעה של מדינות אירופה ושל המועצה שלה, נלחמה הילי בתיקון העות חזה. קרב קטן, אולי לא מרכזי, אבל עוד סמל ותיק לאבטישמיות של רוב מדינות המערב, אם רק נותנים להם הזדמנות.

השפה העִברונית החדשה

אפילו שרובינו אינם מדברים אידיש, האף שחלפו ששים שנה מאז שיחותיהם גרו בעיירות קטנות בפולין, עדיין נוצרת ומתחזקת השפה העִברונית (דגש בניית). וזה הולך ככה:

שאלה: מה השעה?
תשובה באנגלית: סליחה, אני לא יודע
תשובה בהבונית: מה אני, שעון?

הערה: אני אוהב את העניבה שנתת לי ולובש אותה כל חזמן.
תשובה באנגלית: אני שמח שהיא מוצאת חן בעיניך.
תשובה בהבונית: מה חבעייה, אתה לא אוהב את שאר חדברים שקניתי לך?

שאלה: חיית רוצה לבוא לרכב איתנו?
תשובה באלגלית: רק תגיד מתי.
תשובה בהבונית: מה קרה לך, אני נראה לך כמו קאובוי?

תשובה לטלפון:
באנגלית: לא התקשרת הרבה זמן.
בהבונית: לא חשבת שאולי אני כבר בעולם הבא?

Peel bans school distribution of Gideons' Bibles

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a 7-5 vote, the board of trustees of the Peel District School Board has ended a longstanding practice of allowing Gideons International to distribute free copies of the New Testament to students.

The trustees acted on a recommendation by the board's human rights officer, Mary Anne MacArthur, who said the practice violated Ministry of Education policy guidelines as well as the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Ontario Human Rights Code.

"From a human rights perspective... the dissemination of any faith-based material constitutes indirect discrimination" and violates a court decision prohibiting the promotion of particular religions, MacArthur wrote in a report to the board.

MacArthur's report also said that Gideons International had a "captive audience" at Peel schools. "The effect on all other faith groups is that they are treated unequally in that they are disadvantaged or marginalized by an historical and biased 'custom' that inherently values one religion, Christianity, over all other religions."

Debi Sutin, the Jewish parent in Mississauga who first complained about the practice one year ago, said she was pleased with the decision but concerned that five board members voted to continue to allow the Gideons to hand out their Bibles.

"To me, it's not an issue of whether religion is good or bad. The school is not a forum for the distribution of these materials," she said.

Don Stephens, one of the trustees who voted against the ban, said he was dismayed a compromise solution could not be found to address the concerns of all religious groups in Peel. Since the vote, he said, "I've been getting calls from Christians who feel they have no place in the [school] system."

Stephens said he would have favoured a compromise in which other religious groups could have been allowed to inform students about their faith.

The decision closes the door to all faith groups and instead of "setting up a system I call secular...the schools should set a moral tone in the community and work with parents," he said.

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario wing, said Congress viewed the distribution of Bibles as violating a 1990 Ontario Court of Appeal decision banning the promotion of religion in public schools.

In a deputation to the trustees prior to their vote, he argued the board could not solve the problem by opening the door to other faith groups to distribute their materials. "Some religious groups may not have a tradition of sharing the 'good news.' Others may lack the means to do so," he said.

Congress was joined in opposing the practice by delegations from the Muslim, Asian-Christian, Hindu and Sikh communities.

A representative of Gideons International argued in favour of continuing the practice, while other supporters argued that spreading Christian scripture was a positive force in the community, Rudner recalled.

In striking down the practice, which has been in effect since at least 1984, "good judgement manifested itself in a responsible decision by the board of trustees," Rudner said.

Sutin was alerted to the practice last year when her daughter, at that time a Grade 5 student at Owenwood Public School, came home with a note for her parents. Sutin recalls that at the time, her daughter told her "they're handing out something for free, and I want one."

Sutin met with the school principal, who told her it had been board policy for many years to allow the Gideons to give Grade 5 students a permission slip for their parents, offering a free copy of the New Testament.

When she contacted the board, she was told it was reviewing the policy but that it was too late to make changes that year. In mid-October she received a call saying the trustees would discuss the issue at their November meeting.

Terrorists are not crazy, psychiatrist says

By HEATHER CHEIFETZ
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Terrorists are not crazy, Toronto psychiatrist and guest speaker Dr. Vivian Rakoff said at a recent lecture at Holy Blossom Temple. "They are quite sane – in the most ordinary sense of the word."

The World Trade Centre and Pentagon terrorist attacks were carried out by "educated, middle-to-upper class young men who coped well with the world," Rakoff said. "They were self-disciplined, smart and organized. Even rational. This is what is so bewildering about their self-destruction and their murder of almost 5,000 innocent people."

The lecture, called The Fantasy of Rebuilding a World After First Destroying it: Fanatical Hatred and Utopian Fantasies, was the second of Holy Blossom Temple's new four-part lecture series, From Durban to Destruction: The World After Sept. 11.

"We have seen the face of terrorism in our own backyard and now have to deal with the historical anticipation of recent events," he said. "The world has cruelly changed."

Rakoff cited past examples of fundamentalism and terrorism, including the French Revolution, the Spanish Inquisition and Pol Pot's reign in Cambodia, and isolated acts such as Baruch Goldstein's murder of 29 Arabs at the main mosque in Hebron. He also attempted to investigate the terrorist mindset and what motivates someone to commit such heinous, "belief-driven act[s] of destruction."

Suffering in itself, he said, is not a sufficient root cause. Neither are poverty, humiliation and colonial oppression.

"Many have suffered tragically under these circumstances and [have] not resorted to this level of furious destruction."

Instead, Rakoff believes that the motivation to "destroy for the greater good" stems from an irrational desire to live in a "perfect world."

"Most of us live with the daily knowledge that the world is imperfect," he explained. "Most often, we learn to live with ambiguity, with the lack of an absolute ethic, which only makes us a more tolerant society."

To the West, the ideal society speaks of democracy, the freedom to choose, to express your views, to live your life on your own terms. To religious fundamentalists, that very choice can be seen as a threat, Rakoff said.

"The permissiveness in western secular culture for all manner of vulgarity, silliness, sexual freedom and eccentricity can be profoundly troubling to individuals who are either threatened by the degree of freedom, or who equate choice with chaos, or who subscribe to a particular absolute vision of the truth. They find the bewildering arena of choices unbearable," he said.

"If such things are true, if you really believe in them, doesn't it make sense to give your life for them? Isn't martyrdom a rational alternative to McDonald's, sex, alcohol, movies and other evils of western society?"

"In their minds, these fundamentalists are not killing 'people,' they are killing 'representatives,'" Rakoff said. "It's a giant metaphorical struggle."

L'Arche founder Vanier receives Plaut Award

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Jean Vanier says the story of L'Arche, the worldwide network of communities for people with disabilities he founded in 1964, began in Paris after World War II.

In January 1945, Vanier was in the city to visit his father, the late Georges Vanier, then Canada's ambassador to France and later our 19th governor general. The young Vanier saw men and women arriving from Buchenwald, Bergen-Belsen and Dachau "in their white and blue uniforms.

"They were skeletons. That vision of what I saw then has remained with me – what human beings can do to other human beings and how we can hurt and kill each other," he said in a lecture at Holy Blossom Temple last week after receiving the 2001 W. Gunther Plaut Humanitarian Award.

Vanier said the experience showed him each person has inherent dignity and led him to follow the prophet Isaiah's path of peace.

But since Sept. 11 "and all that has followed, where is that peace?" he asked softly "We continue to cry out for peace."

The temple's biennial award, established in 1997 to honour Rabbi Gunther Plaut, its senior scholar, is given to an individual who has made an outstanding contribution to the community and human rights. Rabbi Plaut was the prize's first recipient and Dr. Fraser Mustard received it in 1999.

Vanier received a replica of a glass award designed by Toronto artist and Holy Blossom member Andrea Marcus. Holy Blossom also donated $2,500 to L'Arche Canada.

The L'Arche movement, which seeks to create family-like homes for people with disabilities and their assistants, has grown since 1964 to include 104 communities in more than 30 countries on five continents.

Its charter says L'Arche, born in the Roman Catholic tradition, "seeks to respond to the distress of those who are too often rejected, and to give them a valid place in society." It also "wants to be a sign of hope" in a divided world.

A key guiding principle is that "everyone is of unique and sacred value" with a "right to friendship, to communion and to a spiritual life."

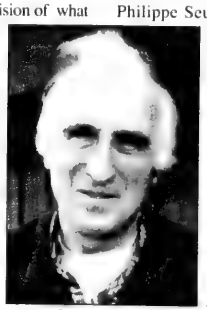
Vanier, now 73, is a companion of the Order of Canada. He served in the Royal Canadian Navy in World War II but resigned in 1950 to live and study in a community near Paris headed by Thomas Philippe, a Dominican priest.

After completing a PhD on Aristotle's ethics in 1962, Vanier briefly taught philosophy at St. Michael's College at the University of Toronto. But he returned to France in 1963 to visit his former teacher, who was then chaplain for a residence of 30 men with developmental disabilities.

Vanier then "broke radically with… the conventional career path," said Prof. Michael Marrus, U of T's dean of graduate studies, who introduced Vanier. "Drawing deeply on his Catholic faith, Jean Vanier took the first steps in the creation of a remarkable worldwide community of communities known as L'Arche, the ark, after Noah's ark."

Vanier and Father Philippe invited two men with developmental disabilities to share a house in Trosly-Breuil, a town 90 kilometres north of Paris.

Vanier told the audience – which included residents from Reena Foundation and L'Arche homes in Greater Toronto – that the head of the institution where one of the men, Philippe Seux, had lived told Vanier that Seux's mother had died, but that Seux shouldn't be told "because it would hurt him too much."



Jean Vanier

Vanier contacted an uncle who was also reluctant to tell Seux, but Vanier persisted.

"I want to go tomorrow to the grave of your mummy. I want Philippe to touch the grave," Vanier recalled saying to Seux.

The next day, "Philippe threw himself on the grave and yelled. And you could have heard his scream for miles.

"Yes, he was crying because his mom had died, but he was also crying because nobody had treated him as a son. Nobody had respected him."

Vanier, who no longer heads L'Arche but still lives in a French L'Arche home, said L'Arche communities are based on love, which means telling people, "You're beautiful, you have value. Because you're a human being created by God, you are precious."

Like anyone else, he said, "people with disabilities need to be needed."

L'Arche Daybreak was founded in Richmond Hill, Ont., in 1969, the first L'Arche community in North America.

Today there are 26 Canadian communities in British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia. In Greater Toronto, L'Arche has 12 homes.

Most residents in the GTA homes are Christian, but there are two Jews and one Muslim, said a L'Arche spokesperson.

Listening to Vanier was Janet Munro, 40, who has Down syndrome and has lived at Wolverleigh House in Toronto for the last 21 years.

She said living there has taught her how to cook, clean and do laundry. On Fridays, she often heads to L'Arche Daybreak to learn to dance with L'Arche's Spirit Movers dance group.

"I think I'm a pretty normal person," Munro said in an interview. "I'm a special person."

Stan Kugelmass, immediate past chair of the Reena Foundation, thanked Vanier. He said L'Arche's faith-based approach has been a "wonderful role model for Reena" and said L'Arche Daybreak was one of the first places Reena's founders visited before starting the organization in 1972.

Bais Yaakov gathering not your typical reunion

By JENNIFER PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — High school reunions are usually evenings of drinking and nostalgia, where alumni brag and gossip and discover how little they now share besides memories. But when the reunion marks Bais Yaakov's 40th anniversary, it's a reunion of a different kind.

On Nov. 24, a reunion of Bais Yaakov Toronto attended by 600 women, called "Building on the Past," began with tehillim (psalms) recited for a sick graduate who couldn't attend and hakarat hatov, gratitude to those who have made the school what it has become. The evening also included a tribute to longtime principal Rabbi Akiva Stefansky and a few words of praise from him.

"The akeres habayis [woman of the home] sets the tone, deciding the character of children," and even her husband's spiritual path, he said.

Adding some levity to the occasion, he said, "When you came to class to learn, all you were interested in was socializing. So now, when you're here to socialize, what am I doing speaking to you?"

Though the Bais Yaakov movement was founded in 1918 by Polish seamstress Sarah Schenirer and eventually spread throughout the world, the movement only took hold here in the 1960's. At one time, New York was the only option for girls, recalls Mrs. Geetee Gestetner.

Gestetner's uncle, Rabbi Chaim Nussbaum, then principal of Eitz Chaim, and her father, Meir Nussbaum, took over a tiny space in Eitz Chaim, what another early student, Magda Simon, Judaic studies principal at Bais Yaakov Elementary School, calls "a glorified closet." Later they moved to a house on Viewmount, where there were even classes in the kitchen.

"Students [sat] on one side of the counter, teacher on the other," said Simon.

In 1965, Simon and Gestetner's class of 12 students – the school's first – graduated. Today, Bais Yaakov has 400 students and 120 graduates each year. The Toronto movement also boasts a teachers' seminary and a university degree program called Talpiot.

At the reunion, shrieks of greeting and laughter rang out from women reunited from as far away as England, several pushing strollers or carrying Bais Yaakov's next generation in their arms.

Teachers also "schepped nachas," including Magda Sabovitch, a math and science teacher at Bais Yaakov since 1963, who was greeted with hugs and exclamations of "You were my favourite teacher!"

Sabovitch "got off the boat from Romania saying, 'I'll teach you chemistry, you teach me English,'" Simon said.

Sarah Bell, a Bais Yaakov graduate who's taught at the school for 18 years, said, "I'm so excited being here myself that I'm not really seeing [past students] that way."

In her keynote address, longtime teacher Rebbitzen Leah Bograd (formerly Miss Kober) spoke of the late Rabbi Eliezer Schach and his generation, particularly the Chafetz Chaim (Rabbi Israel Meir Kagan), an early supporter of Bais Yaakov schools. Without them, she said, "the world is not the same."

Now living in Israel, Bograd thought the reunion might be cancelled after Sept. 11. But the organizers went ahead with the event, recalling for her the principle, "To everything there is a season and a time to every purpose," she said.

Organizers ended the evening with the announcement of an ambitious "Resource Book" project, which allows graduates to exchange expertise in areas such as business, medicine, matchmaking and psychology.

Though Bais Yaakov graduates pursue diverse occupations, speakers repeatedly praised those who become educators. Simon proudly mentioned her daughters who "went through the system" and returned to teach.

Outside of formal education, graduates contribute as parents and through "davening and performing mitzvos... with concentration," Rabbi Stefansky said.

"[U.S. President George W.] Bush will never win the war against terrorism," said Rabbi Stefansky. "But we – with commitment and emes [truth] on our side – we can win the war."

Volunteerism confronts cutbacks, changes in the family

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Second of two parts

> 'In a small town, you just knew that everyone had to be involved, or nothing would get done:' Brown

At the beginning of the last century, volunteerism was seen partly as noblesse oblige.

Those who were wealthy, or at least wealthier than those around them, felt they had an obligation to help those less fortunate. Many felt that since God had blessed them – after all, why else would they have been successful? – they should return those blessings in some way.

Many of the well-off today still believe in that principle, and while some are uncomfortable with the gala fund-raisers, garden lunches and the wings named after generous benefactors, these fund-raising efforts raise considerable amounts of money and give facilities and institutions the opportunity to expand and blossom.

They also take on even more significance in the context of government cutbacks in health and social services, which have led to hospital closings, slashed programs, staff firings and the realization that often the only way to get things done is through volunteer assistance.

In Jewish communities, there have always been functions that have been done strictly on a volunteer basis, such as chevrah kadishah, preparing a body for Jewish burial. Indeed, said Rabbi Nachum Berlat, director of chaplaincy at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, chevrah kadishah is one of the greatest mitzvot, since it is performed without any possible thanks or reward from the person being served.

But it is equally hard to imagine communal life without the bazaars, the purchase of trees for Israel, hospital volunteers, meals on wheels and door-to-door canvassing for causes as diverse as cancer and school sports.

Allan Reitzes, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said the new, leaner bundle of services provided by government affects the allocations made by UJA Federation and the need for volunteers, since "we have to work to ameliorate the impact [of the cutbacks] on the Jewish poor."

For instance, he said, Jewish Family & Child Service provides cash grants to poor families, and as governments cut back, funds from federation to JF & CS must be augmented to offset the greater need.

"Our goal is to make it possible for people to live with dignity and Jewishly," Reitzes said.

As well, Toronto's community, along with all Diaspora communities, has been asked to raise funds for Israel to help offset budget cuts necessitated by increased military and defence spending, said Reitzes.

Reitzes said volunteers still reflect the full spectrum of the Toronto Jewish community, running the gamut of gender, religious affiliation, ethnic background, and affluence.

But community leaders have identified a growing problem.

In the last 30 years or so, families have changed. Today, both parents often work outside the home, making life so hectic that the most basic requisite for volunteering – time – simply isn't there.

Sandra Brown has been active in community life since her teens, when, as a resident of the small Jewish community in Saint John, N.B., she collected money for Jewish National Fund and welcomed Hungarian refugees entering Canada.

"In a small town, you just knew that everyone had to be involved, or nothing would get done," Brown said in a recent interview.

When she had children she decided to leave her profession as a social worker and make volunteering her job.

She has worked with such organizations as National Council of Jewish Women, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Jewish Vocational Service, and the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

She has also served as chair of the BJE, and president of Toronto Jewish Congress.

Brown is worried about many issues related to volunteerism and knows that a volunteer load like hers is much more difficult to carry today than it used to be.

"We are living in a different world," she said. "I was part of a privileged generation, able to give up my career and become a volunteer as a job."

Today's young couples have to balance home, work and family responsibilities, she said.

While there is currently no shortage of volunteers, Brown said she "sees the same faces in several different places, a situation that can lead to stress and burnout."

And, she asked, "What will happen in five, 10 or 15 years if the young don't get involved now?"

The problem requires that we "recruit and use volunteers in different ways," she said.

Moreover, she added, organizations are not preparing for a future shortage of volunteers. "Will that mean that we will be totally dependent on professionals for the kind of community we have?"

At UJA Federation, lay leadership determine policy and professional staff carry out their decisions, Reitzes said.

The model assumes there are enough experienced and committed volunteers to assume that role.

But young people, Brown said, have to prioritize what is important to them, and she believes family should top the list.

As a result, she fears the community "is moving in the direction of only the advantaged [economically] able to give their time." While we have to recognize how important they are, she said, it is essential for everyone to be involved.

Since long-term volunteer commitments may no longer be possible, what may be necessary is to create short-term projects, Brown said.

"While a lawyer, for instance, may not be able to commit to serving as an officer of an organization for a year, he or she may well be able to take on a particular legal case," she said.

"If someone is able to do something for an hour, what will be the best things for them to do? What will be the best use of their time?"

Brown stressed the need to motivate people by showing the satisfaction that comes from volunteer work, and to have good role models, both in volunteers' own family and in the community at large.

One thing we don't do well, she said, is volunteer appreciation.

"That's one reason we lose a lot of volunteers," Brown said. "Not that [appreciation] should be the only reason to volunteer, but it gives people encouragement to know that what they are doing is recognized."

Brown said people should realize that there is more to community involvement than donating, raising and allocating money. "Time can be more valuable."

She said corporations also have to be made to understand that rather than merely giving money, it is important to allow employees to take time off work to perform volunteer tasks, and that they should be rewarded for doing it, she said.

We must find new and different tasks people can volunteer for, especially on a short-term basis, and people should be matched with tasks or projects that interest them and take advantage of their unique talents, training and skills, Brown said.

This is one purpose of the Young Leadership Program of UJA Federation. Reitzes said this program gives people beginning their volunteer careers the opportunity to work for short periods for various community agencies.

Brown said matching willing volunteers with appropriate tasks should be the job of a volunteer co-ordinator. However, she said, "Jewish organizations and agencies have been hit by cutbacks and economic realities, and often the position of volunteer co-ordinator is one of those to go."

Changing the status quo to encourage volunteerism requires "imagination, orchestration, and a certain amount of resources," Brown said.

"We have to reclaim the goodness in people."

Debates seek to rekindle interest in Zionism

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When the New Zionist Initiative formed a year ago, its members had a simple yet important dream: rejuvenate Jewish interest in Zionism by holding debates on contentious Zionist issues.

Late last month, the dream became a reality at a Toronto coffee shop, where the group hosted two debates on whether Israel's chief rabbinate should be abolished and if Diaspora Jews have a right to influence Israeli policy.

With about 50 people on hand, the debaters – York University Prof. Marty Lockshin and lawyers David Lepofsky and Benjamin Rubin – dished out a mix of thoughtful arguments and acerbic wit, prompting the crowd to frequently burst into laughter and share their own views.

"I got some real insight into the chief rabbinate in Israel tonight," said Jason Adelman, who attended the debate. "This is a new initiative of a typically disenfranchised part of the Jewish population and it's great that we're meeting with each other."

Fostering a link between unaffiliated Zionists is exactly what the group is trying to do.

Formed after an international Zionist gathering in Duck Key, Florida last year, the members of the New Zionist Initiative are trying to get lay people, particularly young Jewish adults, turned on by Zionism by discussing ideas.

"There's still a huge fund-raising connection to Zionism, but we want to focus on the exchange of ideas," said group member Steven Shulman.

"After all, Zionism started with an idea and the idea is more powerful than anything."

Shulman said the debates are a starting point, but the group will eventually take on more projects as it gains members.

"We're not just going to be a debating society. We will create some tangible action and results," he said.

The debate, held on Nov. 29 to commemorate the United Nations partition of Palestine on that date in 1947, was moderated by former Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen and set up to mimic the debating format in Parliament.

One participant adopted the role of prime minister, while the other side acted as leader of the opposition.

The crowd was polled before the debate to see which view they endorsed and then again after, to see if they were swayed into adopting a different view.

While the debaters didn't necessarily believe in their arguments, they each made salient points.

For instance, Lepofsky argued the chief rabbinate in Israel should be abolished because it has led to Israel's orthodox minority monopolizing control over religious matters.

Lockshin counter-attacked by likening abolishing the rabbinate to eliminating another historical institution – the American White House.

Lepofsky responded by asking "Are you saying that because the dinosaurs had their time in history, we're supposed to support the Toronto Raptors?"

Lepofsky's barbs were not only funny, they also swayed opinions. He squeaked by his opponents in terms of the number of people who changed how they voted after hearing his arguments.

Lepofsky's humour became the basis for a protest by his opponent.

"This isn't fair," pleaded Rubin. "David's funny."

Aside from the joking, the debates dealt seriously with a matter that continues to baffle Jews in Israel and the Diaspora: What role, if any, should the Diaspora play in influencing Israeli policy?

Rubin said that since Israel is the "collective embodiment of the Jewish people," Jews throughout the world have the right and obligation to have a say in Israeli policies.

But Lepofsky argued that there is only a small, primarily wealthy contingent of Jews who would have the power to exert that kind of influence. Besides, he pointed sarcastically, "Israelis wouldn't listen anyway, so why bother?"

There were a handful of Israelis at the debates and they enjoyed seeing their Canadian Zionist counterparts in action.

"As a citizen of Israel, it was good to have an opportunity to see how Jews in Canada inform each other about Israel," said Yuval Arbel. "It was interesting to see this other side."

The group plans to hold its next debate Jan. 31.

For information on the group and related Zionist issues, see www.newhouseofisrael.com on the Internet, or email zionistdebate@hotmail.com.

Lay leaders launch National Campus Committee

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Lay leaders gathered in the week following the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities, held last month in Washington, D.C., to lay the foundations for a support and advocacy group dedicated to helping university students across the country lead Jewish lives on campus.

The fledgling group, called the National Campus Committee, plans to use Hillel International as a model for creating a "Jewish renaissance" on campus by funding programs and providing support for students.

"I think we have an opportunity now to create a renaissance of Jewish life on campuses but it won't be created if we don't answer the needs of students," said Barbara Bank, chair of the committee.

One of the main issues confronting students on campus is a lack of resources. Small communities, such as Waterloo, Ont., and London, Ont., often cannot support large Jewish populations at local universities. The National Campus Committee would be responsible for ensuring that all campuses have the resources needed to run programs and build a vibrant Jewish life, Bank said.

"Our goal is to make sure they have those resources," she said. "They deserve on their campuses the same resources we have in our communities."

Hillel International president Richard Joel showed support for the committee and pledged to help establish a strong Jewish presence on Canadian campuses.

"Hillel's involvement is to attempt... to strengthen the commitment of a generation of Canadian Jews attending university," said Joel.

Hillel has already established centres for university students in Montreal, as well as in British Columbia, at the University of British Columbia and at Simon Fraser University, where there is a "rich Jewish campus life," Joel said.

Meanwhile, Bank is hoping that this initiative will be a success. Most importantly, she said, students will have the opportunity to let the community know what they need to flourish.

"[We're] listening to the needs of the students. That's really the primary goal," said Bank.

Campus arts festival deadline nears

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The campus arts festival is expanding again. Colouring Ourselves: A Festival of Jewish Creativity will be held from March 3 to 6 at four different venues in Toronto.

Now in its fifth year, the annual showcase of art and performing art began in its first year with a Sunday evening event at the North York Public Library, with the art remaining on display the following day.

This year, a music night will be held at the Berlin nightclub, located at Yonge and Eglinton. The Bloor Cinema, at Bloor and Bathurst, will be the site of Film Night, while spoken art, theatre and dance will be featured at the nearby Tranzac Club on Brunswick Avenue.

A mid-to-uptown location is still being sought to display visual art such as painting, sculpture and photography.

Organizers hope the different locations will be "a way to engage the larger community," said Sarah Zelcer, arts and culture co-ordinator of Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto.

Last year more than 70 artists participated in the event, with more than 100 pieces and performances in total, said Zelcer.

"The goal is to involve as many student artists as possible, and also to present a quality festival," said Zelcer. Submissions are selected by a team of student organizers, about 25 in all.

The program is not just about the four-day event in March, stressed Zelcer. Community building and leadership training are important aspects.

In January, a "creative retreat" will be held as an opportunity to "engage in a variety of creative workshops that centre around a Jewish theme," she said.

Submissions – for which the deadline is January 4 – do not have to be Jewish-themed. "We certainly welcome Jewish content," said Zelcer, "but we don't require that Jewish students or recent graduates have Jewish content... Our goal is to see how their Jewish identity comes through in their work. That's the key thing. We want them to come out, showcase their work, and meet other Jewish artists.

"With non-Jewish artists, we do ask that their work have Jewish content."

The arts festival is "one of the major gateways into the Jewish community," according to Zac Kaye, executive director of JCS. "There isn't just one way to be involved in Jewish campus life. That's what the arts festival represents."

For further information, contact Zelcer at 416-878-9658 or go to www.jewishcampusservices.com and click on the arts and culture link.

Solidarity rally for Israel draws 3,000 people

Israel, is proportionately the same as the number of people injured and killed in the World Trade Center attack. Israel is a standing World Trade Center."

The most proximate cause of terrorism is the incitement of hatred, said Cotler.

"The Holocaust did not begin in the gas chambers. It began with words. Terrorism in Israel [also] began with hatred. This kind of hatred is unprecidented since World War II.

"This is a war against terrorism. It is not a war against a religion or a person. We need a coalition against terrorism, and for human rights."

Let there be no mistake, said Cotler.

"This is not a conflict about borders. At the core is the unwillingness of many leaders to accept the legitimacy of Israel. That is the root cause.

"As Israel rises from shivah, let us remember that this is 2001, not 1941. There is a Jewish State today. There are Jewish people with resolve, and there are non-Jews who are prepared to stand up and be counted for a just cause. If we do what we can, what we must and what we will, then we will be able to say that truth and justice will prevail," Cotler said.

The only motivation behind terrorism, said Romem, is to frighten and intimidate us. "Israelis continue on with their lives and refuse to be intimidated. This is the one great lesson to be learned from Israel."

Meridor said that terrorists should look back on Jewish history and see that Jews have been fighting for freedom for 2,000 years.

"Do they think we will be afraid today? The real lesson of Chanukah," he said, "is that we took faith in our own hands. If there are threats, we go on praying, but we don't count on miracles. We need to defend ourselves with our own hands."

In the past, said Meridor, countries fought countries and armies fought armies.

"The rules of the game have changed," Meridor said. "The threat now comes from organizations with no boundaries. It's a global world and a global threat. We are all on different fronts, but it is the same war against terrorism."

North Americans need to learn from Israel, he said. "We have been under attack since day one, and if we had been afraid there would have been no Israel today.

"That is the lesson. Even in times of threats, you have to go on building what you have been building. Do not stop for the terrorists."

There will be a full interview with Dan Meridor next week.

Montreal massacre remembered

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Violence against women and families is an issue of Jewish concern, said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein at a memorial service attended by about 60 people last week.

Rabbi Goldstein, president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, pledged support and offered words of prayer at the Dec. 6 service commemorating the 1989 massacre of 14 women at Montreal's Ecole Polytechnique by gunman Marc Lepine.

The second annual Jewish service, held at Beth Tzedec Congregation, was sponsored by Holy Blossom Temple, Beth Tzedec and the First Narayever Congregation.

The entire Jewish community must rededicate itself to fighting violence against women, said Rabbi Goldstein.

Teri Kay of Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) read a poignant account, written by a JF&CS client about her 32-year abusive marriage, which she left last September.

Although the woman, identified as Hannah, had left her marriage on previous occasions, she kept returning. "My husband would persuade me with sweet apologies... I was always hopeful that the next time would be different."

Over the years, her husband's behaviour included withholding grocery money after they had fought, hitting her when she was pregnant, dismissing her job as meaningless, speaking in a vulgar manner and playing favourites with their children.

"I needed confidence to believe in myself," Hannah wrote. JF&CS helps women in abusive marriages, she noted. "I finally realized I had choices. I did not have to live the rest of my life in fear."

Physical and emotional violence against women transcends class, race, religion and culture, said Adrienne Rosen of the First Narayever and the Wildwomen project, which raised money for the Dec. 6 Fund, a volunteer organization that provides interest-free loans to women fleeing domestic abuse.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec said that women who've been killed by abusive partners, in some cases, died because "those around them were unable or unwilling to stretch... the hand of hope."

Also participating in the service were Rabbis Ed Elkin of the First Narayever and Jason Rosenberg of Holy Blossom; Cantor Tobias Gabriel and Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Beth Tzedec; Kathryn Keystone and Kevin Keystone, who read names of the Montreal victims and of women killed by male violence in the Toronto area in the past year; and children from the Downtown Jewish Day School, who sang songs of peace.

D'Arcy McGee to stay

MONTREAL — D'Arcy McGee, the only provincial riding with a Jewish majority, will not disappear from Quebec's electoral map.

In its final report, the Commission de la représentation électorale decided to keep D'Arcy McGee as it is now. Last June, the commission proposed that D'Arcy McGee's territory be divided in two, with the largest part merging with Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and the rest with Mont Royal.

D'Arcy McGee MNA Lawrence Bergman, who spearheaded a vigorous grassroots campaign to keep the status quo, said he was delighted with the commission's decision.

He said it appeared the commission was swayed by a petition he launched, which was signed by more than 12,000 persons last summer, as well as by the presentations made by himself and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) at public hearings in September.

In addition, close to 50 Jewish organizations, synagogues and institutions, many of them located outside the riding, lent their official support to the campaign to save D'Arcy McGee. — J.A.

Failed war crimes cases cost $1.77M

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The federal government paid close to $1.77 million in legal expenses to three men who successfully parried prosecutors' efforts to strip them of their citizenship and deport them as Nazi war criminals.

Eduards Podins, Peteris Vitols and Johann Dueck received $510,000, $505,000 and $750,000 respectively in 1999 after Justice Department prosecutors failed to prove they lied to Immigration authorities about their wartime service.

Terry Beitner, director of the Justice Department's war crimes unit, said the costs "can be reasonably expected in trials of this complexity, with travel overseas.

"I think you have to look at this case in the context of 19 [denaturalization] cases" brought by the unit since 1995.

Nine of the cases have gone to court and in six, prosecutors showed the suspects obtained citizenship by misrepresenting their wartime activities. Three cases were unsuccessful, he said, but "I would suggest it is unrealistic to expect the government to win every case that comes to court."

Beitner said payouts will not impact the unit's annual $5.7 million budget, which also goes to the develop cases against modern day war criminals.

The $1.77 million in legal costs was the largest part of $1.9 million paid out by Citizenship and Immigration Canada in the 1999-2000 fiscal year. The figures were released through an Access to Information application and were reported the same day the Auditor-General found federal misspending and mismanagement amounting to billions of taxpayer dollars, including a $21 billion excess surplus in the Employment Insurance fund.

Chrétien approved Geneva vote, Day charges

completely unacceptable," Chrétien was quoted as saying last week.

Indeed, Canada issued the following statement at the conference: "Canadians were outraged by the recent, indiscriminate attacks in Jerusalem and Haifa, and offer their sympathy to the victims and their families. There can be no justification for these horrific acts. They serve only to demonstrate contempt for the universal humanitarian principles which have brought all of us into this room today."

Canada's delegate at the Geneva meeting, Chris Westdahl, also expressed "serious concerns" over attempts to politicize the process, saying that singling out one country is "more detrimental than ever to the diplomatic process."

Israel "should apply the convention de jure to the West Bank, Gaza, Golan Heights and east Jerusalem," the Canadian delegation stated, "and the Palestinian Authority should also ensure respect for the universal principles of International Humanitarian Law, including for the protection of Israeli civilians, regardless of their legal status."

While some called on Canada to stay away from the meeting, Chrétien defended the decision to participate.

"We believe it is better to be present and speak than not be there and let the resolution go without anybody talking against it," he said.

Canada's endorsement of the declaration reveals an alarming slide away from this country's traditional neutrality in the Mideast conflict, Day charged.

"It's an ongoing disturbing process," he said, referring to this past summer's United Nations-sponsored conference on racism in Durban, and last year's support by Ottawa of UN Resolution 1322. "It's a very disturbing pattern of duplicity on the part of the Canadian government. There isn't even a pretense of balance.

"We profoundly believe [the Geneva declaration] is inappropriate," he continued. "If we want to see Canada as an honest broker, then we have to keep a balanced approach. And this is most unbalanced."

Canada joined 113 other countries for the Arab-initiated, day-long conference, held in Geneva. The United States and Israel announced weeks ago they would boycott the meeting. Australia joined the boycott later, while some countries simply did not attend.

The meeting's final declaration called on the "Occupying Power" to "immediately refrain from committing grave breaches" of the Fourth Geneva Convention, such as "wilful killing, torture, unlawful deportation, wilful depriving of the rights of fair and regular trial, extensive destruction and appropriation of property not justified by military necessity and carried out unlawfully and wantonly."

It was the first time since the convention was signed 51 years ago to enshrine the protection of civilians in wartime that a country has been formally asked to obey its rules. Critics point out that such a meeting was not convened even during attacks on civilians in Bosnia, Rwanda, Congo and Sudan.

In July 1999, a similar meeting was held in Geneva but Canada did not attend, saying it would be counter-productive to the Mideast peace process and might risk politicizing the Geneva conventions. That meeting broke up within hours but the parties promised to meet again.

As far as Day is concerned, Canada's position is hypocritical. "You can't go to a conference like that, be part of this one-sided declaration, and then try and quietly phone your Jewish friends back home and say, 'Oh, we really didn't mean it.' It's an astoundingly two-faced position."

Last Thursday in the House of Commons, in response to Day's questions about the Geneva resolution, Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray argued that "there is balance in our approach, and I think I can say on behalf of the government that there is no country, except perhaps for the United States, that stands up in a more forthright and balanced way for Israel."

Liberal backbench MP Irwin Cotler told The CJN he feels Canada should have worked to prevent the meeting from convening in the first place.

Cotler, a human rights expert, noted a paradox: Canada is a leader in the promotion of international humanitarian law, and "that is precisely the reason Canada should have worked to see that this meeting did not take place to begin with. In order to respect international humanitarian law, [the conference] should not have been allowed to single out one member state for differential and discriminatory treatment.

"The result is, regardless of Canada's good faith, the entire process, which it wished to protect, ends up undermining the very regime of international humanitarian law, which was its raison d'être for attending the meeting."

The meeting wound up handing Palestinians "exculpatory immunity," Cotler stated.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) said Canada's attendance in Geneva was "an insult to the Israeli families grieving the cold-blooded murder of their sons, daughters and parents, and diminishes the significance of Chrétien's condemnation of the Palestinian terrorist attacks in which they were killed."

The CIC called the final declaration "blatantly one-sided" and pointed out that the Geneva-based UN Watch has noted that the singling out of Israel itself violates a core principle of the Geneva Convention, which is mandated only to consider general problems rather than specific cases.

In a statement, Canadian Jewish Congress national president Keith Landy said the final declaration of Wednesday's meeting "is a morally outrageous document which lets others blame Israel for defending itself against terror and is utterly to be rejected. The legalistic attempt to nuance fundamentally flawed international statements, as was apparent in the Canadian participation in the meeting on the Fourth Geneva Convention, was counterproductive. Billions of people will be incited to hatred and told by their government-controlled media that this statement is a condemnation of Israel, making Canada's footnote to the contrary irrelevant."

I Can Do It!

My Determination To Lose Weight

I am a woman on a mission. While I may appear "normal", and lead a satisfying professional and social life, I harbor a secret lack of self-respect. Ever since the birth of my second child, I have been forty pounds overweight and I hate it.

Sure, I've tried the usual slew of popular diets and even lost weight on most of them. Still, I was never able to remain on any of them long enough to reach my goals and sadly regained all the weight and then some, once off them.

Despite my past failures, I remain determined to win this battle. As I approach forty, I am beginning to realize that the extra weight is taking a toll on my health. It's no longer just a matter of aesthetics and today both my blood pressure and cholesterol levels are slightly elevated. Unchecked, I know that these conditions may lead to heart disease or other dangerous ailments. I have also been finding myself feeling sluggish, unable to enjoy the physical activities I once shared with my husband, friends and children. I consider this the prime of my life, yet I feel myself aging well before my time.

I am a journalist by trade and figured that I ought to apply my investigative skills to my own personal quest. Drawing up a list of the city's major weight-loss clinics, I set out to review them one by one to find the most effective program.

My journey lead me to some rather interesting, if not unorthodox, clinics, which, while impressively polished in their marketing schemes, sometimes appeared downright scary. The idea of injections didn't thrill me, nor taking herbal medications, the names of which I could hardly pronounce, or starvation methods, especially as my goals have now expanded to include improved health. In this age of hi-tech revolution, I had a strong feeling from inside that maybe less was better. Somehow I felt that getting back to the basics and taking a natural, healthy, yet steady approach to weight-loss, may be my answer.

I was tired of all the gimmicks and was refreshed when I discovered Primary Prevention, an elegantly appointed office in a distinguished medical centre just east of North York General Hospital in Toronto. Supervised by Adrian Woodrow, M.D., a seasoned family physician and bariatrician, the clinic's approach is a comprehensive one. It employs medical tactics to the "battle of the bulge" and treats obesity as a disease. Dr. Woodrow recognizes that physiological, psychological and genetic factors all play a role in this challenge and addresses related issues as part of treatment. He also takes into account each patient's medical history and lifestyle, ensuring that whatever diet he prescribes is medically sound and feasible for that individual. Clearly, this service is impossible for followers of fad diets.

Expecting another "cookie-cutter" approach to my problem, I was surprised, yet relieved, to learn of the clinic's basic approach to weight-loss. I was told that the clinic promoted a comprehensive "healthy living" format, which, while helping patients lose weight, also optimized their overall health. I made an appointment to meet Dr. Woodrow in person.

Upon arriving, both the doctor and his staff exuded warmth and support, a sharp contrast to some of the "tough" strategies employed by "weight-loss experts" at some of the other local clinics I had visited. Totally unpretentious, the doctor and his nutritionist encouraged me to set realistic and attainable expectations for myself. Emphasizing that optimum health should be my primary goal, they were sensitive to the weight-related social pressures women often face. He explained that in order to secure a healthy and fit body long-term, my focus must not lie on food alone, as so many other clinics encouraged, but on my overall lifestyle. Another unique aspect of his approach is his continuous motivation of patients, even after they've lost the weight. His goal is to help people not only lose the weight, but keep it off permanently.

The doctor went on to describe how his clinic focuses on preventive health and that it addresses an array of health concerns or pre-concerns. Every patient is considered individually and each plan is custom-designed to meet the unique challenges and predispositions of every patient. Perhaps most importantly, his entire team is known for its rock-solid support system. Recognizing that the challenge of weight-loss is a difficult, if not sometimes lonely one, the doctor expressed his clinic's commitment to support me throughout my battle, with a positive outlook and constant encouragement. He even offered his support in the form of personal telephone calls in between visits to discuss any challenges I may be facing.

The best part of my visit was that, unlike some other prominent Toronto-based weight-loss clinics, I was never pressured into an immediate financial commitment. My initial consultation was free! I now feel ready to start losing the weight and most importantly, get my health back in check. I am too young to feel the way I do and know that the first step to my new life begins today!

Coast to Coast

The Liberals' mixed record

Historically, the Liberal Party (a.k.a. the Natural Governing Party) has consistently done well with immigrant groups. It has been suggested the reason is because immigrants practically cement an affiliation with the government in power when they first arrive in Canada. Since the Liberals have held power during most of the country's major waves of immigration, they would stand to be the biggest beneficiaries of their own immigration policies.

But in an assessment of whether the Liberals deserve the loyalty exhibited by Canadian Jews, we find some interesting contradictions. In fact, the Liberal track record swings wildly between the best and worst characteristics we identified in our examination of the other political parties. Ironically, it begins with the very issue of immigration. The none-is-too-many Liberal immigration policy exposed by Harold Troper and Irving Abella details as callous a disregard for the plight of European Jewry as could ever be imagined. Conversely, Canada – under Liberal governments – was a world leader in fighting for the rights of Soviet Jewry, including the right to emigrate to Canada.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

The contradictions are repeated in other areas too: on Israel, the Arab boycott of Israel, school funding, anti-Semitism, hate legislation, Israeli charities – the list is very long and diverse. Even with regard to a Holocaust remembrance museum, the Liberals both promised and un-promised to facilitate its presence in the nation's capital. But what all these issues demonstrate is a pattern in which the Liberal Party shows itself capable of being the community's best friend and worst foe, depending upon the political exigencies of the day.

And the problem does not go away where it counts the most – on a personal level. When it comes to Jewish causes and Israel, Liberal caucuses past and present have contained some of the most supportive politicians ever elected in this country. Unfortunately, they have also contained some of Israel's fiercest critics.

If this analysis comes as a surprise to some readers, it shouldn't. We return to a basic premise that runs through my observations of all the parties: no party is all good or all bad, and each offers unique opportunities for meaningful Jewish participation in the Canadian political process.

However, as with the other parties, there are certain alarm bells that should be ringing in Jewish ears. Just as the Liberals regard themselves as the natural governing party, there is an assumption that Jewish support is as instinctive as it is automatic. But on any given day, a political party should have to earn the support of its various constituencies, and the dynamic between the Jewish community and the Liberal Party should be no different.

29 injured in botched Haifa suicide bombing

By DAVID RATNER and AVI SHMOUL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

HAIFA — One man was moderately wounded and 28 lightly wounded in an attempted suicide bombing at the Checkpost intersection in north Haifa Sunday morning. The terrorist's bomb did not blow up completely, and as he lay wounded on the street, apparently trying to set off the rest of the bomb, a police officer and an army sapper shot him dead.

The police believe the bomber was planning to board one of the many buses to Nazareth, Afula and Migdal Haemek that stop at a row of bus stations at the checkpost, but when he was spotted by two police officers in the area on bomb-watch patrol, he blew himself up earlier than he had planned to.

Northern District Police Cmdr. Yaakov Borovsky confirmed that only part of the explosive belt the man was wearing blew up. It was strong enough to seriously wound him, but luckily caused few casualties among the crowd waiting for buses or at the kiosks nearby.

Palestinian security sources said the bomber was Nimr Abu Sayfien, 20, from the town of Yamoun in the northern West Bank, near Jenin. He left a note to his parents saying the planned attack was revenge for Israel's killing two weeks ago of Mahmoud Abu Hanoud, a top Hamas militant, but no group claimed responsibility for the attack.

The man collapsed to the ground after setting off the bomb and when he began waving his hand apparently trying to reach another detonator, he was shot by a sapper and then a police officer.

Master Sgt. Hanan Malka said he was on routine patrol with his partner when he noticed the suspicious man. "We were driving past the stations on the way toward Nesher when I saw a suspicious-looking man with a black coat zipped to the throat. We went past him and about 10 metres past, I realized he was suspicious and backed up toward him. He saw us coming and blew himself up."

The explosion detonated only part of the bomb belt. Even people standing next to him, soldiers and civilians, weren't seriously wounded. Within seconds of the blast, the crowds had dispersed, most running to the other side of the street to the commercial centre.

Shortly after the explosion, Chief Supt. Ron Goldberger, head of the detective squad in the main Haifa police station, arrived on the scene. He had been in a nearby mall and when he heard about the bomb over his police radio, he ran to the bus station.

"I saw the terrorist move his hands. There was a sapper near me with an M-16. I told him to shoot the terrorist," Goldberger said. "When he continued to move, I ran toward him and added a few more shots from my pistol."

After the explosion, police quickly evacuated the area and the junction was closed. As wounded were moved to area hospitals, sappers continued neutralizing the remaining explosives on the dead terrorist's body.

For the first time, a mobile unit from the Environment Ministry's dangerous materials department came to the scene to check whether the explosives had been mixed with poisonous material, as was discovered in the Jerusalem suicide bombing nearly to weeks ago.

When asked if the terrorists had accomplices, Cmdr. Borovsky was stern: "The terrorist probably had help, but claims that there are Haifa Arabs who are helping the terrorist organizations are baseless and only cause harm to Haifa's Arabs."

Suicide bombs justified, Jerusalem mufti says

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newpaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The mufti of Jerusalem, Sheikh Akrameh Sabri, says that suicide bombings are justified and should be encouraged, according to a report published last Friday in the international Arabic newspaper Al-Hayat.

During a visit to Abu Dhabi, Sabri criticized Muslim religious leaders in Egypt and Saudi Arabia who issued an Islamic ruling (fatwah) against suicide attacks. Last week, Muhammad Sayed Tantawi, the sheikh of Al-Azhar University and Mosque in Cairo, ruled that Islamic law does not condone suicide attacks against innocent victims. A leading mufti in Saudi Arabia issued a similar opinion.

"These rulings came as a result of international pressure," Sabri said. "Those who do not have the courage to speak the truth should remain quiet and not say things that create confusion."

Sabri, who was appointed by Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, added: "Resistance is legitimate and those who give up their lives do not require permission from anyone.

"We must not stand in the way of the intifadah and jihad. Rather, we must stand at their side and encourage them."

When asked about attacking Israeli citizens, he responded: "Who is civilian and who is military? There have been many more Palestinian civilians than fighters killed during the intifadah. School children whose bodies were torn to pieces. Pregnant women who were prevented from reaching hospitals – many times the mother and child died."

Palestinian media marches 'to drumbeat of war'

In a speech prior to the recent wave of suicide bombings, which outlined the Bush administration's views on settling the Mideast conflict, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell called for an end to violence and promoted the vision of two states living side by side in secure, recognized borders.

Powell also took aim at Palestinian propaganda. "The endless messages of incitement and hatred of Israelis and Jews that pour out of the media in so much of the Palestinian and Arab worlds only reinforces [Israelis'] fears. The incitement must stop," he said.

Around the time Powell made his statement, the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles was bringing to his attention a broadcast on Abu Dhabi Television of a prime time program – Plots of Terrorism – in which a look-alike of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was depicted as a vampire drinking the blood of Arabs.

In another program segment, aired around the start of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, the late Israeli prime minister, Menachem Begin, was portrayed as presenting to Sharon the blood of 20 Arab children to drink.

The show "is an open call for Jew-hatred and legitimizes terrorism against Israel," wrote Rabbi Marvin Hier and Rabbi Abraham Cooper in a letter to Powell. "This 21st-century updating of the infamous 'blood libel' is produced and airs on the official state-sponsored television of Abu Dhabi."

A similar allegation – that Jews use gentile blood when baking Passover matzah – is the theme of an anti-Semitic tract penned by Syrian Defence Minister Mustafa Tlas.

And last week, Arab Radio and Television, a popular satellite network based in Jedda, Saudi Arabia, announced it would air a 30-part dramatization of the anti-Semitic Protocols of the Elders of Zion. The Protocols, which allege an international Jewish conspiracy to dominate the world, were concocted by the Czarist secret police in Russia and were popular in Nazi Germany.

In the Palestinian territories, Jew-hatred, violence and a Palestine in place of Israel are constant themes, said Marcus. Particularly troubling is the indoctrination of young Palestinians to seek martyrdom in a holy war against Israel.

PMW recently released a video, The Anatomy of Child Self-Sacrifice, which contains numerous scenes from Palestinian television of children being encouraged to see themselves as soldiers fighting Israel and to seek death as an honourable contribution to that war.

For years, the PA-controlled media ran clips of young people literally dropping their toys and picking up rocks to use against Israelis. One clip depicts Mohammad Dura, the Palestinian youth killed early in the intifadah in a cross-fire in Gaza, enjoying a pastoral paradise and calling on other young people to become martyrs for Palestine.

Particularly troubling is the indoctrination of young Palestinians to seek martyrdom in a holy war against Israel

Another shows a hysterical teenage girl, screaming at the TV camera, demanding weapons so "we'll kill them all. We won't leave a single Jew."

The video also shows group of youngsters chanting in unison that they are part of a suicide squad. The narration indicates the youths were attending a summer camp in 1998, more than a year before the outbreak of the intifadah.

The Palestinian education system encourages martyrdom as a supreme virtue and paints a positive picture of death, Marcus said.

A poem in PA school books for grades 5, 6 and 12 reads in part: "I will take my soul in my hand and toss it into the abyss of death. And then either life that will gladden friends or death that will anger the enemy."

PMW studies various aspects of Palestinian culture to get a read on the society's intellectual currents and normative Palestinian thinking and expectations. Newspaper crossword puzzles can be revealing, Marcus said.

A PMW report on crossword puzzles found that "every metre of the State of Israel, from Metullah to Eilat, is defined as 'Palestine' or 'occupied Palestine.' A frequently repeated theme is the depiction of Jerusalem as the 'eternal capital of Palestine.'"

The defining Jewish character trait was correctly answered in a puzzle as "treachery" while the clue for defining Yad Vashem is "a centre for eternalizing lies."

Marcus said imagery of violence and war for Allah against Jews picked up noticeably in the summer of 2000.

On Sept. 11, 2000, several weeks before Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount and the intifadah that followed, PMW released a special report. It found that "PA television broadcasting of violence and hate has reached unprecedented levels this summer and has created an atmosphere of the eve of outbreak of war.

"Palestinian television is currently broadcasting a systematic campaign that negates the peace process and reconciliation... These inciting broadcasts appear frequently each day, beginning with children's programming and ending with the closing of programs at night."

The intifadah erupted a few weeks later.

Palestinian parents who in recent months have tried to restrain their children from taking to the streets, received a not-too-subtle warning from Hafaz Barghouti, editor of Al Hayat Al Jadida, the official PA paper. Parents who did not allow their children to throw stones were fifth columnists, he wrote.

Meanwhile, in France, an Algerian-born Jew has published his own video on the Palestinian media, titled Israel/Palestine: The Truth Behind the Bluff.

"I was so disgusted by the way information is treated by the international media, I decided to put together a movie and present it to the French media," said Pierre Rehov.

The video is similar to the one compiled by PMW, but includes scenes from the Palestinian territories shot by Rehov himself.

Rehov, who publishes fashion magazines and satirical papers, said the French media ignored the video. "It was too politically incorrect," he said.

Undeterred, Rehov decided to publish his own magazine on the Mideast conflict, called Contre Champs, and include the video cassette as part of the package. It proved an immediate success, with close to 50,000 copies sold, mostly in France, Belgium, Switzerland and Israel.

B'nai Brith purchased 2,000 copies and dispatched them to every French parliamentarian, as well as those in Luxembourg.

Rehov said the success of the distribution shows the French public is tired of the local media's stereotyped depiction of the conflict, with "Israel the giant army killing poor Palestinian children – end of story."

Even 10-month-old Shalhavet Pass, killed by a Palestinian sniper, was called a "baby settler," he said.

Despite the negative news coverage, Israel retains support in France. A recent poll found the French public favoured Israel over the Palestinians by 40 percent to 30 percent, Rehov said.

Contre Champs has recently released a second video. Called Trojan Horse, it adopts the position that peace talks mask the Palestinians' ultimate goal of eliminating Israel.

The video includes a revealing interview given by the late Palestinian leader Faisal Husseini, who told an Egyptian magazine the Palestinians are aiming for a state from the Mediterranean to the Jordan.

For Rehov, the lessons are clear: the Palestinians are engaged in a "step by step process to delegitimize Israel so that eventually there will be one Palestine with Jews living under Islamic rule like the good old days," he said.

The Week in Israel

Dec. 3

• In a special address to the nation, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon pledged to fight and win Israel's war on terrorism. Sharon said repeatedly that Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat was responsible for the continued terrorism against Israel.

• The IDF destroyed runways at Gaza's airport, damaging Arafat's freedom of movement and an important symbol of Palestinian nationalism.

Dec. 4

• Israel designated the Palestinian Authority (PA) a terror-supporting entity and the Tanzim militia and the Force 17 presidential guard, both associated with the PA, as terrorist organizations.

Dec. 5

• A suicide bomber blew himself up outside David's Citadel Hotel in Jerusalem. Eight passersby were lightly wounded.

• The Labour Party decided not to leave the coalition government.

• Avraham Tzadok, 65, of Moshav Geva Carmel, died when his pickup truck was swept away by flood waters near Neveh Yam and dozens of people were evacuated from their homes as heavy rain fell in the country, especially in the north.

Dec. 6

• Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak sent his foreign minister, Ahmed Maher, to speak to the government of Israel about the escalating violence with the PA.

Dec. 7

• Despite IDF attacks on Palestinian police buildings in Gaza, Israeli and Palestinian officials held joint high-level security talks at the Erez crossing in Gaza, under the auspices of U.S. envoy to the Middle East, Anthony Zinni. The two sides discussed ways the PA might clamp down on terrorists.

A debate on Arafat and bin Laden

According to Reports

In a lively exchange on CBC Radio last week, Norman Spector, Canada's former ambassador to Israel, and Robert Fisk, Middle East correspondent for Britain's Independent newspaper and an inveterate critic of Israel, discussed Israel's retaliation for the horrific series of suicide attacks in Jerusalem and Haifa.

Spector emphasized the restraint displayed by Ariel Sharon, arguing that Israel's response was symbolic, designed to send a clear message to Yasser Arafat that he has a lot more to lose unless he decisively cracks down on terrorism.

Spector also pointed out that while Arafat and Osama bin Laden cannot be equated, a comparison of Arafat's regime with the Taliban was apt, since both have provided safe havens for terrorists. Spector added: "I think the West has been rather craven in trying to draw a moral distinction between the kinds of attacks we saw [in Israel] and on the World Trade Center."

It was most revealing to find Fisk agreeing with Spector that Arafat and bin Laden have little in common, because as cruel as bin Laden is, he is at least not corrupt like Arafat.

Fisk was blunt: "I've hardly met an Arab who doesn't regard Arafat as being a corrupt and corrupted man who runs Palestine with his own private mafia, who salts away public money that ought to have gone to his own people… I was always surprised that the Israelis wanted to live next door to him."

"I would agree," Spector said, "that Mr. Arafat has the image of many rulers in the region – of an autocrat and corrupt despot… who has perhaps outlived his historical usefulness."

Still, there were deep differences between Fisk and Spector. Fisk insisted that Israel's "occupation" of the remaining areas of the West Bank and Gaza, rather than terrorism, was the "root of this problem." Spector appropriately countered that Hamas and Islamic Jihad which carry out the terrorist attacks – with elements of Arafat's own Fatah it should be added – consider all land from the Mediterranean to the Jordan to be "occupied" and want to see Israel destroyed.

And although Spector did not say it directly, others have pointed out that by refusing to act against Islamic extremists, by refusing to recognize Jewish claims to Jerusalem and by insisting on the "right of return" of Palestinian refugees to present-day Israel, Arafat provides substantial evidence that he also endorses these rejectionist goals.

Spector held out the faint hope that with his back to the wall, Arafat may at last be forced to take control and "effect the historical compromise that has been on the table since the UN voted for partition in 1947 to create two states." However, if he is ultimately unwilling to take that responsibility, then he will indeed become a relic of history.

Anti-Semitism in Australia highest ever

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SYDNEY — Anti-Semitic incidents against Australian Jews have reached record highs, according to a new report.

For the year ended Sept. 30, the Australian Jewish community recorded more than 30 reports per month of such incidents directed at Jewish community members and communal institutions.

The report, prepared by the incoming president of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, Jeremy Jones, noted that incidents of assault, arson and vandalism took place at a rate of more than 60 percent above the average in past years, and more than 10 percent above the previous record year.

The incidents included:

• a series of firebomb attacks at a synagogue and community centre, including one firebombing while people were on the premises;

• assaults on young Jewish men, one of which resulted in the victim's requiring serious surgery;

• gasoline bombs thrown into the homes of Jewish religious leaders;

• the smashing of windows at synagogues and other communal institutions;

• vandalism at Jewish homes and communal offices; and

• repeated occasions on which people on their way to or from synagogue services were assailed by eggs, rocks, bottles or firecrackers, or were subjected to verbal harassment.

The report also found:

• threats made over the telephone, or through mail, leaflets, posters and e-mail, were recorded at a rate of more than 65 percent above average;

• telephone threats were recorded at the highest rate ever, and were almost five times those of the previous year;

• abusive e-mails were recorded at a rate close to three times the previous average, exceeding the previous tally by 25 percent. E-mail was also a common vehicle for the dissemination of anti-Jewish propaganda;

• anti-Semitic graffiti on Jewish institutions stood at the highest level in five years;

• events in the Middle East repeatedly prompted statements in the mainstream media that were insulting, offensive or disparaging to Jews; and

• anti-Semitic organizations operating in Australia spread hate via the Internet, newsgroups, online clubs and a variety of publications.

The report applauded two states, Victoria and Queensland, for the introduction of comprehensive anti-racism legislation.

It also commended a number of political and religious leaders for speaking up against racism and anti-Semitism.

A decade later, archives return to Croatia

By VLASTA KOVAC
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZAGREB, Croatia — After 10 years away, documents from Croatia's most notorious World War II concentration camp have returned home.

The archives were returned to the Jasenovac museum at a news conference last week.

Some 17,000 Jews were tortured and killed in the camp, known as the "Auschwitz of the Balkans," as were tens of thousands of Serbs, Roma – commonly known as Gypsies – and others.

The collection was taken from the Jasenovac museum for safekeeping during the civil war that ravaged the former Yugoslavia in the early 1990s. It was turned over to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., last year.

The return of the documents appears to improve a situation that had become enmeshed in historic Balkan enmities.

When the war in Yugoslavia started in 1991 and the Yugoslav army entered Jasenovac, Simo Brdar, a Bosnian Serb who had been assistant director of the Jasenovac museum, took the archives to his home in the Serb-run portion of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

He kept the documents there until September 1999, showing them occasionally to foreign news crews.

He then turned them over to Serbian authorities in Bosnia, who did not initially inform Croatia because of resentment lingering from World War II, when Croatia's Nazi puppet state persecuted Serbs.

In October 2000, Bosnian Serbian authorities agreed to give the documents to the Holocaust museum in Washington for a year to restore and catalogue them, a plan that Croatian authorities agreed to.

In late November 2000, hundreds of thousands of documents – including more than 2,000 photographs, 70 taped oral histories and thousands of other historical artifacts – were shipped to the museum.

Some items were missing, and their whereabouts are still unknown. When it became known last year that the Jasenovac documents were transported to Washington, the Serbian Orthodox Church issued a statement saying that "all the most important documents concerning Jasenovac have been removed and taken to a safe place in one of the Serbian monasteries."

The mistrust between Croats and Bosnian Serbs still lingers, but church officials from Serbia, Croatia and America have praised the museum's efforts in preserving the documents.

"Your collective commitment is truly appreciated," Father Irinej Dobrijevic, a senior official with the Serbian church in North America, wrote to the museum.

In addition to keeping copies of the documents for itself, the Holocaust museum is making copies for the Bosnian Serb archives in Banja Luka, the government of Yugoslavia and the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem.

"Researchers around the world for the first time are going to get accurate information about the history of the Holocaust in Croatia, as well as what really happened in the Jasenovac concentration camp," said Arthur Berger, director of communications for the U.S. Holocaust museum in Washington.

The museum's Web site – www.ushmm.org/jasenovac – contains a history of the Holocaust in Croatia, a memorial to the Jasenovac camp and a section of oral histories in English, Serbian and Croatian.

Meanwhile, in Croatia, a permanent exhibition on Jasenovac is being planned for next year.

"There is still a lot of research to be done," says Slavko Goldstein, who heads the Council of the Jasenovac Memorial Grounds, which is made up of members of Croatia's Jewish, Serbian, and Roma communities and Jasenovac survivors.

Holocaust hero dies at 90

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Gerhart Riegner, who first alerted the world to the Nazi plan to exterminate the Jews, died of pneumonia Monday in Switzerland at the age of 90.

Riegner was working for the World Jewish Congress (WJC) in the summer of 1942 when he received intelligence information that the Nazis were planning to murder Europe's Jews.

On Aug. 8, 1942, he cabled U.S. representatives in Switzerland.

"Received alarming report" that the Nazis are discussing a plan "according to which all Jews in countries occupied or controlled by Germany, numbering 3½ to 4 million, should, after deportation and concentration in east, be exterminated," the cable read.

Riegner asked the U.S. government to pass the cable to Rabbi Stephen Wise, president of the World Jewish Congress but the State Department said it would not pass on cables from private sources. Instead, it checked with the Vatican and the Red Cross, both of which said they didn't know of any plans to exterminate Jews.

By the fall of 1942, witness accounts had convinced State Department skeptics of the accuracy of Riegner's report.

But then U.S. president Franklin D. Roosevelt didn't create the War Refugee Board in an attempt to save Jews until January 1944.

"Never did I feel so strongly the sense of abandonment, powerlessness and loneliness as when I sent messages of disaster and horror to the free world and no one believed me," Riegner later wrote.

Despite these feelings – or perhaps because of them – Riegner devoted his life to Jewish causes and human rights.

After World War II, he became active in interfaith efforts and established the main Jewish group involved in dialogue with the Catholic Church, the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations.

The running joke, said Elan Steinberg, the WJC's executive director, was that Riegner, who never married, was effective in dealing with church leaders because he was "a priest devoted to his church, just like them."

Riegner, a lawyer, also was a key player in the early years of the United Nations, where for a time he headed the consortium of nongovernmental organizations.

He was "instrumental is sensitizing the Jewish people to the human rights world at large, while sensitizing the human rights community to the issues of the Jewish people," Steinberg said.

Riegner was born in Germany and immigrated to Switzerland in the 1930s. Yet he never became a Swiss citizen. Instead, he travelled with documents known as a laissez passer, which allows a person to travel from country to country without a passport.

Riegner, who served as secretary-general of the WJC from 1965 to 1983, also was deeply involved in the immigration of North African Jews to Israel. Even had he not sent his cable, "he would still have been a major figure in Jewish affairs," Steinberg said.

Thornhill native enjoys playing the villain

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When actor Michael Coristine landed a guest-starring role as a homicidal villain on the new TV show Smallville, he knew he would have to tap deeply into his creative side.

After all, the amicable 21-year-old is the real-life polar opposite of the character he played.

"It's true that I don't necessarily go around killing people in real life," jokes the Thornhill native, who plays Sean, a teen womanizer stricken with hypothermia who relies on the body heat of the high school girls he kills in order to survive.

"But acting's all about playing and having an imagination, which is why I think the role was able to come off so well."

Indeed, Coristine's guest spot and the show itself have been very successful. Smallville, a revamped version of the DC comic Superman that premiered in the United States in October, has over eight million regular viewers. The show made its Canadian debut Nov. 30 on Global.

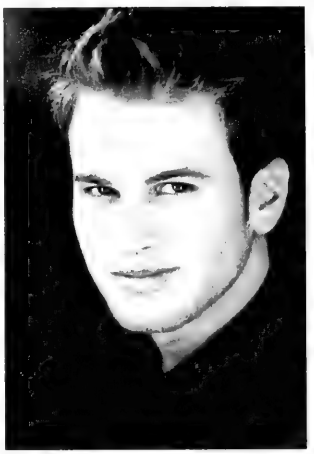
"For me professionally, it was a tremendous experience," said Coristine of acting on the show, which is taped in Vancouver, where he lives.

"You can go to theatre schools for four years, but if you work on set for two weeks, it's almost better."

Theatre school is not the route Coristine has taken and his practical approach seems to be paying off.

Breaking in with a modeling agency when he was 18, Coristine's good looks and raw talent led to spots in commercials.

"When I did commercials, the money was great and I just enjoyed being in front of the camera," Coristine said. "It was enough of an experience to warrant trying some acting to see where it would take me."



Michael Coristine

With a self-described "shameless entertainer" persona and on-set confidence, Coristine began auditioning for movie roles.

His first feature film, Love Disease, a tale of young film students on a quest for love, screened at the Cannes Film Festival in 2000 and won awards at three other festivals.

"For two straight months, I worked in front of the camera exploring different techniques, and it totally made me serious about this business," he says about working on Love Disease.

The experience cemented Coristine's desire to pursue an acting career and he hasn't looked back.

He snagged a small role in the Miramax film Get Over It and is eagerly awaiting the release some time next year of the mini-series Taken, Beyond The Sky, a fantasy/mystery set in World War II and produced by Dreamworks.

While relishing his early success, Coristine realizes the road to fulfilling all his acting goals could have many bumps.

"I'm like any actor – I want to have a regular part in a series or be the lead in a movie," Coristine said.

"But it takes time to get there, a lot of hard work and making lemonade from lemons. There will be people saying 'Nice audition, but no thanks, we don't want you.' But the hard work and skill you have creates your luck."

Hailing from a family of performers – his three sisters have worked in commercials and films – Coristine said the constant support he receives from his family spurs him to succeed.

"The happiest part of me getting work is being able to call home and tell my mom and the rest of my family that I landed a role, because I know they're happier than I am," he said. "It means everything to have people believe in you and encourage you to pursue your dreams."

Coristine doesn't know what his next role will be. He says he narrowly missed winning the lead on a yet-to-be released MTV show called Varsity Blues and he is auditioning regularly.

He said he misses Toronto's sizeable Jewish community while in Vancouver, but hopes to be home some time this month. "I'm not Orthodox, but I'm proud to be Jewish and I feel part of the community," he said.

Women belly dance for peace

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

On Sha'ar Hagolan, a verdant kibbutz on the shores of the Sea of Galilee, a group of women of all sizes and from all walks of life and countries shimmy gracefully as they express themselves in sensual rhythms.

They are belly dancers, both seasoned ones who can turn heads and new practitioners learning the craft.

They have come to Israel to take part in Sha'ar Hagolan's annual dance workshop for peace, where the focus is on belly dancing.

Established four years ago, the workshop attracts Israelis and Palestinians, as well as women from overseas.

Dance of Life, a Vision TV documentary to be aired Monday, Dec. 17 at 9 p.m., examines this ancient art form, first through the experiences of an Egyptian belly dancer in Montreal and then through Sha'ar Hagolan's unique workshop.

This interesting one-hour film was produced and directed by Katherine Frey, whose fascination with the life-affirming qualities of belly dancing grew deeper after she was diagnosed with cancer.

She died soon after she finished Dance of Life.

Maha, a performer and instructor of belly dancing, was born in Giza, near the Egyptian pyramids. A Muslim, she left Egypt to break free from the strictures of Egyptian society.

In Montreal, her home for the past number of years, she performs at a Berber cafe. One of her students and best friends is Jewish.

A striking woman with long, glossy black hair, Maha reflects on belly dancing's history and its cross-cultural appeal.

The scene shifts to Sha'ar Hagolan, which lies in the shadow of the Golan Heights, captured by Israel in the 1967 Six Day War.

Lush with flowers, shrubs and trees, the kibbutz is a perfect setting for a workshop that promotes peace and harmony.

Leila, an Arab dancer living in Paris, leads the women through their paces. Here, in this peaceful corner of Israel, they lay aside their differences and politics. It all sounds too good to be true.

Belly dancing, an Israeli woman observes, is liberating and empowering. Nava, an Israeli of Persian origin, dances with a chador.

As another dancer named Leila explains, belly dancing transcends sexuality and is a dance of peace and joy.

One of the most intriguing aspects of Dance of Life is its exploration of 7,000-year-old artifacts found in a Neolithic settlement near Sha'ar Hagolan.

The artifacts testify to the fact its ancient inhabitants performed ritual dances that predate belly dancing.

As Dance of Life concludes, members of Sha'ar Hagolan, old and young alike, join the dancers on their last night on the kibbutz.

It is a moment of joy where boundaries dissolve.

Nava, an Israeli belly dancer.

Avraham Fried shockles the house at NCSY concert

Popular singer Avraham Fried had the audience dancing, clapping and cheering, often as soon as they heard the first few notes of a song.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Over 2,000 people, from infants in arms to the elderly, descended on Roy Thomson Hall last week for the 21st annual NCSY concert.

The concert's headliner of the concert was popular singer and composer Avraham Fried. His selection of such old songs as Hazak, Chevron Sheli, and the hauntingly beautiful Yivorechecha, as well as newer ones such as Tanz and Adeinu had the audience dancing, clapping and cheering, often as soon as they heard the first few notes of a song.

Fried was accompanied by Toronto's Kol Chaverim Choir, a group of doctors, dentists, accountants and other professionals who have sung together for four years. They have performed several times with Fried, as well as at the annual Hebrew Academy for Special Children concert at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, and they have sung backup on several recordings.

NCSY (National Conference of Synagogue Youth) is the youth wing of the Union of Orthodox Hebrew Congregations. Its initiatives include Torah High, a drop-in centre, shabbatons, programs for people with disabilities, outreach to small communities and the Jewish Culture Club, which offers programs to students in public high schools.

Making his first appearance in Toronto was newcomer Yaakov Shwekey, whose first recording, Shwekey, is a best-seller. The audience obviously was pleased to see him, greeting him with enthusiastic whoops and cheers.

Over 2,000 people turn out for 21st annual NCSY concert

While his performing lacks the finesse of Fried's, a shortcoming that hopefully can be overcome with more experience, he has a powerful voice, with a wide range that complemented his selections, rousing versions of Sos Tasis, Yossi Green's Shamatti, and Shehecheyanu, and a gentle Rachem, by composer Pinky Weber.

Both Shwekey and Fried were accompanied on several numbers by the 29-member Eitz Chaim Boys' Choir, led by choirmaster Yehuda Gilden and choir co-ordinator Larry Mittelmann.

In a surprise move, the modest Gilden, who has long donated his time and effort as part of Toronto's Jewish music scene, was honoured by NCSY with a plaque.

Ben Sanders, together with his friends Ezra Grossman and Luca and Marco Dissimino, presented a selection of classical violin pieces. Ben was the subject of a recent article in The CJN about how he had refused an opportunity to take part in a concert at New York's Carnegie Hall because it was to be held on Shabbat.

The concert ended on a high note, when Shwekey, the two choirs and the Nafshenu Orchestra, which has played back-up for many of the NCSY concerts, joined Fried in a rousing, foot-stomping performance of one of Fried's trademark pieces, Yerushalayim.

The evening was interspersed with personal stories by NCSY members and pictures of Israel flashed on a screen behind the performers.

The concert was held the day after three suicide bombings in Israel. Master of ceremonies Zale Newman said the Vaad Harabonim had asked that there be a moment of silent prayer.

Museum on the range

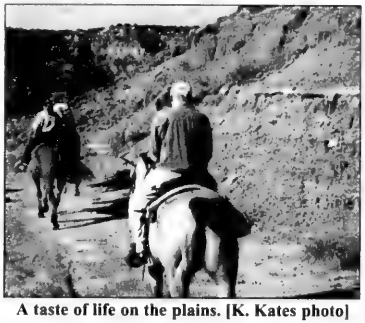
By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

AMARILLO, Tex. — When you think of great museum cities, Amarillo in the heart of the Texas Panhandle may not come to mind, but it should.

There are a number of informative museums on the range, including Texas' largest one devoted to history, the Panhandle-Plains Historical Museum in neighbouring Canyon.

Very impressive for an area where the claim to fame in 1893 was a population of 500 to 600 people and 50,000 head of cattle.

A day could be spent exploring the Panhandle-Plains Historical Museum dedicated to the rugged settlers of the northwest region of the state. Exhibits include art, transportation, petroleum, paleontology and western heritage.



A taste of life on the plains. [K. Kates photo]

You can go back in time at the new interactive environment, People of the Plains: Experiments in Living. Or stroll down the streets of Pioneer Town and visit the school, the blacksmith shop, the milliner, the livery stable and, of course, the local salon.

The Don D. Harrington Petroleum Wing at the Panhandle-Plains recreates oil boom of the '20s and '30s, housing an authentic wooden cable tool drilling rig from the 1920s.

The Don Harrington Discovery Center located on the grounds of the Harrington Regional Medical Center is a family oriented hands-on science, human body and technology museum, and home to a planetarium and aquarium.

Amarillo is the former helium capital of the world, so it's only fitting that in front of the centre is the Helium Monument and time capsule, commemorating the 100th anniversary of the discovery of this inert gas.

America's oldest equine breed, the quarter horse, is paid tribute to at the American Quarter Horse Museum with displays, videos, changing exhibits, a research centre and the Quarter Horse Hall of Fame. Visitors to the museum can view a handcrafted presidential saddle made by Richard Oliver of Amarillo's Oliver Saddle Shop. Commissioned by Tennessee cattleman Lee McCormick, it is on display at the museum until President George W. Bush leaves office.

If being in Amarillo makes you yearn to be a cowpoke, then you are in luck. Cowboy Morning at the Figure 3 Ranch was developed by former politician Tom Christian and his wife Anne to give tourists a taste of life on the plains in the past. You journey by horse-drawn wagon to a campfire on the rim of the Palo Duro Canyon, where you can try your hand at roping, branding or getting down and dirty by entering the cow chip-throwing contest.

If you have a mad desire to be John Wayne or Calamity Jane, then you can mount a horse from the Old West Stables and ride the trails at the base of the second largest canyon in America, the Palo Duro Canyon State Park. Be forewarned – make sure to wear long pants. Palo Duro is Spanish for "hard wood" for the canyon's many juniper trees that may scratch as you manoeuvre through the narrow passageways.

During the summer since 1966, the Palo Duro Canyon State Park has presented Texas, the Paul Green Musical Romance of the Panhandle History, staged under the stars.

The Cadillac Ranch is not a car dealership on the plains, but a collection of 10 old, graffiti-adorned Cadillacs buried nose down in a field, the brainchild of Stanley Marsh III, an eccentric resident of Amarillo. The homage to the American luxury car is located at Interstate 40 at Arnot Road, west of the Amarillo city limits. Just follow the other tourists and don't bother looking for a sign because there isn't one, which is rather ironic since Marsh's other hobby is posting signs with quotes and nonsensical sayings all over town.

Other sites to see include the elegantly restored Santa Fe Building and the company's original railroad station, stately homes and mansions, historic Route 66 and its numerous antique shops, Elkins Ranch with its cattle drives for Old Hands and City Slickers alike, and the new Firewater Water Park. Daphne Tour and Travel can arrange customized tours for families or groups; call 806-372-3535 or visit www.daphnetours.com.

Amarillo has more than 30 hotels and motels, including the locally owned, upscale Ambassador Hotel, where Oprah's celebrity guests stayed while taping her television show during her infamous trial for allegedly slandering the cattle industry. The Big Texan Hotel promises the best hospitality in the west, big comfy beds, big time family entertainment in the Big Texan Cowboy Palace and a really big rattlesnake on display in their gift shop.

Make sure to say howdy to Hody "Long Bow" Porterfield, who takes great pride in telling native American legends and lore. If you ask nicely, he may take you to his tepee on the Big Texan's grounds.

For more information, contact the Amarillo Convention and Visitor Council at 800-692-1338 or go to www.amarillo-cvb.org or www.visitamarillotx.org.

Young editor flies to the top of trade magazine

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At the tender age of 29, Samantha Yaffe is riding high.

Several months ago, she was appointed editor-in-chief of Playback, the Toronto-based bible of Canada's film and television broadcasting industry.

A 1999 graduate of Ryerson's program in journalism, she snagged the position after less than 2½ years on staff.

Asked to account for her meteoric rise, she said, "In a lot of ways, I was in the right place at the right time."

Hired by Playback as a writer, Yaffe moved up the ladder rapidly. After her promotion to associate news editor, she moved into the roles of news editor, associate editor and managing editor.

And last August, she was appointed editor-in-chief.

"I navigated my way," said Yaffe, a graduate of Forest Hill Collegiate Institute and Concordia University (communication and filmstudies and philosophy).

"One thing led to another. All these positions were vacant, and it was a question of pushing through," she added.

Of course, Yaffe proved her mettle as a reporter before assuming greater responsibilities.

For example, she covered a CBC licence renewal hearing in French, although she was not familiar with the language, and brought back the goods.

As she put it: "I found people who looked approachable and asked questions."

Impressed by her courage and enterprise, Yaffe's boss singled her out as a talent to cultivate.

Ironically, she joined Playback without any intention of making a career of it.

Samantha Yaffe

"I took a big chance coming here," she said, explaining that her real interest lay in mainstream rather than in trade journalism. "I was afraid I would pigeon-hole myself. I thought I'd stay for a few months and move on."

To Yaffe's surprise, Playback was a congenial fit, allowing her to draw on her strength as a journalist and her interest in film. (When she was younger, she wrote, produced and directed The Day Celeste Left Work Feeling Sassy, a sardonic short about a woman primping herself for a big date).

Prior to joining Playback, she was a general assignment intern and part-time city desk reporter at The Toronto Sun.

"I loved working there. I liked the co-operative environment."

And the best story she ever wrote, a feature about ear implants for the deaf, was published by the Sun. "I felt I had grown as a person after writing it."

While studying at Ryerson, Yaffe toiled as a copy editor for Mutual Fund Review, which she now dismisses as "just a job," and as a relationship columnist for Freewheelin' Magazine, which she thoroughly enjoyed.

Before enrolling in Ryerson's two-year graduate course, she reported for Frank, the gossip sheet.

"I wrote about people in lofty places," she said with a conspiratorial grin. "I'm not ashamed of it. It was a valuable experience. I learned a lot about alternative ways of accessing information, an interesting lesson in journalism."

Born in Toronto, the second daughter of Jerry and Elaine Yaffe, the owners of a medical equipment company, Yaffe describes her current job on Playback as "an ongoing and insane challenge."

A casual, personable person given to wearing jeans and blouses in her cluttered, windowless office in downtown Toronto, Yaffe has already begun to put her stamp on Playback.

She wants it to be more analytical and contextual, as well as better balanced between Canada and the rest of the world. She wants to run more columns from outside contributors.

These improvements, she believes, will bolster its integrity. As it is, she claims, Playback is a "must-read for anyone in the industry."

Once she has established herself in the editor's seat, Yaffe, who regularly works a 50-hour week, intends to contribute her fair share of stories to the biweekly newspaper.

She particularly enjoys writing "on-set" pieces about films in the making and articles about issues of the day as defined by industry leaders.

Newly wed, Yaffe and Bobby Green, a print broker and a Maccabiah Games athlete in fast-pitch baseball, were married in August, the same week she was named editor-in-chief of Playback.

"What a week it was! I was flying high."

Popular Israeli writer's stories available in English

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the past decade, young Israelis have been lapping up Etgar Keret's books about everyday life in Israel.

His three collections of short stories, Pipelines, Gaza Blues and Missing Kissinger, have risen to the top of the best-seller list, selling 50,000 copies apiece, a phenomenal number in a country as small as Israel.

Yediot Achronot, Israel's biggest daily, praised Missing Kissinger as one of the 50 best Hebrew-language books of all time.

In recognition of his talent, he received the 1997 Prime Minister's Award.

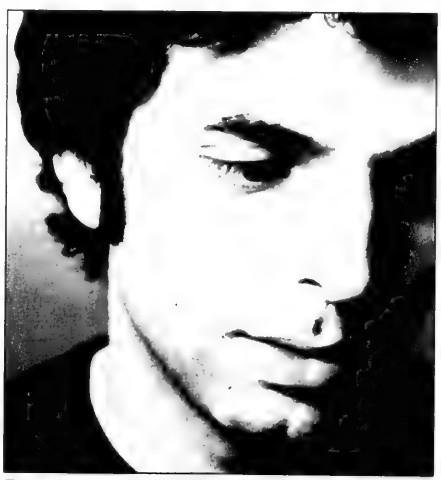
Now, with the publication of The Bus Driver Who Wanted To be God & Other Short Stories (St. Martin's Press), readers in North America can enjoy Keret's wry, whimsical humour in English.

In all, his stories have been translated into 17 languages, including German, French, Italian, Russian and Arabic. And 50 short films, in Hebrew, English and Polish, have been produced based on his stories.

Keret, who writes for an audience ranging in age from approximately 17 to 30, was here recently to attend the International Festival of Authors.

His stories, in colloquial Hebrew, are a mixture of the real, the fanciful and the profane. In person, he comes across as shy and soft-spoken.

Keret, 34, has a loyal following because, as he explained in an interview, his heroes are plain and down-to-earth. "They are human and fallible," he says.



Etgar Keret received the Prime Minister's Award in 1997.

Readers also find him appealing because political issues are of secondary importance in his stories.

"When my characters wake up in the morning, they don't think about peace in the Middle East, but whether they'll be late for work and be fired."

That doesn't mean that Keret's work is devoid of politics. Several of his tales have touched on the current Palestinian uprising, but from unusual angles.

The son of Orna and Ephraim Keret, East European Holocaust survivors, he was born in the Tel Aviv suburb of Ramat Gan.

He has two siblings, both older than himself: a brother who's a computer engineer in Tel Aviv and a sister who lives in Mea Shearim, Jerusalem's haredi neighbourhood, and has 10 children.

A math and physics major in high school, Keret began writing seriously in the army, when he discovered that he was better off keeping his mouth shut than complaining.

The incident that led him to that conclusion occurred on his first day of basic training in 1986, when he got into a dispute with an obstreperous sergeant-major. To vent his frustration and anger, he committed pen to paper.

Within a few years, newspapers and magazines were publishing his stories regularly.

Since then, Keret, a bachelor, has earned a living as a writer, working when the muse inspires him."I don't write every day, but only when I feel like it."

He never knows how well a story will go. As he put it: "There are stories I have written in three days, and stories that have taken two years to write."

Keret, who shares a flat near the beach with a girlfriend, writes screenplays as well.

His script for Skin Deep, a film about relationships and unintended consequences in which his father and brother appeared, won the 1996 Israeli Oscar.

His film credits also include Total Love, which focuses on Israeli backpackers in India. It was released last year.

For the last five years, he has taught a screenwriting course at Tel Aviv University, where he never finished his degree.

In addition, Keret has written comedy for the Israeli version of Saturday Night Live.

Israeli television humour, he noted, is more British than North American.

Recently, Keret ventured far from his usual subject matter by composing an essay on the intifadah for the serious German weekly Die Zeit.

His thesis is that Israelis and Palestinians both regard themselves as "ultimate victims" and liken themselves to a ball being kicked around in a soccer game.

Like most Israelis, he is pessimistic. "The intifadah will continue. Before they're ready to negotiate, Israelis and Palestinians will have to reach the breaking point in terms of suffering."

"The conflict is really between extreme voices and moderate voices on both sides," said Keret, who, in the last general election, voted for Green Leaf, a secular, liberal party on whose platform his brother ran.

In general, though, Keret is not identified with any particular political party. "Not a single one matches my views."

Good marriages need consistent loving energy

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Emotional infidelity can be as damaging to a marriage as physical infidelity, says a U.S. marriage counsellor, family mediator and author.

"Our emotional selves are as intimate as our sexual selves," M. Gary Neuman, said at a recent lecture sponsored by the Yetta Nashman Jewish Family Institute at the Village Shul.

We only have so much emotional energy, and if we use it outside of our marriage, we have less for our marriage, said Neuman,whose latest book is Emotional Infidelity: How to Avoid it and 10 Other Secrets to a Great Marriage.

"I take issue with someone who believes [a certain relationship] is okay because it is not physical.

"Even if a relationship never turns into a physical affair, that does not mean a couple is not involved from an emotional standpoint. You could be diverting energy that you need for your spouse."

Marriages need an incredible amount of consistent, loving energy, and at the end of the day you need to bring that chemistry home, he said.

Neuman, who has appeared on The Oprah Show, Today and The View and has been featured in People and Time magazines, told the crowd of mostly young married couples that the average couple only talks about four minutes a day.

"If we operated our businesses the way we run our marriages, we'd be bankrupt.

"The oral tradition is all about talking to and challenging each other. You need the other person to enlighten you. Even if you do not agree, you can learn from the experience."

A good marriage should contain certain love points, said Neuman. "First of all, touch your spouse – a kiss, a hug, a small gesture – at least five times daily. It means so much to know that someone is thinking of you.

"You should create 45-minute blocks of alone time at least four times a week so you can talk and reconnect, you should have a weekly date night to go out and have a good time, and you should have a monthly honeymoon night.

"You got married because you want to be happy, and it is the responsibility of spouses to make each other happy," he said.

Spouses need to appreciate and find love in one another, Neuman said. "There is no greater value to be found than in the marital relationship."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have been told that my iron is borderline low. What foods are high in iron?

A. Red meat is the best source and should be eaten in combination with vitamin-C rich foods to increase the absorption rate. If you're having a burger or a steak, have some broccoli, cauliflower, green pepper, tomato, orange juice or cantaloupe at the same time. After red meat, other good sources of iron are cream of wheat cereal, fortified dry cereals, spinach, beets, raisins, broccoli, chicken livers, lentils and kidney beans.

Q. I have been told by my doctor to take flax seed, but I'm not sure how to buy it, or how to eat it.

A. Flax seed is very healthful; it has anti-carcinogenic properties, is excellent at helping to achieve bowel regularity and contains omega-3 fatty acids. Flax seeds look like reddish brown sesame seeds. Use them ground or milled, sprinkled over cereal, mixed into tuna, on top of salads or stir fries or on toast. I put mine on my toast; I take one piece of toast, add almond butter or pressed cottage cheese, and on top I put as much flax seed as I can add without it falling off (usually about one tablespoon). The cheese or almond butter acts as the glue. Flax seed really doesn't have a flavour, just a nutty texture. Take one or two tablespoons daily, and refrigerate once the package is open.

Q. My nine-month-old loves to eat. I am concerned about the volume of food and formula she consumes. She is clearly chubbier than most babies her age. She doesn't seem satisfied when I offer less food or less formula. Would it be okay to dilute her formula by adding more water and less formula to bottles?

A. Absolutely not. You don't want to start adjusting appropriate formula-making recommendations. I would suggest you discuss your child's intake with your pediatrician or a pediatric dietitian, and evaluate whether her weight or consumption is a concern. If it is, they will be able to make specific recommendations for your child's needs.

Hapoel Tel Aviv's European dream continues

By ASHER GOLDBERG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

MOSCOW — Hapoel Tel Aviv braved minus 14 degree Celsius temperatures in Moscow to achieve what had seemed a nearly impossible task, beating host Lokomotiv Moscow 1-0 for a 3-1 aggregate win in the UEFA Cup last week.

The victory takes the club to the last-16 stage of the competition, to be played on Feb. 21 and 28. A draw, scheduled for Feb. 14, will determine Hapoel's next opponents.

Hapoel's players looked like seasoned European campaigners in the freezing conditions of Ramenskoye near Moscow as they played a textbook game to secure the victory.

Striker Milan Osterc scored early in the second half to stamp his mark on the game, which was very evenly contested by both teams.

Osterc had come close to putting the visitors on the scoreboard in the seventh minute when he outplayed two Lokomotiv defenders, but fired wide from just inside the penalty box.

Lokomotiv gradually seized the initiative and went on to control the entire first half, but was unable to capitalize on its domination.

In the 15th minute, Marat Izmailov's left-foot kick from the edge of the box was cleared by Hapoel's goalkeeper, Shavit Elimelech.

Four minutes later, Hapoel defenders stopped a solo left-flank effort from striker Maxim Buznikin just two metres from the left post.

The visitors replied with rare counterattacks, which were of no danger for Moscow goaltender Ruslan Nigmatulin.

Their best chance in the first half came in the 31st minute, but Sergey Cleschenko's kick from 10 metres went wide.

Three minutes into the second half, Ostrec silenced the crowd of 11,000 spectators with a goal that turned out to be the winner.

The Slovenian international, who also headed in an opener in the first-leg game at Bloomfield three weeks ago when Hapoel won 2-1, connected with a pass from Ilan Bachar from the right and scored into the lower left corner past a diving Nigmatulin.

With nothing to lose, the home side went on the offensive, forcing Elimelech to make a stunning save to stop Dmitry Loskov's power shot from 17 metres.

Lokomotiv's best chance to equalize came in the 85th minute, when Buznikin missed a pass from the right and then Izmailov volleyed it wide from just three metres. Loskov missed a clear chance to score a consolation goal in the fading seconds of injury time.

Hapoel's players began celebrations with the final whistle, massing in the middle of the pitch, jumping in delight and trading hugs.

Many of the players removed their shirts despite the Arctic conditions.

"This was a heroic performance by our players, they all played like men and I'm truly touched," said coach Dror Kashtan. "This is the greatest achievement by an Israeli coach and I really have not been able to take in what my boys have done for me and for Hapoel Tel Aviv. To play against a team from the first rank in Europe at such a level and to manage to overcome them is a huge thing. I take my hat off to them."

Yossi Abuksis, who was suspended from the match after picking up a yellow card in the previous leg, was one of the tensest men in Saturn Stadium. "I thank God for having brought me to Hapoel Tel Aviv. This is my happiest season," he said.

"I almost cried," said Elimelech. "I'll never forget this for the rest of my life – an Israeli team winning in the snows of Moscow. We won't stop now, we want to go on winning. The last-16 is not enough for us."

Lokomotiv coach Yuri Semin was full of praise for Hapoel. "Tel Aviv is an excellent outfit with a good tactical lineup. I don't want to blame anybody in my own team for this defeat," he said.

The result has given Israeli clubs the highest-ever points ranking in Europe, with a coefficient of 6.333.

So far Israel – mainly due to Hapoel's achievements – is ranked eighth on the continent, ahead of much more illustrious names like France and Belgium.

Only Spain, Greece, Germany, Portugal, Italy, England and the Netherlands are ahead of Israel in the club rankings.

Israel's aggregate coefficient for the past five years is 19.333, an important figure that will be used when allocating places for club sides in the future.

Thousands of happy fans greeted Hapoel Tel Aviv players and coaches at Ben-Gurion International Airport on their return from Moscow.

The government set up a stage in an airport hangar and conducted an official welcoming ceremony. As the players left the airport, they were welcomed by thousands of singing, dancing and celebrating fans, most dressed in red, the team's colour.

Domb told reporters that in his pre-game talk, Kashtan had linked the recent suicide bombings in Israel that killed dozens of civilians and the match.

"The nation is crying tears of sorrow. Let them cry tears of joy," Domb said.

Kashtan called the victory the greatest accomplishment ever by an Israeli soccer team.

The coach smiled when asked about his pre-game appeal, admitting, "Of course you play on the emotions of the players."

רוץ ילד, רוץ מאת: אורי אורלב
כתר הוצאה לאור.

במשפט אייכמן העיד הסופר ק' צטניק כי את אשר התרחש במחנות ההשמדה ניתן לתאר רק במושגים של התרחשויות "על פלנטה אחרת". משג "הפלנטה האחרת" מבטא את הקושי בתיאור משהו שהשפה אינה מסוגלת לבטא.

מסיבות ברורות, הרוצחים ומשתפי הפעולה, גם אם אולצו להעיד בבית משפט, לא גילו את האמת. רובם, כידוע, הכחישו את השתתפותם הפעילה או את אחריותם לרצח. המקור היחיד אם כן לפרק נוראי זה בהיסטוריה שלנו הם הניצולים. אך בשל הכאב הבלתי יתואר שכרוך בשיחזור השואה, רבים מהם בחרו שלא לדבר.

משפט אייכמן ב- 1961 עשה יותר מכל לפיתוח המודעות שלא מדובר בפלנטה אחרת אלא באנשים רגילים, שברצון רב, נרתמו למבצעי קציר דמים של מליוני אנשים רגילים אחרים. במדינת ישראל נעשו בעבר ונעשים היום נסיונות כנים להשריש את השואה בתודעה הקולקטיבית של האומה. מוסד "יד ושם" הוקם על-ידי כנסת ישראל למטרת תעוד השואה, נקבע יום זיכרון רשמי לשואה, עשרות אתרי הנצחה נזורים בארץ ומאות יצירות ספרותיות הפכו את השואה לחלק מהותי ממורשתה ההיסטורית-אזרחית-תרבותית של מדינת ישראל. המאמצים להנציח את השואה ממשיכים להעסיק את החברה הישראלית, כולל הנסיונות לספר לילדים, מה באמת קרה "ושם".

אין ספק שהצלחת המחבר בתאור מציאות שעולה על הדימיון היא דווקא השימוש בסגנון יבש ועובדתי, נטול מרגש; כמעט קטטוני. רוץ ילד, רוץ מומלץ לילדים בני עשר ומעלה.

2 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
1 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips

1/2 cup coarsely chopped walnuts
1/2 cup coarsely chopped pecans

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 13 x 9-inch cake pan.

In a bowl, mix together flour, baking powder and salt. In another bowl, beat butter and brown sugar until smooth and creamy. Add eggs one at a time, beating until incorporated. Stir in vanilla. Blend in flour mixture. Stir in chocolate and peanut butter chips, walnuts and pecans.

NOBLE NAPOLEONS

Base:
40 graham wafers
1 pkg. (6 oz/170 g) chocolate pudding and pie filling (not instant)
2 cups milk
1 cup whipping (35%) cream, whipped
Topping:
2 tbsp. butter or margarine
1 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips
Frosting:
1 tbsp. butter or margarine, softened
1 tbsp. milk
1/4 cup confectioner's (icing) sugar, sifted

Line a 13 x 9-inch cake pan with wax paper.

Base: In prepared pan, place half of the graham wafers in a single layer, cutting end pieces to fit. Set aside.

Prepare pudding mix according to package directions, using 2 cups milk. Place a layer of plastic wrap directly on pudding (to prevent a skin from forming) and chill. Fold in whipped cream. Spread evenly over wafers in pan. Cover with remaining graham wafers, cutting as necessary to cover top completely. Chill several hours or overnight.

Topping: In a saucepan over low heat, melt butter and chocolate chips. Spread evenly over top layer of graham wafers. Chill until chocolate is firm.

Frosting: Mix together butter, milk and confectioner's sugar until blended and smooth. Using a cake decorator's bag, make a checkerboard design over top of chocolate. Chill until set. Before serving, leave at room temperature for about 15 minutes, then cut into bars. Store, covered, in refrigerator. Makes 36.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

The Best Medicine

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

MSH Scientist played key role in Nobel Prize-winning discovery

Mount Sinai Hospital can take pride in this year's Nobel Prize in Physiology or Medicine, Dr. Lee Hartwell, President and Director of the Fred Hutchinson Cancer Research Center due to the creative role Dr. Joseph Culotti, a Senior Scientist at the SLRI, played in this groundbreaking research. "I was the first Ph.D. student in Lee's lab in the early 1970s," says Dr. Culotti, "to use yeast to study the cell cycle with genetic methods." This work laid the foundation for the prestigious Nobel Prize that selected Hartwell for his 'pioneering work in yeast genetics'.

In a series of experiments in 1970-1971, Drs. Hartwell, Reid, and Culotti isolated yeast cells in which genes controlling the cell cycle were altered (mutated). By using this approach, they was able to identify dozens of genes specifically involved in cell cycle control, so called CDC-genes (cell division cycle genes). One of these genes, designated CDC28 by Hartwell, controls the first step in the progression through the G1-phase of the cell cycle, called 'start'. "Cells that pass 'start' become committed to completing the cell cycle and dividing. This work is very important because the way cells decide when and how to multiply is fundamental to understanding how cancer cells proliferate," explains Dr. Culotti. "Scientists didn't understand this before these studies."

In recognition of his contribution to the pioneering work of Dr. Hartwell, Dr. Culotti has been invited to attend the Nobel Prize Award ceremony in Stockholm, on December 10, 2001.

Significant corporate contribution boosts diabetes research in Canada

Allows for unique studies in high risk Canadian populations

Mount Sinai Hospital and Eli Lilly Canada Inc. were delighted to announce a partnership that will boost Canadian diabetes research for the next five years. The Eli Lilly Canada Research Program in Diabetes, will continue to build on our research in evaluating the incidence and other aspects of diabetes in native Canadians and other minority populations.

"This funding allows us to further our research to evaluate the changing face of diabetes and its acute and long-term impact on Canadians in general and, specifically, minority populations such as native Canadians. Program studies will lead to a better understanding of the incidence of diabetes in these populations and will hopefully allow for development of innovative prevention and treatment strategies," said Dr. Bernard Zinman, Director of the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes at Mount Sinai Hospital and professor of medicine at the University of Toronto pictured here at the press conference.

Dr. Zindel Segal assumes Morgan Firestone Chair in Psychotherapy at Mount Sinai Hospital

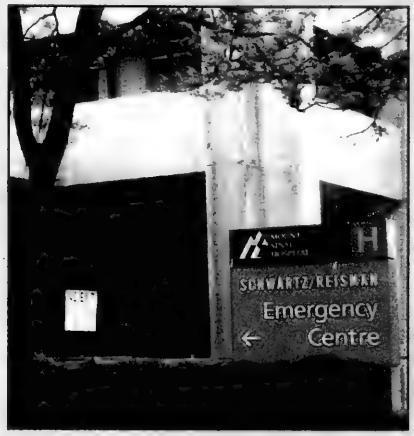
Dr. Segal will also provide leadership in psychotherapy and psychotherapy research and related educational activities within Mount Sinai Hospital.

The Holiday Season – A Time For Joy...or Not

We have all had our very good and very bad experiences during the holiday season. For some, one holiday event will be a visit to the Emergency Department. We talked to Dr. Howard Ovens, Director of Mount Sinai Hospital's Schwartz/Reisman Emergency Centre.



Schwartz/Reisman Emergency Centre

Q. I had to go to Emergency last holiday season and it was incredibly busy. Isn't there anything you can do about this problem?

A. Emergency departments are staffed for average volumes. All ERs gear up in various ways for peak periods but resources are tested to the limit. Besides the financial and human resources we can apply, our space is fixed and that places an absolute limit on the number and severity of cases that we can handle. We do the best we can. You can help by assessing for yourself whether or not a visit to Emergency is required or if there are other options.

Q. What should I do if I have a health problem and my doctor's office is closed for the holidays?

A. Many doctors will have someone covering for their practice even over the holidays. If there is no one covering and someone has chest pain, shortness of breath, collapses or is unconscious, then you should call 911. For lesser problems or if you are unsure whether the problem can wait or if you think it might be solved over the phone, you can call the Ontario Government's telephone service Telehealth Ontario. This is a free, confidential telephone service you can call to get health advice or general health information from a Registered Nurse. Their toll-free number is 1-866-797-0000.

Q. I think my prescription may run out during the holidays. Can I drop by at Emergency to get a new one written?

A. The best solution is to arrange for prescription refills before the holidays. Emergency departments will only provide prescriptions for medication if not taking the drug is dangerous to the patient and then enough medication will be prescribed for only a short period until your own doctor returns. If you do decide to go to the Emergency Department, you will have to wait while more urgent cases are seen, so plan ahead.

Canada backs anti-Israel votes

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Again this year, Canada has voted for several United Nations resolutions which censure Israel, and while disconcerting to Jewish community leaders, Canada's stand is not seen as a shift in policy toward the Jewish state.

General Assembly resolutions

Before the end of the calendar year, Canada is expected to vote for several more measures that Jewish officials consider highly biased against Israel.

As in previous years, Canada will vote on at least 19 recurring resolutions relating to Israel and the Palestinians before the UN's year-end break.

Canada's voting pattern on these matters is consistent with previous years, says David Goldberg of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

"They may be consistently wrong, but there's no change in [Canada's] policy," Goldberg said, adding that General Assembly resolutions have no binding authority, in contrast to most measures adopted by the UN's Security Council.

On Dec. 10, Canada approved, or abstained from, 12 resolutions adopted by the General Assembly, all but one of which come up annually for renewal.

Canada will vote on at least seven other measures critical of Israel in the coming days, and is expected to support most of them.

The sole new resolution this year relating to Israel was one calling on the Jewish state to stop "obstructing" the movement of aid to Palestinians.

The News in Brief

Canada

Skinheads Appeal

VANCOUVER — The British Columbia Court of Appeal has been asked to reduce the sentences of two skinheads who were given stiff jail terms for their roles in the beating death of a Sikh temple caretaker. Radoslaw Synderek, 26, and Lee Nikkel, 20, received 12-year and 15-year terms respectively when the judge applied the Criminal Code's enhanced sentencing provisions for hate crimes. Synderek's lawyer argued the penalty was too harsh, while Nikkel's lawyer suggested the sentence was excessive given his client was a youth at the time. The two assailants were part of a gang of five men, linked to the skinhead group White Power, who beat to death Nirmal Singh Gill outside the Guru Nanak Temple in January 1998.

Bronfman Fellowships

TORONTO — Applications are being accepted for the annual Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel. The five-week program, which begins July 8, 2002, is for potential leaders entering Grade 12, who represent a variety of Jewish backgrounds and are interested in Jewish identity issues. For information go to www.bronfman.org or call 518-475-7212. Deadline for applications is Jan. 31, 2002.

Israel

No Guns: Hamas

JERUSALEM — Hamas has forbidden its members from using guns in disputes with Palestinian Authority forces. The order, which came as Palestinian police arrested some Hamas members, was aimed at preventing a Palestinian civil war.

Protocols TV Show

JERUSALEM — The Anti-Defamation League is asking Arab leaders here to denounce an anti-Semitic television series. Many Egyptian television stations plan to air a 30-part dramatic series based on the 19th-century forgery Protocols of the Elders of Zion, which details a Jewish plot to rule the world. The series portrays the book as fact.

World

Pleads Not Guilty

LOS ANGELES — A local rabbi pleaded not guilty Dec. 5 to charges he molested three of his male students. Rabbi Mordechai YomTov was arrested on 10 felony counts for the alleged acts against the boys, aged 8 to 10. Police appealed to the public for information about any other related incidents that may have occurred during the past seven years. A preliminary hearing was set for Dec. 17.

Popular Museum

BERLIN — Berlin's new Jewish Museum has become the most-visited museum in Germany, according to its director. Michael Blumenthal said last week that more than 217,000 visitors have passed through the halls of the building since the museum opened in September.

JCCs to Close

LOS ANGELES — Five of the seven Jewish community centres in the Los Angeles area will be shut down next year in the face of a $3-million deficit. In another development, the Jewish Federation of Greater Los Angeles, long the major financial supporter of the JCCs, is falling short of its annual fund-raising goal and has fired about 40 of its 150 employees.

Voting Extended

NEW YORK — The World Zionist Congress has extended the deadline for voter registration to Jan. 18, 2002. Registration forms for WZC elections are traveling through the same Washington post office where anthrax was found last month, and some are still being disinfected and quarantined. Elections slated for next year will determine who will sit on the congress, a group regarded as the official representative of Diaspora Jewry that determines the policies of the World Zionist Organization.

War Crimes Case

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Office of Special Investigations (OSI) has asked a court to deport a former SS collaborator for participating in the wartime persecution of Jews. The OSI alleges that in 1943, Mykola Wasylyk, 78, served as a guard at SS Labour Camp Trawniki in occupied Poland and at the SS Labour Camp Budzyn. A federal court judge stripped Wasylyk, currently a resident of Ellenville, N.Y., of his citizenship in July.

Leader Re-elected

WARSAW — Jerzy Kichler has been re-elected president of the Union of Jewish Religious Communities in Poland. Kichler, from Wroclaw in southwest Poland, was chosen for a second term at a recent meeting in Warsaw of 74 delegates representing eight organized Jewish communities from around the country and several local communal branches.

Leader Elected

MOSCOW — A businessman and Middle East political analyst was elected president of the Russian Jewish Congress. Yevgeny Satanovsky, 42, replaces Leonid Nevzlin, who was recently elected to the upper house of the Russian Parliament.

Hung Jury in Rabbi's Murder Trial

PITTSBURGH — The second trial of a Pittsburgh man accused of murdering a Canadian rabbi more than 14 years ago has ended in another mistrial.

After three days of deliberations earlier this month, jurors told Judge Terrence O'Brie they couldn't reach a unanimous verdict on whether Steven Tielsch killed Rabbi Neal Rosenblum in April, 1986.

District Attorney Stephen Zappala had not decided if there will be a third trial.

Tielsch faced either third-degree murder or acquittal. His first trial in February also ended in a hung jury.

Rabbi Rosenblum, 24, an Orthodox Jew from Toronto, was visiting his in-laws for Passover when he was shot while returning from evening prayers. He was dressed in a black suit, long black raincoat, and fedora as he left a synagogue.

Passengers in a passing car stopped him to ask for directions, and then shot the young rabbi four times. Before being taken to the hospital, where he died four hours later, Rabbi Rosenblum identified some details of the car.

Prosecutors argued the murder was a hate crime.

Subsidy to reduce cost for missions to Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new subsidy by an anonymous donor will substantially reduce the cost for missions to Israel run by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The donor, who does not want to be identified, is prepared to pay up to $1,000 per person for 2002, beginning with an upcoming UJA Federation-Mizrachi trip, said Howard English, the federation's director of communications. With the new subsidy, the cost for the February mission will be $1,395 for anyone who has not participated in a UJA Federation mission since September.

Other subsidies also contribute to the low cost. Without them, the price would be close to $3,000 per person, English said.

The mission, which runs Feb. 17 to 24, includes airfare, hotel, site visits and most meals. (An information evening will be held Jan. 16.)

"This is a tremendously exciting development," English said of the new subsidy. "For years we've been told as an organization that we can get hundreds, if not thousands, of additional community members to visit Israel if only we could get the price down. Now we've gotten the price down to what is truly an unbelievably low level."

English said the donor is "a well-known philanthropist" and very generous man. "He believes that it's in Israel's interests for more people to visit and that it's an important component of solidarity activity.

"It's not just a matter of adding economic fuel," English added. "It's a matter of standing side by side with the people of Israel and practising more than just armchair solidarity."

Assuming the mantle

The UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has recently undergone a change in its governance structure. "Governance" is a relatively new term, minted in the mid to late '80s by organizational sociologists to express the more plain-language concept of how a place is to be run.

The new structure contains changes in both nomenclature and function. The lay leader who was called the president last year is now called the chair of the board. And the top professional leader, the chief "civil servant," as it were, of the community, formerly the executive director, is now the president. There are other changes as well.

These changes may cause some confusion for the community, at least in the short term. To abate that confusion requires an individual familiar with and adept at handling transitions.

Ralph Shedletsky, the federation's new chair of the board, is such a man. He is an organizational psychologist who spends a great deal of his time counselling individuals through challenging, often very difficult employment-related transitions of their own.

I met Shedletsky in his office last week. He looks every bit the five-day-a-week jogger that I soon discovered he was: trim, fit, youthful-looking and agile. He was at ease and relaxed as we talked in his mid-town office.

"This is an unusual time, on two levels," Shedletsky offered, "because of the transition of the governance structure: participation by donors in a more intimate way in development and planning in federation itself, as well as the way in which federation is expected to work now in terms of strategic planning with the board members and executive."

Shedletsky pointed out, "There are very significant community goals – huge capital expansion – that we are involved with."

But candidly and somewhat refreshingly, he suggested his main contribution will not be in helping to find that capital.

"We have very strong people that are taking leadership [in that area] and God knows they don't need my stewardship there." In particular, he singled out his vice chair, Leslie Gales.

"Where I can add value," Shedletsky conceded, "is stewardship in helping make the transition effective."

Shedletsky was born in Montreal 52 years ago, the middle of three children. His parents, Polish Jews, survived the war in the labour camps of Siberia.

He had a "typical immigrant upbringing," he said. "My father went into the shmatte business; he worked very hard to make a living. My parents were very pro-education, pro-Jewish education. They spent what money they had to send my sister, as the first born, to the Talmud Torah, which at that time, was quite expensive. When it came time to my and my younger brother's turn to go to school, they did not have enough money, so they sent us to yeshiva."

After Grade 8, Shedletsky left the Yeshiva and entered a secular high school. It was also around this time, following the pattern of most immigrants, that his family moved to a larger home and more affluent neighbourhood in the suburbs. Eventually, in 1969, graduate studies in clinical psychology brought the young McGill graduate to the University of Toronto. One year later, he married his Montreal girlfriend.

Shedletsky's volunteer work with the community began in 1975, around the time he and his wife planted tangible roots in the community by starting their family. They now have three children.

Shedletsky does not believe he was "groomed" for his present position, but rather that his path to the chairmanship was one of conscience, coincidence and circumstance. He believes that the twists and turns of life are as much a matter of mystery as they are of design.

An incident in Warsaw in 1996 proves the point.

Ralph Shedletsky

Shedletsky was co-chair of the March of the Living. His father had died a few months earlier. Two madrichim (guides) and an older local man were talking, in Yiddish of course, in the courtyard of the Nozhik Street shul. Shedletsky joined the conversation, slipping with ease into the language that was his mother tongue.

"I asked the man what his name was. He answered: Shedletsky.

"'Ich bin auchet Shedletsky. Ich bin Rafael Shedletsky.' (I am also Shedletsky. I am Raphael Shedletsky.)

"But we could not determine if we were related.

"I came back the next day. I saw the man again but this time he was with someone else. I asked the other fellow who he was. It turned out he was from Montreal and had come to Poland with his granddaughter to show her where he had grown up.

"Where in Montreal?" I asked him.

"St. Laurent," came the answer.

"My father lived in St. Laurent."

"Who was your father?"

* * *

"Not only were he and my father friends, they had gone to shul together every day."

Now, whether by mystery or design, the latest turn in his life has brought Ralph (Raphael) Shedletsky to the chairmanship of the federation. MBD

TDSB cautions teachers about 'unbalanced' article

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The controversy over a union newsletter's depiction of the Middle East conflict reached the floor of the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) last week as the board's chair publicly repudiated the article, calling it too unbalanced to serve as a teaching aid in high school classrooms.

In a statement read to a meeting of the TDSB, chair Donna Cansfield said the board "does not condone any type of unbalanced information presented in any classroom."

The board is "committed to the teaching of controversial issues in a professional manner that respects and enriches the educational experiences of all students... We expect [our teachers] will not convert students from their personal, political or religious beliefs."

In a related development, school principals were advised to caution teachers to avoid the use of one-sided resource materials in addressing controversial political issues in the classroom.

"Very strong policy and guidelines" govern the use of in-class materials that are not part of the education curriculum, said Gerry Connelly, executive officer for TDSB's programs and services. "We tell teachers that when you teach controversial issues, it's very important to give the source and to present a balanced view, and don't bring in your personal beliefs.

"I sent e-mails to the principals to make sure our teachers are aware of our guidelines."

Connelly's e-mails and Cansfield's comments came after reports that a newsletter published by a local of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation (OSSTF) recommended that an article on the United States and the Middle East be used as a resource to stimulate debate in geography and history classes.

The article, Why America is Hated, appeared in the December issue of D12 Voice, a periodical published by District 12 of the OSSTF, which represents Toronto public high school teachers.

Reprinted from the left-wing Z Magazine, the article claims to explain "the deep seated sense of injustice in the Arab and Islamic worlds against the United States."

In response to criticism of the article, the newsletter's editor, Doug Little, said "the point of the piece is not to present a so-called 'balanced' view of the Middle East...We make no pretense of being objective...We side with the oppressed and against the oppressor. We view America, and Israel as its agent, as the prime oppressor in this case in the Middle East."

The article was immediately condemned by Canadian Jewish Congress, while OSSTF president Earl Manners agreed it is not an appropriate lesson plan.

Last week, a motion was presented to the TDSB by trustee Gerri Gershon, who called on the board to stop distributing D12 Voice to its roughly 6,500 high school teachers.

Gershon said public perception may not distinguish between the views expressed in the union newsletter and those of the board.

The motion, which will be debated at the trustees' January meeting, calls on the board to "dissociate itself from the non-attributed article" and from suggestions it be used by teachers as a resource.

It also calls on the board:

• "to encourage teachers to deal with controversial and sensitive issues such as the Middle East conflict in a balanced and even-handed manner;"

• to "declare that a narrow ideological approach is unprofessional and offensive when teaching students."

Gershon said she has heard from teachers, some with strong ties to the OSSTF, who are "concerned and upset" with the article.

As to whether the article should be used in the classroom, she said teachers may employ outside materials in addressing current affairs, if it is done in an appropriate manner. "I think it's fair to speak to students about why Israel and the United States are perceived in a negative way, but you've got to be able to present all points of view."

Ed Morgan, chair of Congress' Ontario region, applauded Gershon's motion, calling it "a very responsible thing for the school board to do." He also commended the District 12 union leadership, which circulated a memo to its members indicating the article was biased and unbalanced.

But Morgan took issue with the suggestion the article could be balanced with other information. The article is full of factual errors, he said, and "I don't think truth and falsehood should be balanced. It's just plain wrong."

Int'l community urged to increase pressure on Arafat

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Without continuous, unrelenting, international pressure Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat will not stop terrorism, says Israeli cabinet minister Dan Meridor.

In an exclusive interview with the The CJN last week, Meridor said that Arafat may have the ability to crack down on terrorists, but he does not have the will.

There is a predictable pattern in Arafat's behaviour, Meridor pointed out. When Arafat feels international political pressure, he cracks down on terrorism. As soon as the pressure lets up, the Palestinian leader turns the other way.

Responsible for national defence and diplomatic strategy in the Prime Minister's Office, Minister Without Portfolio Meridor was a guest speaker at Israel Now's recent solidarity rally in support of Israel.

In the interview, Meridor said that Arafat doesn't really think he can win a war against Israel on the battlefield. However, the Palestinian leader does think he can win a political struggle by manipulating international opinion.

In the past, Arafat has cracked down after America has responded with anger, Meridor noted.

"We have seen him go into mosques, arresting and jailing terrorist leaders," Meridor said. Unfortunately, as soon as the international media's attention is diverted, Arafat stops exerting his power.

Arafat was not convinced that the international arena was against terrorism in Israel and therefore did not feel compelled to get tough, Meridor said.

By pursuing this path, he is doing a disservice to his own people, the Israeli statesman added.

"As bad as things have been for us since the outbreak of the recent intifadah in terms of life, security and economic hardships, it has been 10 times worse for the Palestinians."

Meridor noted that the Palestinians are beginning to realize that Arafat is inflicting more harm than good on them.

Dan Meridor

Reluctant to release any names for fear that harm may come to them, Meridor did say that in recent months a new moderate leadership has developed from within the Palestinians.

"They talk against [Arafat] amongst themselves, to us and to the Americans" because they are frustrated, Meridor said.

They saw how close to an agreement they were at Camp David and at Tabah and that Arafat chose to throw it away and pursue a path of terror instead.

The Palestinians realize their cause has wide support all over the world, Meridor said. However, they realize Arafat is losing credibility and that public opinion is turning against them.

At this point, Meridor said it is now crucial the United States persist in its condemnation of Arafat.

"The refusal of the [American] government to meet with Arafat sends a deliberate message that he isn't a plausible partner in negotiations.

"If this pressure is sustained from the United States and the entire international community – with no leaks or lifelines – then Arafat may be compelled to change his ways," Meridor said.

As far as Israeli politics go, Meridor said the current national unity government indicates how much has changed over the past year.

The Israeli right and left wing have undergone harsh awakenings, he said.

During the Camp David negotiations, right-wing political thinkers came to terms with the fact that they could not retain all the land captured in the Six Day War.

Demographics in the Middle East convinced them that attempting to hold everything could risk Israeli sovereignty and the Jewish character of the State, he said.

Furthermore, the relationship between Palestinians and Jews built on fear and hatred and the current intifadah was beginning to threaten the successful historical integation of the Israeli Arabs.

"They may not have believed wholeheartedly in the Zionist dream and the Jewish land of Israel, but for more than 50 years they lived within the laws of Israel and became Israelis in many ways," Meridor said, adding that recent events have shown we could upset this relationship if we continue to govern over 1967 borders.

On the other hand, he noted, before Camp David, the left wing was convinced that if Palestinians were offered their own land and financial support, then we would have peace.

The break in peace talks and recent events have proven to them that Arafat does not really accept Israel's legitimate right to exist. Left-wing political thinkers have had to come to terms with this disappointment.

So, many left and right wingers have currently become more centrist in their views.

Right now, Meridor said, about 80 percent of the population support the government in its attempt to contain and quash terrorism. However, there is also support for concessions once the other side is ready.

Even the settlements are no longer an issue that will stand in the way of an agreement, Meridor said. At Camp David they weren't much of an obstacle for either side.

Israelis have come a long way, Meridor said. They are less ideologically and emotionally committed to the views they once had.

"We are much more realistic, but it is very frustrating because we don't see a solution around the corner."

HEARTS OF STONE!

For Jews, this past year has been the most difficult in 50. Filled with bombings, terrorism, shock, sorrow and tears in Israel and New York - perhaps no one has suffered as much as The Schevischurder family in Israel.

They lost five members in the Jerusalem "Sbarro" bombing.

The parents were with 5 of their 8 children when a suicide bomber detonated a knapsack filled with nails and explosives. The mother and two daughters A"H were killed instantly. The father and son A"H lay mortally wounded and died after reciting the Shema Yisrael together. Two young girls aged 8 and 10 were injured, one very seriously.

The 3 brothers not with the family found their sisters in the hospital. Then they came together for the five concurrent funerals which took place on Mount Menuchot in Jerusalem.

The father Mati was a Jewish studies teacher and the mother Tzirel worked with deaf children. They left a small amount of life insurance. The remaining 5 children aged 8 to 21, are destitute and facing a crisis. The youngest girl faces many surgeries and long term therapy.

WON'T YOU PLEASE HELP?

We need every Jew to help these five orphans financially. We can defeat those with hearts of stone. Charitable tax receipts will be issued for donations of $18 and up. Please give generously. In the merit of this mitzva may you and all of Israel be blessed with a year of health, happiness and peace. Thank you.

Israel's security is paramount, Levy says

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — Israel's recent decision to send troops into areas controlled by Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat is predicated on Israel's need to guarantee the security of its people, says Israeli Knesset Member David Levy.

The former foreign minister and deputy prime minister of Israel was the guest speaker at a packed Israel solidarity rally Saturday night. Levy, who is leader of the Gesher party, emphasized that Israel is a country that wants peace but now realizes that only through strength can it ever achieve a secure solution with its Arab neighbours.

In his speech, Levy recalled the words of the late Egyptian president Anwar Sadat, who said that only after concluding he could not defeat Israel did he decide to pursue the path of peace.

Our incredible desire to achieve peace has been interpreted as weakness, Levy said. "We yearn for peace but we cannot be persecuted by peace."

In an interview with The CJN, Levy noted that the Oslo accords were built on Arafat's guarantee that he would fight terrorism. However, he said, "we now have proof that the Palestinian Authority not only knows about terrorist activities, but participates in attacks against Israel."

David Levy

Arafat is not keeping up his side of the obligations put forward at Oslo and we can no longer simply wait for suicide bombers to attack us, Levy said. "We need to go in and prevent the terrorists from acting."

On Arafat's future, Levy stated that Israel did not enter the West Bank and Gaza in order to get involved in leadership issues, adding that "the appointment of leaders is their business."

But at this point, Levy said, Israel will not accept that for the sake of continuing the talks we will stand back and count our dead everyday. "In the name of peace, we cannot have undefendable borders."

Levy, who has worked with six prime ministers from Menachem Begin to Ehud Barak, said that the current national unity government is having a hard time stating its position because it can't decide on important issues.

"I have doubts that the current government can last," he noted. "It doesn't have a path. Each one speaks in a different voice and each one has a different opinion."

It is terrible that the prime minister speaks his mind with respect to the PA and his ministers say the opposite, Levy stated. "It confuses the nation and it weakens us internally and externally, causing paralysis in matters that should be clear to everyone."

During the rally, Levy said it is crucial for the government to be clear in its position on issues such as settlements, the 1967 borders, and the Palestinian right of return, and that Israel must be united "around that which unites the Jews around the world - Jerusalem under Israel's sovereignty."

In terms of the Israeli Arabs, Levy noted that "we need a great deal of patience. We are being judged according to the way we treat our minorities."

When introducing Levy, Israel's Consul General Meir Romem said that "Israel is encouraged by the support it has received from the Toronto Jewish community."

The rally, which was sponsored by the Sephardic Kehila Centre and Mizrachi Canada, was organized to show solidarity with Israel at difficult times, said Jacques Benquesus, the Kehila Centre's president. Levy's address was given in Hebrew and translated by Canadian Jewish Congress past president Moshe Ronen.

SHARON WANTED TWO WEEKS OF RESPITE FROM PLO TERROR!
BUT ZINNI ASKED FOR ONLY TWO DAYS OF NO PLO TERROR.
NOW THE EUROPEAN UNION HAS A PROPOSAL
TWO HOURS?
YOU GOT IT!

If we lose our hope, we lose our bearings

Only a few pages remain on the calendar of the year 2001. And with the melancholy of a dilemma that assaults the conscience, we are caught between wanting to hold more tightly onto the waning December days and wanting to tear them away with swift, certain finality to hasten the arrival of the new year and with it, the hope of better times.

The violent Palestinian rejection of a negotiated peace with Israel was already in its fourth month when the year 2001 began. The duplicitous, deadly decision by Yasser Arafat to again put a gun in the hand that had once held that of Yitzhak Rabin would bring only disaster for the Palestinian people.

Once again, Palestinian "liberation" became the excuse for violence and terror against the people of Israel. The killing and attempted killing continue unabated to this very moment.

But the fight against Israel was carried to an additional battleground.

Nine months into the year, the Islamic nations of the world launched a verbal assault on Israel and on the Jewish people at the UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa that was hauntingly reminiscent of the vilest, most horrific calumnies of the Nazis.

Merely days later, on Sept. 11, Osama bin Laden and his murderous band of evil zealots brought terror to the shores of the United States. More than 3,000 people were killed; suddenly we all felt vulnerable.

In contrast, only weeks later, we saw that everyone in Israel, in fact, was vulnerable. Emboldened by the example of Al Qaeda, Palestinian terrorists began a new wave of suicide bombings and roadside ambushes. Scores of Israelis were killed and wounded.

The spiral of the year has been mostly downward.

Today the Israeli dream of peaceful co-existence with the Palestinians and the Palestinian dream of an independent state seem very far away. Durban unleashed into public discourse the twisted perversions of classical anti-Semitism. And somehow, inexplicably, the debate surrounding Sept. 11 was transformed into a debate about Israel and the Jews.

But, as MP Irwin Cotler has told us, 2001 is not 1941. The Jewish people are neither powerless nor alone. Resolve, determination and courage must be our constant companions.

A cold eye to the truth must be the lens through which we view the world. But how we view the future must be a function of how we hope and what we hope for our children. There is a proverb that "hope deferred makes the heart sick." Woe unto us if we try to impart to our children the vast beauty of our traditions and the brilliant effulgence of our history through a heart made sick by hopelessness. It cannot be done; nor should we pass onto our children a religion, a faith, a peoplehood, a history, a way of life and a view of God's creations that are predominantly of tears and suspicion.

If we lose our hope we will lose our bearings. But, we have not lost our hope. Od lo avda tikvateinu. That has never been our way.

Foster homes needed

Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) is in desperate need of Jewish foster homes.

JF&CS is mandated to provide child protection services to the Toronto Jewish community. When absolutely necessary, and for the safety of a child, the agency has the legal authority to remove children from their homes and place them in foster care.

When a child enters our care, our policy is to ensure that the child is placed in a Jewish home. Over the past few years, we have seen an increase in the number of children requiring foster care along with a simultaneous decrease in the availability of Jewish foster homes.

Recently, we were unable to place a Jewish child in a Jewish home. We would like to bring to your readers' attention the critical need for Jewish families to become foster parents for both short and long term periods. In particular, we need families who will work with preschoolers (ages two to six) and adolescents (ages 12 to 16). We provide orientation, ongoing training and support as well as a per diem rate and compensation for all child care expenses.

Anyone interested should contact Selma Elzas, coordinator of foster care, at 638-7800 ext. 298 for further information.

Too far over, backwards

The Canadian government learned nothing from the consequences of the Durban conference. It was a foregone conclusion that the UN body at the recent Geneva conference would once again single Israel out for condemnation.

A way to describe Prime Minister Jean Chretien's and Foreign Minister John Manley's decision to have Canada attend the conference and vote against Israel is with an anatomical metaphor. The medical term for bending over backwards is "extreme lordosis." There are two possible outcomes for this condition: the bony structure of the back may eventually disintegrate, leaving the person virtually spineless, or one might just fall over backwards, unable to stand up for what one truly believes.

Canadian politics consistent

At least we see consistency in Canadian federal politics.

The Liberals keep on voting against Israel, notwithstanding their effort to mend fences with the Jewish community in the last election. Former Alliance leader Stockwell Day has been consistent in his feelings toward Israel. When will we Jews wake up and smell the coffee?

Looking for film subjects

We are looking for Jews willing to share their stories with us for a project on conversion to Judaism. We are looking for people willing to speak frankly about their experiences of conversion – the reasons they chose Judaism, reactions from family and friends, and their acceptance by, and activity in, the Jewish community. They should be willing to appear on camera.

If you have a story, please send a brief outline to our attention at 1151 W. 7th Ave., Vancouver, B.C., V6H 1B5, along with your address and phone number. We will keep all stories confidential and respond to you immediately.

Waiting for compensation

Would someone let us know how much longer we will have to wait for the slave money that the German government promised to pay us?

Is it true that the money will be distributed to our families only after we are gone?

Is it also true that 39 lawyers who worked on the case already received $51 million for their involvement?

These and other questions are being asked whenever groups of our people meet. Let it be clear: we are very thankful for the efforts of Edgar Bronfman and Israel Singer of the World Jewish Congress. However, it seems that the people who took over the distribution are having a ball with so much money.

Palestinians need logic

Ever since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the American TV new channels have continuously carried the slogan "America strikes back." In light of Sept. 11 and events in Afghanistan since then, any Palestinian with logical reasoning ability would realize:

- Terrorist attacks against Jews are not going to help the Palestinians' public relations efforts.
- If terrorists kill Jews, the Israeli government is going to "strike back."
- The U.S. government is not currently in a position to tell Israel not to "strike back."

Lack of logical reasoning and underestimation of the other side are the main causes of most wars.

Preserving the Jasenovac Collection

By SANJA PRIMORAC-FEER

When I was 13 years old, I was sworn in as a proud Communist Youth, a mandatory event in a young Yugoslav's life. The ceremony took place at the site of the Jasenovac concentration and extermination camp, the largest camp in southeast Europe during the Ustasha regime of the Independent State of Croatia, a Nazi puppet state. After the initiation was completed, we were ushered into Jasenovac Memorial Museum's dark and musty theatre. The lights went off, and the film projector started rolling. What I saw that day changed me. What I saw that day was footage of the liberation of the camps in Europe.

The Independent State of Croatia operated under Italian and later German military control, while the Ustasha dictatorship perpetuated brutal excess, including introduction of racial laws, persecution of Serbs, Jews, Roma (Gypsies) and Muslims, and deportations to concentration camps. Jasenovac, one of the most brutal camps, was under Ustasha command and nationalist peasants administered it. Inmates were clubbed and stabbed to death and routinely put in chains until starvation. Hundreds of thousands of children, women and men lost their lives in the camps of the Independent State of Croatia.

Croatian nationalism persisted in Communist Yugoslavia, and Ustasha and other émigré nationalist groups remained active abroad. President Josip Broz Tito's death in 1980 weakened Yugoslavia and increased demands for secession. In 1990, Croatia and Slovenia, followed by Bosnia, elected non-Communist governments and demanded greater autonomy. In 1991, Croatia declared its independence with Franjo Tudjman, a former communist general and notorious Croatian nationalist, as president. Fighting immediately erupted between Croats and federal troops in the predominantly Serb-populated areas of Croatia, near Jasenovac. My hometown was just 10 miles away. During the fiercest fighting, when shelling persisted for weeks at the time, rumours circulated that the Jasenovac Memorial Area was destroyed and its collection looted.

During a research trip I made last September as part of my work with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., I learned that an official in the U.S. Embassy in Zagreb had located the man who saved the Jasenovac collection during the civil war and stored it in his basement. The next morning I was crossing the border between Croatia and Republika Srpska, a part of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. This was my first trip after the civil war to what is regarded by some Croats as enemy territory. But now with the peaceful landscape around me, I had little to fear, except maybe the land mines.

We met the Jasenovac Museum's former deputy director who told us that the collection had been transferred to Republika Srpska Archives, in the town of Banja Luka. We asked him to take us there. We reached Banja Luka in the early afternoon and after a short meeting with the archives' director, he took us into the basement where I discovered unprotected film prints, personal items in plastic bags, photos and documents damaged by elements. These documents and artifacts may be the only physical proof of the victims of the Croatian Holocaust.

The collection's state was alarming. The storage area was filthy, with broken windows and no climate control. I felt the archive director's embarrassment as he explained how the country is poor, his own staff is unpaid, and this was the best they could do under the circumstances.

We thanked our hosts and left Banja Luka that evening. I remember riding back to Zagreb in a panic. I felt responsible. There is a right time for a person to get involved. This was the right time for me.

When I returned to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, I made a presentation to Diane Saltzman, the director of conservation; Radu Ioanid, the director of the international archives project; and Alice Greenwald, the associate director of the museum program. I was almost feverish, aware that time was scarce. They understood, and soon afterward Diane, Radu and I were on a rescue mission.

We flew to Sarajevo and negotiated with Bosnia and Herzegovina's prime minister to allow us to remove the materials from Republika Srpska. At the same time, we signed an agreement with the Ministry of Culture of Croatia. With the help of the U.S. Embassy in Sarajevo, we secured a truck and a driver and early the next morning, we left for Banja Luka. It was still dark outside, and fog in the mountainous region of central Bosnia is thick. As daylight broke, we realized we were driving through charred villages. This area of Bosnia experienced some of the worst fighting during the civil war. We passed hundreds of destroyed homes.

Upon our arrival in Banja Luka, we met with the director of Republika Srpska State Archives. After studying the agreement, he said that he would not question his prime minister's decision and added: "I was involved in the war in the '90s, it was really tough. But I did not fight. I was an administrator, I am an archivist."

The 19 metal and wooden boxes were loaded onto the truck and we headed back to Sarajevo. This time, there was no night or fog to cover the sight of former thriving Serb and Muslim communities. I spent hours contemplating my own wartime experiences and how I ended up here. When we arrived, we headed straight to a U.S. Embassy warehouse on the city's outskirts to pack the materials carefully for transport to Washington, D.C. It was very difficult. Diane suggested how to make sure nothing would get damaged. We worked fast, in silent concentration and left the next day for Washington. We searched for the right words to explain to our families, friends and colleagues what had happened.

Killing instruments at the camp.

The materials arrived in November 2000, via U.S. diplomatic pouch – half a ton of precious historical artifacts. The museum's collection professionals now got involved. First, the whole collection was fumigated. We then started the process of assessment, preservation and organization. The objects urgently needed to be removed from acidic boxes and envelopes which were accelerating the deterioration process. We also needed to deal with film, photo and paper materials.

The objects in the collection numbered in the thousands and included personal letters, oral histories, Ustasha propaganda films, photographs of atrocities and killers, war crime trial transcripts and many personal items. There were ceramic miniatures made by a famous artist who was deported to Jasenovac. There was a book containing hundreds of recipes written by a woman in small, neat handwriting.

Markers worn by Jewish inmates and others.

For nine months, the staff worked furiously to protect the collection. The film was preserved; videotapes are available for research in the museum's film and video archive. Two thousand historical photographs have been copied and the collection's objects photographed. Approximately 100,000 pages of documents have been organized and microfilmed. Seventy audiotapes of survivor oral histories have been copied and will be transcribed and translated by our volunteers.

The collections staff's commitment was tremendous. In particular, we received an amazing amount of support from two collection volunteers, both of whom are Croatian and lost family in Jasenovac. Their intellectual and emotional involvement and support is beyond description. The collection is now in stable condition and properly stored in the museum.

As part of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum's international efforts to ensure the protection and accessibility of original Holocaust documentation and to support the accurate presentation of this history, these copied materials will be available not only in its own archives, but also at several other institutions worldwide and in the former Yugoslavia. The museum returned the original materials to the Jasenovac Memorial Area in Croatia in November.

Last May, the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum's director, Sara Bloomfield, met with government officials in Croatia to discuss the preservation and display of the Jasenovac collection and to address the presentation of the Holocaust in Croatia's educational system. The museum hopes that Holocaust studies will become part of the Croatian school curriculum and that an official Days of Remembrance will be established. The historical record related to World War II and the Holocaust has been manipulated for too long. The museum's involvement will ensure a fair and accurate presentation of this history here and in Croatia.

We are aware of the many sensitivities surrounding this material. Our commitment is not to any group or nation, but to Holocaust remembrance, a cause that must remain above political pressure. The museum hopes that scholars, students and the public will see not only artifacts and history but also the broader meaning of the conflict and how it affected that area for decades.

The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum's Jasenovac Web site, which serves as a permanent memorial to those who were victims of the Ustasha regime, can be found at www.ushmm.org/jasenovac.

Muslim soul-searching

A few weeks ago, I received a long e-mail message from Israel that quoted a letter by Dr. Muqtedar Khan, director of international studies at Adrian College in Michigan and a widely known scholar.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I am citing a few excerpts to give the reader a sense of Khan's vision:

"I am writing this memo to you all with the explicit purpose of inviting you to lead the American Muslim community in soul-searching, reflection and reassessment.

"What happened on Sept. 11 in New York and Washington, D.C., will forever remain a horrible scar on the history of Islam and humanity. No matter how much we condemn it, and point to the Quran and the Sunnah to argue that Islam forbids the killing of innocent people, the fact remains that the perpetrators of this crime against humanity have indicated that their actions are sanctioned by Islamic values. The fact that even now several Muslim scholars and thousands of Muslims defend the accused is indicative that not all Muslims believe that the attacks are un-Islamic. This is truly sad…

"While encouraging Muslims to struggle against injustice (Al Quran 4:135), Allah also imposes strict rules of engagement. He says in unequivocal terms that to kill an innocent being is like killing the entire humanity (Al Quran 5:32). He also encourages Muslims to forgive Jews and Christians if they have committed injustices against us (Al Quran 2:109, 3:159, 5:85).

"Muslims, including American Muslims, have been practising hypocrisy on a grand scale. They protest against the discriminatory practices in Muslim states. In the Gulf one can see how laws and even salaries are based on ethnic origin. This is racism, but we never hear of Muslims protesting against them at International forums. The Israeli occupation of Palestine is perhaps central to Muslim grievance against the West. While acknowledging that, I must remind you that Israel treats its 1 million Arab citizens with greater respect and dignity than most Arab nations treat their citizens. Today Palestinian refugees can settle and become citizens of the United States, but in spite of all the tall rhetoric of the Arab world and Quranic injunctions (24:22), no Muslim country except Jordan extends this support to them…

"Muslims love to live in the U.S. but also hate it. Many openly claim that the U.S. is a terrorist state but they continue to live in it. Their decision to live here is testimony that they would rather live here than anywhere else. As an Indian Muslim, I know for sure that nowhere on earth, including India, will I get the same sense of dignity and respect that I have received in the U.S. No Muslim country will treat me as well as the U.S. has."

These few excerpts reflect a message that all other ethnic groups might well apply to themselves, if the shoe fits.

The advocacy challenge

When Defence Minister Art Eggleton was booed at the rally for Israel in Toronto last week, the audience reaction reflected frustration with the government's expressing sympathy for the Palestinian people along with its statements of friendship and support for Israel.

Actually, Eggleton was expressing long-standing principles of Canada's Middle East policy. Israel has faced tough times before and Ottawa's policy isn't new, but the Jewish community's reaction to it over the last year is. So what has changed? Two new factors have affected the complexity of Israel advocacy in Canada.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Traditionally, the community has argued that its support for Israel is anchored in a broad consensus and shared values between the two democracies, and that we benefit from the non-partisan nature of our support. This view may be changing.

Last fall, for the first time in more than two decades, Canada's Middle East policy was thrust into the arena of domestic partisan politics. As the intifadah erupted and Canada voted against Israel at the United Nations, some media and opposition politicians used the issue openly during the election campaign in Toronto's few Jewish ridings. The taste of those attacks still lingers in Ottawa and the Jewish community.

This had not happened since 1979, when Tory leader Joe Clark distanced his party from the incumbent Liberal government's approach to the region by promising to move the Canadian Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. That short-lived promise was quickly retracted once Clark became prime minister, and Middle East policy returned to its non-partisan place in the political arena.

A second, new element in the debate is latent, but profound in its potential implications. Traditionally, our organized advocacy efforts on behalf of Israel in Canada have been predicated on support for the Israeli position, whatever its government of the day. We have argued that Israelis elect their leaders in free elections and our role is to seek maximum understanding for their position – whatever the Canadian government of the day.

Admittedly, Israel's position on various international issues differs at times from that of a domestic Jewish community. Its perspective as a sovereign state is by definition international in its context and reflective of a broad range of interests. Our relationship with the Canadian government is more immediate and political, and its context is domestic. But for the first time, some in the community are more openly questioning the Israeli position on Canada's Middle East policy.

In the past, divisions within the community on issues such as the Lebanon war or Israeli settlement policy affected our unity vis a vis the larger Canadian community and government. Now, however, we are challenging the official Israeli perspective on Canada itself. This begs the question: If organized Israel advocacy in Canada is undertaken as a statement of the community's support for – and solidarity with – Israel, how can the basis for that very advocacy be a view that the perspective of the Jewish community of Canada is different from that of Israel and perhaps pre-eminent?

Obviously, discussion of this is not helped by the nature of the current Israeli unity government, which is more fractious than the unity governments of the 1980s. But right now, the internal differences within that government on the Palestinian issue are at best nuanced, and more importantly, they have no bearing on its perspective on Canada's policy.

And obviously there are legitimate differences in the respective views of a foreign government and a domestic constituency advocating that country's case. But these too should be no more than nuanced, and they must be dealt with constructively. Otherwise, they might undermine our effectiveness in seeking the very understanding and support we want and Israel needs.

We are right to object strongly to Canada's interpretation of "balance" in the Middle East, especially when applied to UN votes that are anything but balanced. The same applies to statements that claim "even-handedness" but amount to an anti-Israel posture. The challenge is to keep perspective on the long-term Israel-Canada relationship and on our larger, domestic agenda, while working to broaden the base of support and understanding for Israel in Canada across a multi-party Parliament and diverse community. In spite of the differences, it's a rich relationship. Let's continue to nurture it creatively and intelligently.

Anti-Zionism and the Jewish community

After a recent lecture on Canadian Jewish life, I was asked by a bright young McGill colleague: "Would someone who is opposed to political Zionism be considered part of the Jewish community?" He meant opposing the existence of Israel as an independent Jewish state. My initial reaction was that most Jews in Canada, and certainly those who consider themselves part of the Jewish community – myself included – would rule him out.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Remember, this kind of debate has no legal or practical significance. Such an individual is certainly a Jew and should be welcome in any synagogue and most communal organizations. The Jewish community is a voluntary construction with no legal authority over anyone.

Yet why would such a person be considered as symbolically outside the "community?" After all, not long ago, and certainly before 1948, people who were staunch anti-Zionists were entrenched in Jewish communal life. Bundists and Yiddishists were anti-Zionists, even as they were dedicated to perpetuating a certain secular and Diaspora-based vision of Jewish life.

Many Reform Jews, particularly in the United States, were opposed to Zionism, because in their view, Judaism was only a religion. Many were generous philanthropists, supporting local Jewish charities.

Finally, there were elements in the Orthodox community (far more than there are now) who felt Zionism pre-empted God's role in ushering in a new messianic redemption of the Holy Land.

So what has changed? Everything. Israel now exists and is home to roughly 5 million Jews. Most of those Jews came as refugees, either as Holocaust survivors, Jews from Arab/Muslim lands or Jews fleeing oppression or danger in Russia or South Africa. They want to live freely as Jewish Israelis.

Political anti-Zionism today challenges that right, the right to Jewish self-determination. To hold such a position is not to engage in idle ivory tower speculation common among academics. For Israeli Jews are not interested in the dismantling of their state. At least not now.

Many have heard of this Chomskyite position, and its classic PLO variant of creating a democratic secular state in Palestine where Jews and Palestinians can live together in equality.

People have a right to propose the idea. But Jewish Israelis are not buying it, and with good reason.

We are not talking of Norway merging with Sweden here. (In fact they once were united.) Nowhere in the Middle East is there anything remotely like a democratic and secular state with an Arab and/or Muslim majority. Since most advocates of this position include the right of return of Palestinian refugees, and given high Palestinian birth rates, Jews would soon become a minority in such a state.

No thanks. Israeli Jews know the Middle East too well. They know from the Arab press what Arabs think of Jews. They know how poorly Jews have fared recently in Arab/Muslim states, to say nothing of Christians in Sudan or Pakistan, of Copts in Egypt, of Kurds in Iraq, etc. They also know how well basic rights and freedoms are respected in the Middle East. They have seen the rise of fundamentalism in the region – and know full well that a "democratic" Palestine could very well vote in a fundamentalist Islamic government.

Israelis are not likely to change their minds on this. And there are plenty of armed terrorist groups, to say nothing of Arab/Islamic states, who would love to hasten that feared outcome. To argue in favour of the elimination of a Jewish Israeli state is to offer intellectual support for these violent attacks, actual and potential, against Israel and its Jews.

The result would not be a two-state solution to the conflict, which many desire (including me) and which is still achievable. It would be a one-state solution. Jews would refuse to live as a future minority in such a new state. If they were, God forbid, to lose their struggle, they would have the option of leaving, being expelled, dying in the fight or living as an endangered minority.

All of these would lead to a form of genocide – and I use the term deliberately – of the Israeli Jewish population. This is pure, racist anti-Semitism, and that is why it remains outside the communal consensus.

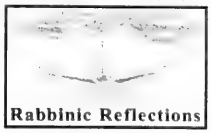
Don't abandon Israel

By RABBI PHILIP S. SCHEIM



Rabbinic Reflections

In the Jewish wedding ceremony, the final marriage blessing, the last of the Sheva Brachot under the chupah, is based on verses in Jeremiah (33:10-11):

"Again there shall be heard in this place… in the towns of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem that are desolate, without inhabitants… the sound of joy, the sound of celebration, the sound of bridegroom, the sound of bride."

The Prophet Amos offers a similar message (9:14): "I will restore the fortunes of my people Israel; they shall rebuild the desolate cities and live in them; they shall plant vineyards, and drink their wine, make gardens and eat their fruit. And, I will plant [the people Israel] on their soil, never again to be uprooted from the soil that I have given them…"

Each time I land at Ben-Gurion airport, I feel what cannot be felt at any other airport in the world. For no matter how light the carry-on bag on our shoulders may be when descending the plane, we carry the weight of thousands of years of Jewish dreams – a weight that, rather than burden us, miraculously uplifts us. No feeling on earth can equal that landing in Israel.

But my last two visits, both in this past year, were different. Most times when you land at Ben-Gurion, you enter a crowded airport and face long line-ups at passport control. I'll never complain about those line-ups again, for this time, there were no crowds. The airport was very quiet.

Israel is no longer an uninhabited land. The vision of the prophets has largely been realized. The cities of Israel are no longer desolate. They have been rebuilt, along with many new ones as well, and are bursting with people. The Jewish State is so alive, even now. But the land that is not lacking in population is devoid of visitors. The country, once again, is alone, unvisited and that is sad and unnecessary.

Life goes on in Israel today – except for the absence of tourists and notwithstanding the difficulties of recent months, there is amazing normalcy. Obviously, there are areas that are not visited due to security issues, but most of these areas would not have been on any tourist's itinerary in the past ten years. There are more sites than ever to visit, and the country continues to grow and to blossom, making the vineyards and gardens of which Amos spoke part of the everyday landscape.

Israel should never have to feel abandoned by world Jewry, least of all, at such a hard time as this. Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, chief rabbi of the town of Efrat, recently had harsh words for Jewish organizations who cancelled their Israel programs, and for individual Jews who refused to consider travelling to Israel during this past year of tension.

"Israel is not Disneyland," he noted.

When times are tough, conditions less than ideal, yes, one cancels trips to Disneyland, to Las Vegas, to Florida, to the Caribbean. But Israel is family. It's home. At least, it's supposed to be. One doesn't refuse to visit family, to come home, during hard times – rather, one prioritizes visits during those more difficult moments. To do otherwise is to ignore the enormous transformation in Jewish history that has taken shape these past years before our very eyes. To do otherwise is to put in jeopardy our direct link to the State of Israel.

Time will tell with the Almighty as the ultimate Judge of our worthiness as part of the generations that have witnessed the rebirth of a Jewish State and the reunification of Jerusalem. And that worthiness likely will be determined by our standing by – and standing in – the State of Israel, especially during these days.

There are numerous opportunities to visit Israel in the weeks and months ahead, often at incentive pricing. [Feel free to contact me directly about a solidarity mission we are planning for late January: rabbi@bethdavid.com.]

A while back, an Israeli spokesperson was being lectured by an audience member critical of governmental policy. The audience member finished his remarks by saying to the speaker: "You, sir, should be on guard." The Israeli spokesman's retort was instantaneous. "You, sir," he answered, "should be on the plane."

So, too, should we. As soon and as often as possible.

'Rights' a barrier to Mideast peace

By BEN ARCHIBALD

Guest Voice

The current terror campaign being waged by the Palestinian Authority against the State of Israel is far more complex than anyone had ever anticipated. Much as in any war machine, the Palestinians have launched a systematic campaign with different messages for the audiences of Gaza mosques, CNN broadcasts and Belgian courts. The mosque faithful are told to murder Jews wherever they can be found, since, after all, it is their duty as good Muslims to seek out and murder those who have dared to settle on Muslim land.

Similarly, in more nuanced language, men dressed in suits and armed with British accents convey the same message time and again on television and in print media. Palestinians we are told, have a right to the land and a right to prosecute Ariel Sharon for war crimes in Belgium. These rights are derived from koranic text when discussed in the mosque and from "international law" when discussed on CNN.

Indeed, rights talk has become the norm in trying to solve what is becoming an increasingly intractable conflict.

In an attempt to shore up their bargaining positions and gain legitimacy, Palestinian leaders never make a statement without the introductory phrase, "All we are asking for is respect of our rights." Indeed, this phrase has become so effective that it is now parroted blindly by the U.S. State Department, which seeks to end the "cycle of violence" by respecting Israel's right to exist and the Palestinian Authority's right to create a viable state. As rights talk becomes an entrenched feature of the conflict, a creative solution becomes painfully remote.

Prof. Mary Ann Glendon has remarked that modern constitutional and international law has spawned a "rights consciousness" that encourages parties to become more absolutist in their claims and blind to the principle of compromise, since legal rights, unlike political conflicts, are non-negotiable.

This rights consciousness is clearly at play in the current Mideast conflict. The rights the Palestinians refer to in United Nations security council resolutions 242 and 338 make no reference to a Palestinian state, to the right of return of refugees or to withdrawal by Israel from all of the West Bank and Gaza.

Yet it has become uniformly accepted dogma that Palestinian rights bestowed by the international community – a dubious forum when it comes to Israel – are sacrosanct and non-negotiable. As a result, when one peels away the nuance and sophistication, lawsuits in Belgium and rights talk on CNN seek to anchor the mullahs' cries in Gaza in legal and moral legitimacy.

While the plaintive plea that "we are only asking that our rights be respected" finds favour in our hearts it is imperative that the "rights" being granted are clearly understood. The right to prosecute Sharon is an attempt to delegitimize the democratically elected leader of Israel; the right of return for Palestinian refugees is an attempt to undo the State of Israel as a Jewish state; and the introduction of rights talk is an attempt to enter a cyclone of never-ending conflict until Israel's will to survive as a Jewish State is broken.

As mediation teams shuttle in and out of Israel and the Palestinian Authority, they must introduce the Palestinian leadership to the post-Camp David reality.

Israel believes it is in her interest to have a peaceful Palestinian state as a neighbour. It is a belief born not out of love but necessity. Israel has a historical right to Bethlehem, Shilo and Hebron, but as a democratic, peace-loving people, Israelis are willing to place supreme value on the idea of political compromise and not absolutist rights talk. Peace will be at hand when Palestinian spokespeople are as excited about having a state as they have become about delegitimizing ours.

Israel is legitimate, as is our historical claim. Compromise is necessary so that we can be fated to live together, as opposed to an unending cacophony of rights talk, which would doom us to live in unending conflict.

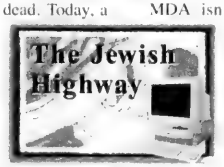
Israel's emergency workers

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ



The image is too familiar. A bomb explodes in Jerusalem or Haifa or Netanya. Within moments, emergency workers appear on the scene ready to risk their lives to save the wounded and to show respect to the dead. Today, a look at Israel's emergency workers on the World Wide Web.

Magen David Adom (MDA, Red Shield of David) is Israel's National Emergency Medical Service [http://www.magendavidadom.org]. Founded in 1930, MDA is responsible for helping Israel's Army Medical Corps in wartime, providing civilian emergency and medical and first aid services, and maintaining a blood bank for civilian use. Its Web site includes background information about the fight to have MDA recognized by the International Red Cross. The Newsflash section provides detailed information about terror attacks in Israel [http://www.magendavidadom.org/newsflash.html].

MDA's humanitarian efforts aren't limited to disasters in Israel. Since 1999, MDA has responded to crises in Greece, Kosovo, Indonesia, Eritrea, Ethiopia and the earthquake in Turkey: "MDA paramedics sent daily reports of horror... and miracles. On the word of an excited boy and girl who said they heard knocking sounds deep within a pile of rubble, one paramedic used his stethoscope to locate the person underground. He dug a small hole toward the noise. At first two fingers and then an entire hand emerged, allowing the paramedic to insert anintravenous transfusion which helped to keep the victim alive for the eight hours it took to free him" [http://www.redcross.org/services/intl/global/mda/mdaworks.html].

MDA isn't alone when disaster strikes. Hatzolah Jerusalem has over 200 volunteer emergency medical personnel, all certified by MDA. Hatzolah Jerusalem operates in over 20 cities and towns throughout Israel [http://www.hatzolah.org.il/]. (Hatzolah also runs volunteer emergency services outside Israel. You can read Hatzolah's Shamai Goldstein's account of what it was like to survive the World Trade Center attack [http://www.jewsweek.com/society/111.htm].)

Members of Israel's bomb squads – called sappers – risk their lives trying to neutralize suspicious objects before they can do any harm. A Jewish Homemaker magazine article about the members of Jerusalem's bomb squad reads: "Has Rami, this super-cool Israeli with a crew-cut and perpetual macho smile ever felt his hands shake? 'If you think about being injured, you can throw in the towel. All you can think of is how to do the work most efficiently and safely. Afterwards, you go over it in your head and then the shock of what you went through hits you.'" [http://www.ok.org/homemaker/purim_57/cover.html].

Many other Israeli groups try to help when disaster strikes. Ezer Mitzion runs a fleet of more than 30 ambulances to transport children suffering from cancer and to help in emergencies [http://www.shemayisrael.com/chareidi/archives5761/vayeshev/acholek.htm]. Yad Sarah is Israel's largest voluntary organization. After the December terror attacks in Jerusalem and Haifa, injured victims were able to borrow medical and rehabilitative equipment free of charge [http://www.yadsarah.org.il/new_eng_index.html]. You can find links to more medical organizations at the Israeli Physician's Guide Web site [http://www.doctor.co.il/organizationlink.htm].

After a disaster, one of the most harrowing duties falls to the members of Chesed Shel Emet (True Mercy). These Orthodox Jews, who arrive immediately at the scene of an attack or emergency wearing bright orange emergency vests, search for limbs and scrape down buildings splattered with blood and flesh [http://info.jpost.com/2000/Supplements/Terror/7.html]. According to Jewish tradition, bodies must be treated with respect and all body parts must be given a proper burial. While rescue workers work to save the living and police make legal identification of corpses, Chesed Shel Emet deals with the halachic concept of proper burial [http://www.jewishsf.com/bk960308/1bparts.htm].

"This is our job," says Chesed Shel Emet founder Rabbi Elazar Gelbstein. "It's hard and it breaks us but it must be done."

In defence of Judith

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As I was reading through The Canadian Jewish News recently, I happened upon an article written by Jonathan Groner (Jewz.com) in which he described the story of Judith and its connection to Chanukah. Groner summarized the narrative of the Book of Judith and the way in which this Jewish heroine saved her people from the enemy general Holofernes.

Although the setting of the story is in the time of Nebuchadnezzar (centuries before the events of Chanukah), we believe the Book of Judith was written not long after the war of the Maccabees and therefore we include it as part of Chanukah.

Judith, a widowed descendant of Simon, lives in a city besieged by enemy troops and facing leadership that she feels is cowering before the threat. Believing the elders are putting God to the test, Judith rebukes them and takes matters into her own hands. She pretends to defect to Holofernes and promises to let him know when God has abandoned the Jews. Pleased with this arrangement, he accepts her into the camp.

The Book of Judith is filled with images and language that refer the reader back to earlier biblical narratives and thus enrich its own story. Jonathan Groner has missed these images and concludes that the Book of Judith "falls far short" of biblical literary standards. However, my real argument lies in Groner's evaluation of Judith the woman.

After working her way securely into the enemy camp, Judith proceeds to build a connection with Holofernes. One evening, when they are alone in his tent, Judith plays along with a "romantic" evening, all the while getting Holofernes to drink too much and pass out. At that point, Judith takes his sword and decapitates him, leaving the enemy camp without a leader. Upon returning to her city with his head, Judith is able to restore the community's morale and they are victorious in their battle.

While acknowledging that Judith is to be praised for functioning well behind enemy lines, Jonathan Groner then makes the point that she is less than an ideal role model because she uses her "feminine allure and plays on a man's weakness." According to Groner, Deborah is the more fitting heroine since she "won her military victory in the same way that a man would have." In other words, a woman hero is not complete unless she mimics a man.

If a woman is blessed with feminine allure and mystique, these become integral parts of who she is and should not be relegated inferior status because they speak of her femaleness. Judaism celebrates the difference between men and women and these differences become part of our strengths. It is definitely a positive role model to teach young Jewish girls that we must use all our strengths to fight evil. In times of war, each of us must fight in our own way and whatever legitimate weapon lies within our arsenal becomes a point of strength. The line should be drawn when we resort to evil itself as a weapon to fight evil, but using feminine charm does not cross that line. I, as a Jewish woman do not want to be compared with a man in terms of my successful mirroring of his maleness, this offends me.

In a statement on Jewish women, Rashbam, a Jewish commentator has said that the women in Egypt, Esther and Judith are responsible for our salvation. According to Rashbam we were redeemed due to their deeds. Judith was a heroine who stepped in when the leaders of her community would not. Judith fought evil with every part of who she was. I am proud to remember her at Chanukah.

Beit Halochem helps war disabled face emotional, spiritual obstacles

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — War injuries are harder to deal with emotionally and spiritually than they are physically, says the executive director of the Israeli-based Zahal Disabled Veterans Fund, the financial arm of Zahal Disabled Veterans Organization.

"A doctor can fix your injuries, but it's very hard to deal with the obstacles that you have to face," said Ilan Egozi.

"You suddenly have to think about things you never had to think about before, such as how to tie a shoe or open a can. You realize how dependent you could become on other people."

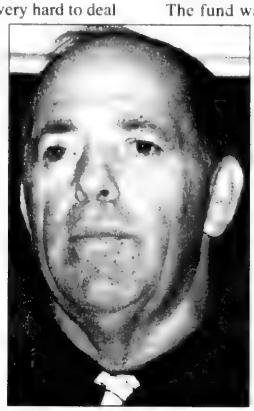
Egozi was here recently on behalf of Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada, to raise awareness about Zahal Disabled Veterans Fund, and its projects including Beit Halochem, which supports rehabilitation facilities in Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem, and a convalescent centre in Nahariya.

Currently there are about 5,600 members in Tel Aviv and 2,700 in each of Jerusalem and Haifa, he said.

Egozi, 57, a retired colonel who served in the army for 25 years, lost his arm below the elbow as well as the sight in one eye, when a hand grenade blew up during a military operation held several weeks before the Yom Kippur War, in which he went on to serve.

He also spent nine months as a prisoner of war in Egypt after being captured during the Six Day War.

After he retired from the army, Egozi, who is married with three children, was a Jewish National Fund shaliach in England.



Ilan Egozi

He credits Israel for doing more than any other country for the welfare of its almost 50,000 war disabled since the War of Independence.

"It provides disability pensions, superior medical care, professional and vocational training, university grants and housing assistance.

"Despite this, however, it is unable to finance all the vast rehabilitation needs of these veterans," he said.

The fund was established, therefore, in order to raise money for projects that promote rehabilitative, social and sports activities for the disabled, for updating equipment and for helping to maintain and operate existing centres, said Egozi.

Zahal's two-pronged approach includes helping disabled veterans obtain the government benefits to which they are entitled, "but our main objective is to rehabilitate them, and provide a support system for their families because rehabilitation is a family affair," Egozi said.

The rehabilitation process includes treatment such as physiotherapy and hydrotherapy, and sports and leisure activities including basketball, archery, swimming and wheelchair dancing.

"People feel comfortable at our centres; everything is accessible and no one feels different.

"Beit Halochem is a soft landing for them. These people gave everything for Israel, and without their spirit, Israel would not exist. If they recover emotionally, nothing can stop them," said Egozi.

Israeli youth are "heartened by the centres because they know that if anything were to happen to them they would not be neglected. A war disability is forever and we will always need the centres."

DJDS BOOK FAIR:

The Downtown Jewish Day School (DJDS) recently held a week-long Chanukah book fair and storytelling festival. Dan Yashinsky (pictured), a storyteller and compiler of five books of stories, told an enchanting story enjoyed by adults and kids alike. Many of the students wrote and illustrated small books of their own, and each of the school's 61 students decorated a letter of the alphabet that, when combined, spelled out the message on the banner in the photo. Author/illustrator Richard Ungar also dazzled DJDS students (and two classes visiting from the Heschel School) by reading from his book Rachel Captures the Moon. The book fair featured both religious and secular books for children and adults, as well as Judaica and, of course, jelly donuts. Proceeds will go to the school's library.

Temple Sinai honoured by UAHC

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

At the UAHC convention, Nani and Austin Beutel (left photo) and Ben Steinberg were honoured.

TORONTO — Temple Sinai was honoured in more ways than one at the Union of American Hebrew Congregations' biennial convention held recently in Boston.

In addition to the temple winning the Irving J. Fein social action award for its work on the Native Men's Residence Street Help Van, Ben Steinberg, composer-in-residence at Temple Sinai was presented with the Rabbi Maurice N. Eisendrath Bearer of Light Awards for his musical contribution to congregations and communities around the world.

As well, the convention honoured Austin and Nani Beutel for their years of commitment to the Reform movement worldwide.

Austin is immediate past president of the World Union for Progressive Judaism – he was president for six years – and past president of both Canadian Council for Reform Judaism and Temple Sinai.

Nani is a vice-president of ARZA/World Union, North America, and is also co-chair of the World Union's Committee on the former Soviet Union (The couple took part in missions to the FSU in 1988 and 1990.)

While president of the WUPJ, says Austin, his focus was on the development of liberal congregations in Israel and the former Soviet Union.

"Although the progressive movement is not recognized by the Israeli Ministry of Religion, I believe [the movement] is growing," he says. "More and more people are performing life cycle events at progressive congregations."

The progressive movement appeals to a liberal population that wants to participate according to its own dictates and interpretation, aided by writings, says Nani. "It does not automatically accept the dictates of a central body."

The couple joined Temple Sinai when they moved here in 1978 from Montreal, where they had belonged to a modern Orthodox synagogue.

"Temple Sinai enriched our lives," says Nani. "[We discovered] that we could live Jewishly while performing those mitzvot with which we are comfortable, and which represent important values all week long."

Volunteer work is an important part of their lives, she says. "I'm a professional volunteer. I do work for Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre, as well as for Ben-Gurion University.

"It's the tradition of giving back. I don't want to turn my back. It's part of knowing who I am as a Jew."

Steinberg, a professional composer, has been with Temple Sinai for 31 years. He was music director until 1996 when he was named composer-in-residence.

"Jewish music is my first love," he says. "It is the most eloquent voice of prayer; it speaks straight to the heart.

"A good chord can convey the message of a prayer quickly and effectively, and can support the rabbi's message better than anything else," says Steinberg, whose father was a cantor.

As music director, Steinberg developed the temple's Musical Legacy series, of which he says the congregation, the rabbi and the board is very supportive.

"Temple Sinai is a singing congregation. If a cantor sings the same tune two weeks in a row, the congregants begin humming it. It is very flattering to the cantor.

"Our congregation has always loved to sing, and I am very supportive of it," says Steinberg, who has conducted the temple's choir for 26 years.

He says he was very moved when he was notified about the award. "I do these things because I want to. When the outside world recognizes and honours it, it is very encouraging."

His mission, he says, is to contribute to the music of Judaism and educate people as to what Jewish music means. "It's as if I've never had to work. I get a great deal of joy and fulfilment from my work. It is teaching at its highest level."

The congregation has produced rabbis, cantors and musicians, he says, "and I have been involved in teaching them. I get a great kick out of it. When I see them [at their own congregation], I feel like I'm seeing one of my own kids."

Speisman leaves archives for cemetery operations

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Stephen Speisman has obviously given thought to the similarities between archives and cemeteries.

Ontario's longtime Jewish community archivist recently became full-time executive director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park/Pardes Shalom Cemetery, a position he has held on a part-time basis since July 1999, following a decade as a lay officer.(Longtime assistant archivist Howard Markus is now running the archives, assisted by a corps of about two dozen volunteers.)

"Archives are the collective memory of the community," Speisman explained recently. "A cemetery is also the collective memory of the community.

"In the archives, we don't discriminate between the different denominations, the different factions. We collect everything, because that's the community. And similarly, the cemetery is [representative of] the community." Both are future-oriented, he added. "There is a connection."

For Speisman, 58, the connection is long-standing. On one of his first dates with his wife, Leila (now a CJN reporter), more than 30 years ago, they went to a local Jewish cemetery so he could complete some research.

His PhD thesis at the University of Toronto led to the publication of his book, The Jews of Toronto: A History to 1937, a winner of the City of Toronto Book Award.

Originally a student of American history, Speisman changed course when a professor recognized and encouraged his passion for local Jewish history.

It began when he attended the mid-1960s closing of the synagogue at Bloor Street and Dovercourt Road, where his grandfather had served as shammas. "I discovered to my great surprise that I was the only one who brought a camera," Speisman recalled in an interview Nov. 30, his last day at the archives. "It was a little Brownie flash that I got for my bar mitzvah."

He decided that – as a hobby – he would photograph "every building of Jewish significance left in downtown Toronto, because they were closing up faster than anyone could expect."

In 1969, he was ecstatic to discover a photo of an old synagogue that he never expected to find. He had just completed a summer of research on Upper Canadian newspapers of the 1820s and was scheduled to take his work to the professor who had hired him.

Excited over his personal find, Speisman "had to share it. Who are you going to share it with? A historian!"

The professor, the late Gerald Craig – "a good Presbyterian" – suggested that Speisman pursue his hobby in a more formal way instead of writing his doctoral dissertation on an aspect of American history, as he had planned.

At that time, there were no Jewish archives in Toronto, although there was an archives committee of the Toronto Jewish Historical Society and what was then called central region of Canadian Jewish Congress. Speisman recalls being told that if he wanted an archives, he should create one himself.

He was hired on a part-time basis as a graduate student, and the position became a full-time one when he completed his studies. "This was an exciting opportunity… something I was really interested in."

He began in 1973 with two used filing cabinets in the waitresses' changing room at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue. For the 1½ years he spent there, he made sure to knock on the door before entering.

The archives' next home was at 152 Beverley St., a "fire-trap" built in the 1870s that was, in fact, gutted by fire shortly after it was vacated by Jewish community organizations when the Lipa Green Building opened in 1983. Archival material was housed in four fireproof cabinets weighing 600 lbs. apiece when empty.

Today, the 4,000-square-foot, temperature- and humidity-controlled premises at the Lipa Green Building (as well as an offsite storage facility) are crammed and overflowing with boxes of what Speisman refers to as the treasures of the Jewish community.

Materials date back to 1855 and include about 6,000 catalogued photographs. (The archives today comes under the auspices of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.) It fields about 1,000 research requests each year, Speisman said.

"Our mandate is to find and collect the records of the Jewish community in Ontario – records of Jewish organizations, synagogues, mutual benefit societies, Hadassah chapters, newspapers."

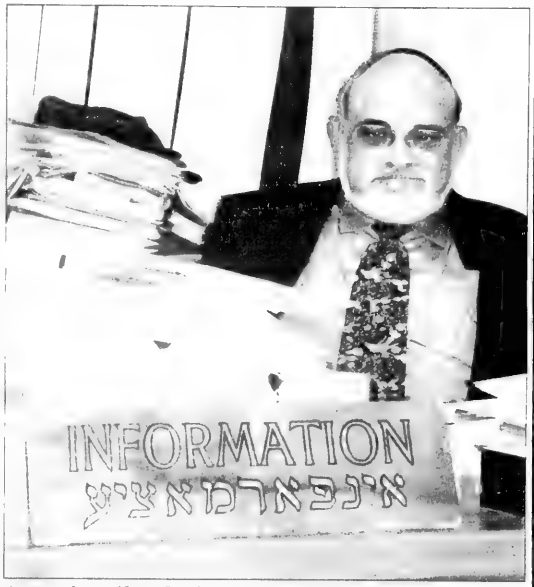
Among the more unusual items – one that nobody sees, said Speisman – is a 19th-century photograph of a European Jewish family standing in a cemetery with an upright, open casket. The item, which was sent to family members here, reflects a 19th-century obsession with death, he said. It is "not unique, although it's very unusual to see in Jewish families."

Representing the other end of the life cycle, the archives also has Cantor (and mohel) Bernard Wladowski's brit milah records from 1912 to 1932, a personal favorite of Speisman's. The handwritten Yiddish documents include family names, addresses, how much Wladowski charged, and whether or not he was paid.

"What's really beautiful about this," Speisman said, is that a number of men who had no birth certificates were able to use the records to prove their age to the government so they could collect pensions.

Speisman is also positive about his work at Pardes Shalom. "Our board meetings are a kiddush hashem [sanctification of God's name]," he said, referring to the respectful working relationship among members ranging from Orthodox to secular.

"It's time for a change," he said. Even so, he's quick to admit he's happy his new office is in the same building as the archives. "Every time I get homesick, I can come down here and pester Howard," he joked.



Among the artifacts Stephen Speisman left behind at the Archives is the Yiddish information sign, front left, from former Jewish communal offices on Beverley Street. [Frances Kraft photo]

December, 2001

A message to our community,

With 2001 coming to a close I wanted to update you on Baycrest's opportunities and challenges and thank you for contributing to a very successful year.

Dealing with our financial reality

We have made great progress in addressing our current financial challenge thanks to a balance of strategies that have worked very well—a balance that emphasizes revenue generation, reductions in administrative expenses and painstakingly considered changes in care-related areas that do not impact the "essence of Baycrest". We are very thankful for the input our community provided us in developing these directions, during our consultation process. We are also very grateful for the very generous contributions to our Foundation that have helped us avoid more significant reductions. The combination of this support and the changes we implemented have meant that our financial challenges are much more manageable

Responding to the changing needs of our community

While dealing with our financial reality has been an immediate priority, we have not lost sight of the need to keep pace with the changing needs of our community. That is why we have been developing a clear strategic focus for future development of care, research and education.

Over the years Baycrest has developed a reputation for its expertise and knowledge in the area of cognitive impairment associated with aging. However, when we combine our expertise with the latest statistics showing forty percent of people will have some form of serious brain-related disorder by the age 80, plus the enormous waiting lists for care of those with these problems, we knew exactly what our focus for future development should be--brain functioning and mental health. This includes illnesses such as Alzheimer's and other causes of dementia, Parkinson's disease, stroke, and other brain diseases including the whole range of geriatric mental health and psychiatric disorders.

This focus does not change our mission or values, nor does it mean we will abandon our current commitments. Rather it means we will build on our expertise to address a significant need in our community. I cannot think of any better organization to do this than Baycrest.

Special thanks

I want to again thank you for the support you have provided us over the past year. I hope you agree that together we have achieved great progress in many areas. Most importantly, we have done so while continuing to touch the lives of over 2000 seniors every day, through our care alone.

Baycrest is very privileged to have such a supportive community. Thank you.

Gov. Gen. celebrates Chanukah in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Gov. Gen. Adrienne Clarkson says she finds it amusing when people advise her how to act at a Jewish gathering. That's because she grew up in an Ottawa neighbourhood with a large Jewish population.

"Half the kids in my high school were Jewish," she recalled. "The competition for scholarships was terrific. As the child of Chinese immigrants from Hong Kong, my aspirations and those of my parents were the same as my Jewish friends. We viewed education as the way to get ahead. In the 1950s, no one had enough money, not even the rich people."

Because of fond memories growing up with Jewish friends, Clarkson said she tries to celebrate Chanukah every year.

On the second night of Chanukah, she joined more than 300 people here at Rosh Pina Synagogue for chicken, kasha and latkes at a tri-synagogue (Rosh Pina, Beth Israel, Bnay Abraham) dinner.

The evening began with words of welcome from Rosh Pina chair Merrill Shulman and Chanukah songs sung by the Aleph Bet Daycare and Margaret Park Hebrew Bilingual School choirs.

In her remarks, Clarkson recalled celebrating Chanukah at a synagogue in Ottawa two years ago where, she said, she knew half the people. "It was the synagogue my pediatrician, Dr. Perl, used to attend," she recalled.

Last year, Clarkson was in Sarajevo during Chanukah visiting Canadian peacekeeping forces in the region.

"Sarajevo was a revelation," she said. "The city has been considerably rebuilt. As I went about the city, I could see how intermingled all the ethnic and religious groups were. All the religions of Europe met at Sarajevo and lived side by side in peace for centuries. You see a mosque cheek by jowl with a Catholic church, with a synagogue and orthodox church nearby, and they all look about the same."

She noted that before World War II, Sarajevo had a population of about 45,000, including about 10,000 Jews. Now the Jewish presence is negligible.

Clarkson said she spoke with the president of the 100-person Jewish community in Mostar. Because he is not Serb, Croat or Bosnian, he can no longer participate in public life in Bosnia, she said.

"Most people there don't want to say what they are," she said, "because there has been so much intermarriage. For Jews, it is worse. I am hopeful that Canada will be able to help the peoples of Bosnia to rebuild a normal civil society where cultural differences are observed peacefully."

She also said that while in Sarajevo, she had the honour of seeing the famed 14th century Sarajevo Haggadah. "When you look at it initially, you can't be sure if it is a medieval Catholic manuscript, a Muslim Koran picture book or a Haggadah," she observed. "The style is the same."

Before the lighting of the Chanukah candles, Rabbi Henry Balser, spiritual leader of Rosh Pina, said the Chanukah lights are a small example of God's light, a light of tolerance and understanding that shines on all of us.

After the meal, Clarkson walked the room, stopping at each table to greet people and pass out treats to the kids.

Chanukah sounds ring out in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — It may not qualify as a miracle, but the first day of Chanukah was celebrated in the nation's capital with a historic first. Immediately following the noon bells from the Peace Tower on Parliament Hill, the sounds of Chanukah melodies rang out loud and clear.

Under blue skies and mild temperatures, members of the Jewish community gathered with diplomats, Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, other members of Parliament and a crowd of passersby outside the Peace Tower for a 15-minute Chanukah carillon recital by Dominion Carilloneur Gordon Slater.

The Hillel Academy children's choir, under the direction of Ricki Grebler, also performed several Chanukah songs, inviting the audience to join in.

After the concert, Israel's Ambassador to Canada Haim Divon spoke.

"It is always great to take part in the Chanukah festivities," he said. "Throughout history, we went through difficult days – dark days, but also happy days. Lighting the Chanukah candles should remind us of the spirit of the Jewish people, of our long tradition and history and happy moments which we always cherish, that there is always a bright future and that the high spirit of the Jewish people will always prevail."

Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler called the day "historic," saying, "I don't know when the Peace Tower ever played Chanukah songs."

He said that "if CNN were there that day, they would have had a different story. They would not have seen the nissim and the niflaot; they wouldn't have had a sense of the miracle, the sense of the human spirit or what Chanukah symbolizes – for the world, not just for the Jewish people, of the victory of the few against the many, of the just against the unjust, the importance of freedom of religion and of religious belief and the conquest of the human spirit.

"Today, on Dec. 10, was the universal declaration of human rights in 1948," Cotler said. "It is Chanukah, it is Human Rights Day, and what better way to end it than by saying lo yisa goy el goy cherev, lo yilmidu od milchamah (nation shall not lift up sword against nation; neither shall they learn war anymore)."

Tribunal rules B.C.'s hate law constitutional

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A British Columbia tribunal has upheld the constitutionality of a section of the province's human rights code that prohibits publication of material that promotes hatred or contempt of identifiable groups.

Tribunal member Tom Patch ruled the provision of the B.C. Human Rights Code is justifiable in a free and democratic society.

The ruling leaves in effect a 1999 decision by a BC Human Rights Tribunal that found columnist Doug Collins and the North Shore News had published four columns that were "likely to expose Jewish persons to hatred or contempt because of their race, religion or ancestry."

The tribunal ordered Collins and the newspaper to pay $2,000 in damages to the complainant, Harry Abrams, to publish a summary of the decision and to refrain from further statements that expose Jews to hatred or contempt.

At the time, Patch, who headed the earlier tribunal, agreed to sever the constitutional issues from the factual question of whether the articles violated terms of the code.

Collins died after arguments on the constitutional issues were heard but before a decision was rendered. Nevertheless, the tribunal determined the issue was not moot, because its ruling could have an impact on the earlier order. In addition, Victoria lawyer Doug Christie, who represented Collins' estate, told the tribunal that Collins' widow wishes to publish her late husband's writings, including the articles that formed the basis of the complaint against him.

Patch ruled that Christie failed to distinguish the Abrams case from an earlier decision that also involved Collins. In that case, brought by Canadian Jewish Congress for a single Collins article that appeared in the North Shore News, the tribunal ruled any limits on Collins' Charter rights to free speech were justifiable in a free and democratic society.

Bronfman family aids Manitoba community

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Plum Coulee, a mainly Mennonite town of about 750 in southern Manitoba, is about to receive a major boost from the Bronfman family.

The family's connection with the town dates back about 100 years.

It was the birthplace of Saidye Rosner, who was later to marry Sam Bronfman.

At the turn of the 20th century, Plum Coulee was home to one of the largest Jewish communities in western Canada outside an urban area.

In 1901, the town had a recorded population of about 400, 70 of whom were Jewish.

Saidye's father Sam Rosner, who owned Rosner Brownstone General Store, was one of the town's leading merchants. The Rosner family moved to Winnipeg in 1908 when Saidye was 15. The last Jewish family left Plum Coulee in the 1940s.

Last July, the town celebrated its centennial. Sam and Saidye Bronfman's daughter, Phyllis Lambert, was one of about 1,000 people who came for the celebration. Lambert stayed with Cleo Heinrichs, the town historian who put together the centennial book.

"We got along very well," Heinrichs says of her illustrious guest. "She was down to earth. We worked together in the kitchen and she helped clean up."

Lambert enjoyed the celebration so much that she decided – in her capacity as honorary president of the Bronfman Family Foundation – to help the town with its rejuvenation plans.

The town's grain elevators were closed earlier this year, and it was in some financial difficulty. Community leaders are trying to raise $2 million to transform the town.

The highlights of the plan include a heritage square to mark the town's multi-ethnic history, and a restaurant atop one of the abandoned grain elevators.

Lambert has hired an architect to oversee the plans and the Bronfman Foundation will contribute an undetermined sum of money toward the cause.

New subsidy launched for missions to Israel for Keren Hayesod), said the federation is "looking for more donors who would like to encourage people to go to Israel."

Despite the ongoing intifadah in Israel, there have been "fewer cancellations than you would expect," English said of the Toronto missions. The cancellation rate for 2001 was approximately 20 percent, he said, and a recent mission had almost three dozen participants. Since October 2000, the federation has run 14 such missions.

As a result of the subsidy, organizers expect at least 1,000 participants this year, roughly double the number who took part this year.

Opportunities now to get involved

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

We wrap up our series examining the parties in the House of Commons with two generic observations that should shape Canadian Jewry's strategic political action plan over the next few years.

The first is that the Jewish community has a basic choice to make. It can seek to have an impact on the political sector from the outside – as one of literally hundreds of special interest groups – or it can seek to influence it from within. It is the difference between being a sales representative or a partner in a business venture.

The advantage of being on the outside is that one can "peddle the product" without necessarily diluting the message. Being an insider, however, almost invariably requires some watering down of the message, and that can sometimes be a problem.

On the other hand, the chief benefit of being on the inside is the assurance that one will always be at the table. The outsider may have an unadulterated product, but he or she can never assume the product will be even given any consideration.

But the differences between insider and outsider are not mutually exclusive. In fact, the two approaches represent an entirely complementary and effective strategy.

Jews throughout the country ought to be encouraged to become insiders, actively and directly involved in partisan politics. In particular, the desirability of Jewish political activism should be conveyed to university students.

But even if the majority of community members refrain from direct involvement in the political process (and regrettably, that is certain to be the case), they can still serve both as an identifiable outside interest group as well as an effective constituency of the community members who are insiders – that is, those who are active in partisan politics.

The other observation from our series is that opportunities for influence within all five federal parties has never been more available. Each party is in a state of flux, and that fluidity creates openings for partisan rookies that in other times would have taken years of door-to-door campaigning to achieve.

There are scads of reasons for the Jewish community to become more effective in its political involvement. The opportunities exist now. Whether it comes to pass, however, ultimately will be determined by the community's desire to empower itself and make a real contribution.

And, by the way, Canada would be better off for the Jewish community's involvement.

JCT president pays visit to Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Since its founding in 1969, the Jerusalem College of Technology (JCT, known in Israel as Machon Lev) has combined traditional yeshiva learning with state-of-the-art science and technology.

During a recent weekend visit to Ottawa, JCT's president, Prof. Joseph Bodenheimer, delivered the Chazzan Weissbord Memorial Lecture at a Shabbat dinner at Congregation Machzikei Hadas. The Canada-Israel Industrial Research & Development Foundation (CIIRDF) and Congregation Machzikei Hadas jointly hosted the visit.

"This was an opportunity to bring Prof. Bodenheimer to Ottawa on one of his many trips to North America to familiarize the community with what is happening in his unique institution," said Rothschild.

Bodenheimer heads the only accredited college of engineering in Jerusalem and the only college in Israel combining technology, business and management with intensive Jewish studies.

Some of the college's programs include Ethiopians for Engineers, which integrates Ethiopian immigrants into the Israeli high-tech sector; one that allows former yeshiva students an opportunity to be trained in a field that will enable them to support their families; and Machon Tal, which allows women to study and receive academic degrees in high-tech engineering.

Bodenheimer stressed the importance of values throughout his address.

"An engineer with values," he said, "makes a more valuable engineer."

Henri Rothschild, CIIRDF's president, agreed: "At Machon Lev, students are trained to appreciate the importance of these values and are trained to live by them and this is why they make better engineers and better citizens of Israel."

During Shabbat services the following day, Bodenheimer spoke on The Message of Parshat Vayetze, a discussion of the application of Torah values in real life, then and now.

The visit concluded with a Sunday brunch held at the residence of Haim Divon, Israel's Ambassador to Canada. Members of the community were invited to meet Bodenheimer and to learn about a planned initiative to bring to Ottawa world-renowned visiting experts on science, technology and investment who are also JCT supporters.

"I would like to establish a chapter of Friends of Machon Lev in Ottawa and to find creative ways for members of the community to support the college," Rothschild said.

New JIAS president elected in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Leslie Wilder, the new president of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services Canada (JIAS), is a longtime Jewish community leader.

Wilder, a teacher at Winnipeg's Red River College, has served as president of the Jewish Child and Family Service (she is currently a member of the excutive) and has also been an executive board member of the international organization Association of Jewish Family and Children's Agencies of North America.

Currently on the board of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal, she was a member of the JIAS board for several years before assuming the two-year term as president.

"At JIAS, we focus on helping to resettle Jewish refugees and immigrants in partnership with federations and Jewish agencies across Canada," she says.

"We have been finding our case loads growing in recent times as more Jewish communities are in distress again, not only in eastern Europe but also in some Latin American countries where the economies are doing poorly."

Most Jewish immigrants who come to Canada are skilled workers, she points out, unlike those in the past. Many come here because of Canada's reputation and its immigration rules, which are moreliberal than those of the United States.

JIAS is redirecting its efforts to national needs after a few years of focusing primarily on needs in Toronto and Montreal. The board recently set up a special task force to study all aspects of the organization, Wilder says.

"We are looking at drafting a new mission statement, staff development, the costs of doing business, standards and best practices and how to equalize funding fairly across the country," she says. "The number of Jewish immigrants coming to Vancouver and Winnipeg is growing while the figures elsewhere in the country remain stable. Our funding has to reflect that."

Brantford synagogue closing its doors

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The small Jewish community of Brantford, Ont., a 75-minute drive southwest of Toronto, has put its synagogue up for sale.

"We don't even have enough [men] for a minyan. More and more are passing on or moving to big cities," said Arthur Sherman, president of Beth David Congregation, which was incorporated in 1911 and moved to its present building from a nearby house in 1948.

"It's sad, in a sense," said Sherman, who is in his mid-50s. "I've lived here my whole life, but what can you do? Things change. I've seen it in a lot of small communities."

Sherman estimates the congregation has about 25 members. At its height, Brantford's Jewish community – which dates back over a century – comprised more than 150 families.

In recent years, services at the Orthodox synagogue were held only on the High Holy Days or for special occasions like a bar or bat mitzvah. This year, there were no High Holy Day services in Brantford, although there was a bar mitzvah in the fall.

Rabbi William Eisenstein, principal of the Hamilton Hebrew Academy (about 20 minutes from Brantford by car), still teaches youngsters at Beth David's weekly Hebrew school, but the number of his students has dwindled to three, either because the children are older now or because their families have moved out of town.

The rabbi has been associated with the synagogue for about a decade, conducting life cycle events and High Holy Day services.

"I'll be with them as long as they want me to be with them," he said.

Canada again backs United Nations votes critical of Israel

Canada's support for the vote was expected, as it backed the measure in lower-level committee meetings [CJN, Dec. 6]. The resolution calls on Israel to cease its practice of searching trucks belonging to the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) and of questioning UN staff. The UN alleges the searches have seriously impeded the flow of medical supplies, food and other provisions to Palestinians.

Israel counters that the searches are essential to its security and that while aid trucks are often delayed, they always reach their destinations.

The resolution also calls on Israel to compensate the UN for damage to UN property "resulting from actions by the Israeli side." It was adopted by a vote of 151 to three (Israel, the United States and the Marshall Islands voted against it).

Canada expected to change its vote on resolution affirming right of Palestinians to self-determination

Other General Assembly resolutions Canada voted for include:

- Extending the mandate of UNRWA to June, 2005.
- Allowing those displaced by the 1967 Six Day War and "subsequent hostilities" to return to "the territories occupied by Israel since 1967."
- Encouraging member states and non-governmental organizations to offer grants and scholarships to Palestinian refugees.
- Calling on Israel to "deal with" the matter of Palestinian refugees' lost properties and their revenues.
- Reaffirming the need to strengthen education for Palestinian refugees.
- Reaffirming the applicability of the Geneva Conventions, which protect civilians in wartime, to the "occupied territories, including Jerusalem and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967." (This is unrelated to Canada's support this month of a resolution arising from a day-long conference in Geneva convened to call on Israel to "refrain" from violating the conventions.)
- Reaffirming that Israeli settlements "in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem and the occupied Syrian Golan" are "illegal and an obstacle to peace."
- Condemning "all acts of violence, especially the excessive use of force against Palestinian civilians." It also calls on Israel to "accelerate the release of all remaining Palestinians arbitrarily detained or imprisoned."
- Calling on Israel "to desist from imposing Israeli citizenship and identity cards on Syrian citizens in the occupied Syrian Golan."

Canada abstained on a resolution that "deplores those policies and practices of Israel which violate the human rights of the Palestinian people and other Arabs of the occupied territories."

One resolution on the financing of UNRWA was adopted without a vote.

The only changes in Canada's voting record, compared to last year, have taken place with respect to two resolutions that are expected to come up in the General Assembly in the coming days.

In one, Canada will withdraw its traditional support for the the UN's so-called recipe for Mideast peace. Last year, Canada voted for the measure; this year, in committee, it abstained.

Goldberg believes Canada pulled its support for the measure in light of this month's suicide bombing attacks in Jerusalem and Haifa.

Canada is expected to change its vote on a resolution affirming the right of Palestinians to self-determination. Last year, Canada abstained; this year, it is expected to back the measure.

That's because Canada has moved away from opposing a Palestinian unilateral declaration of independence, as a way of encouraging the parties back to the negotiating table, Goldberg believes.

Canadian Jews may be angered by Ottawa's voting, but Goldberg said Canada has also done a lot of behind-the-scenes work at the UN, including playing a role in the watering down of the final declarations of last summer's Durban conference on racism and of this month's Geneva conference.

However, that "doesn't diminish the sense of frustration" Canadian Jews have with their government at the UN, he added.

Retired civil servant teaches Hebrew in Jamaica

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — When Marty Abrams, a former Torontonian and ex-federal civil servant, accepted a six-month assignment last spring to teach Jamaican government officials about policy-making, he didn't expect to become a Hebrew teacher as well.

Abrams' assignment for the Canadian International Development Corporation (CIDA) in Jamaica is to brief cabinet ministers and advise them on public consultation.

"I felt that, unlike most consultants who only stay around for a few weeks, if I was going to really to have some impact in terms of knowledge transfer, then I needed to be there for a lengthy period of time," said Abrams, who retired three years ago after a 30-year career in the civil service.

But the CIDA mission has turned into something more for Abrams, who spoke to The CJN from Ottawa, where he and his wife Tanya, a former Winnipegger, were enjoying a brief visit home.

When he arrived in Jamaica, Abrams discovered that Kingston, the capital, has a very active Jewish community of about 300 people, few of whom have more than a minimal knowledge of Hebrew. (There is also a Hillel school, but most of its students aren't Jewish.)

"We started going to shul Friday evenings and Saturday mornings," Abrams said. "The synagogue is a Reform-type synagogue in a rundown part of town. Usually, 10 to 20 people attend, among them several black non-Jews who are interested in the religion or are considering converting."

One Friday evening, Abrams said, he and his wife sat next to a Jamaican woman who noticed that they were reading the prayers in the actual Hebrew rather than the transliterated text read by the rest of the congregation.

The woman asked if they would teach her Hebrew and Abrams agreed. He downloaded some learning materials from the Internet and got things started.

"The word spread, and before long I had a class of six to eight students. Most of the students aren't Jewish," he said.

"We meet Thursday evenings and go over the prayer service. Hopefully by the time we leave Jamaica, some of them will be able to follow the service in Hebrew."

The Jewish presence in the Caribbean goes back to Columbus, Abrams notes, and there are tombstones in Jamaica's Jewish cemetery dating back to the 1600s.

In January, Kingston is hosting a three-day conference of Caribbean Jewry and Tanya will be involved as a volunteer driving delegates around town and helping out wherever she can. Several hundred people are expected.

Dunkelmans mark 60 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sophie Hoffman and Danny Dunkelman met in the 1930s at Tip Top Tailors, where Sophie was secretary to Danny's brother, Moe Dunkelman, and Danny was learning to be a designer.

Sophie and Danny Dunkelman.

On Dec. 13, the youthful looking and still-active Dunkelmans celebrated their 60th wedding anniversary and Sophie's 84th birthday with family and friends.

"We rushed our marriage in 1941 because Danny had joined the infantry's Royal Regiment of Canada and he was going off to British Columbia where we lived for two years," says Sophie.

When her husband was sent overseas in 1943, Sophie was three months pregnant. He served in France, Belgium, Holland and Germany and was injured several times. Shrugging off his bravery – evident from his many ribbons – he says, "I got a couple of nicks, but I didn't let that bother me."

When Danny returned from Europe after the war, he saw his 1¾-year-old daughter Beverley for the first time. The couple had another daughter, Theo, two years after he came home. The war left a scar on the Hoffman and Dunkelman families. Sophie's brother, Teddy Hoffman, a pre-med student who served as a flying officer, was killed in action in Hamburg, Germany.

To comfort her parents, Sophie, Danny and their two daughters moved in with the Hoffmans and their parents on Euclid Avenue. It was a home with four generations.

Danny worked in a printing and office supply company, retiring at 70. Sophie worked in financial control and retired at 65. "I became a caregiver for my parents," she says.

Over the years, the Dunkelmans have served in many capacities in their synagogue, the Adath Sholom, and in the community. As a young man, Danny became active in the Minsker farband, which later bought property and built Adath Sholom.

Danny and his father were original members of the shul's choir. They were later joined by daughters Theo, who still sings with the group, and Beverley, who now leads the choir.

The Dunkelmans say they have managed to stay young at heart because they are very active, have a close-knit family and have many younger friends.

Danny delivers Meals on Wheels, is chairman of the house committee at Adath Sholom and loves to socialize. For many years, Sophie knit sweater sets for premature babies at The Hospital for Sick Children. And despite the aches and pains of age, she crocheted 150 kippot for her granddaughter's wedding.

"We are very lucky," says Sophie. "There is longevity on both sides of our family. We do most things together – we even go to the chiropractor together and we love shopping."

Theo says it's her parents' easygoing and non-confrontational style that keeps them youthful.

"I never heard my parents argue or raise their voices. Nothing keeps them down for long. Above all, they love to have fun."

Sophie advises, "To have a successful marriage, you have to have respect for each other, compromise and never take things for granted."

As for the future, Danny says, "We are looking forward to having great grandchildren – two are on the way."

'Radical' element turfed in Concordia student byelection

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The radical leftists who had controlled Concordia University's undergraduate student council since 1999 were voted out in a recent byelection, but no one should think that's the end of them, says one of the council's incoming vice-presidents.

Sharon Koifman of the Representative Union (RU), which won the close byelection for a new council executive, thinks the leftists – whose anti-Israel, anti-corporate and anti-university administration rhetoric has kept Concordia in the headlines for months and alienated many students – will regroup and attempt a comeback in the Concordia Student Union (CSU) general elections in March.

Students who don't want to see that happen should not slip into their habitual indifference, he advises. "By definition, the moderates are less political than the radicals," he said. "And they will be taking advantage of that."

The RU, headed by Chris Schulz, presented itself as a "coalition for change" and was behind the 3,200-signature petition that forced the byelection. The group has presented itself as a moderate alternative that is more representative of Concordia's 23,000 undergraduates.

Koifman said the RU will use its four months in power to try to solidify a moderate student leadership that is capable of winning against the better-organized far-left.

"In the meantime, we are going to make an effort to move away from international issues and improve the image of the school. We can't be completely neutral, however, because according to the bylaws, the CSU must call a referendum if a certain number of students want to take a position on an issue."

Voter turnout was almost four times the number who voted in last March's general election. Yet, despite all the controversy provoked by the outgoing CSU executive and the scandal of a former CSU official being charged in October with embezzling $193,000 in CSU funds, the number of undergraduates who voted was still relatively low – about 15 per cent.

The seven-member RU slate was elected with 1,638 of 3,648 ballots cast, edging out the second-place Umbrella Party by 264 votes. The results were confirmed last week, after the deadline passed for a contestation.

While the RU now controls the CSU executive, which implements policy, the CSU senate and council still have several people from the old faction and Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), a group that Jewish students have accused of excessive anti-Israel agitation.

As well, Sabrina Stea, the immediate past CSU president who resigned shortly before the RU presented its petition, won one of two council seats also contested in the byelection.

The Israeli-born Koifman, a second-year engineering student, said he is the first engineering student on the CSU in at least seven years. Typically, he said engineering and commerce students have ignored the CSU, but many became interested when they felt its confrontations with several companies threatened their job prospects.

"I even had Arab friends say they were going to vote for me just to calm things down," he said.

Patrick Amar, president of Concordia Hillel, said he hopes the RU's victory will ease tensions on campus and bring stability to the running of student affairs. Hillel openly supported the RU, drawn to it by Schulz's promise to try to keep the CSU politically neutral.

"It's a symbolic election and a symbolic victory," said Amar. "It will take the power out of the hands of people who want to use it for their personal agendas... (The new slate) is much more representative of the general population."

Nevertheless, he does not expect a trouble-free transition of power.

"It's not going to be like, 'here are the keys,'" Amar said.

Hillel executive director Simon Bensimon was also optimistic. "If the CSU is going to become less political, more neutral and more balanced, that's the most we can ask for."

Hillel was particularly disturbed by the CSU's holding a referendum on an anti-Israel resolution last spring – which passed – and by the publication of a student handbook this September entitled Uprising, which appeared to glorify the intifadah.

"The (old) CSU helped, either tacitly or overtly, to create an environment that was very aggressive and stressful for Jewish students," Bensimon said.

"We weren't telling them, 'don't be political, don't mix things up'– but don't take sides."

The RU was temporarily disqualified on the first day of elections Nov. 27 by the chief electoral officer after the leader of the third party in the race alleged an RU candidate tried to convince him to drop out of the election in exchange for a student leadership position or sponsorship in next year's election.

The RU was reinstated the same day after threatening legal action.

Voting was extended from three days to seven, until Dec. 5, because of the disruption. Confirmation of the results was delayed because of threats from supporters of the old council that they would contest them.

The RU's real nemesis, the previous group in office, led by Tom Keefer, dropped out of the race just days before the byelection began after losing a legal challenge. Quebec Superior Court struck down the injunction Keefer and Laith Marouf, another former CSU elected official, had earlier won allowing them onto the campus.

The two had been expelled by the university after allegedly getting into an altercation with, and uttering a death threat against, a security guard who was questioning them after Marouf was caught writing anti-Israel graffiti on university property.

Keefer's group supported the left-wing Umbrella Party, whose leader, Zev Tiefenbach, is Jewish, but critical of Israeli government policy. Another slate member was SPHR vice-president Samer Elatrash.

Arafat orders an end to violence against Israel

By Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — In his strongest ever call for an end to violence, Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat told his people on television Sunday that suicide bombings and all other armed terrorist action against Israel must cease and vowed to arrest militants who defied his call.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who was at a function to present the Prime Minister's Awards for Literature, ignored the speech. Sources in his office said Arafat is "irrelevant," as cabinet ruled last week, and Israel will continue military raids to track down Palestinian militants if Arafat does not act swiftly.

In his speech in Arabic marking the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Fitr at the end of Ramadan, Arafat accused Sharon of declaring war on the PA and appealed directly to the Israeli public. He said Palestinians only want land occupied in the 1967 Six Day War, including East Jerusalem.

The only way out of the crisis, Arafat said, was to resume peace talks immediately and move toward a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza with Jerusalem as its capital.

"Today, I am reiterating my call for a comprehensive cessation to all the armed activities," Arafat said from his office in Ramallah. "I call for a complete halt to all activities, especially the suicide attacks that we always condemn." He said he would arrest Palestinians who carried out attacks.

> 'It's nice to talk but the test is action'

Israel has sharply criticized what it calls Arafat's revolving door policy of temporarily detaining low-level militants, but not locking up senior military leaders in groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

Sources in Sharon's office said "Israel was and remains committed to true peace, peace for generations. Israel is sick and tired of talk and false promises and will do what it must to protect its citizens and its existence."

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said "if the PA wants to exist, it must get out of the cycle of terror."

Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said that "it's nice to talk but the test is action. We've never seen Arafat really fight terror. The speech has important elements, but the test will be real activity against terror."

Knesset opposition leader Yossi Sarid, chairman of Meretz, said that "it looks like Arafat is gradually climbing down from the roof and starting to touch reality. The speech was promising and now he has to fulfill the promise. Based on experience, once must be skeptical of Arafat... to help him against the Hamas and Islamic Jihad, Israel should start lifting sieges and closures and checkpoints and stop the collective punishment."

Throughout his speech, Arafat said the Israelis were responsible for the current crisis. He said Palestinians should observe a cease-fire, but he did not explicitly call for an end to the Palestinian uprising. "We declared the state of emergency and we have implemented a series of arrangements... including declaring illegal all (groups) which are committing terrorist activities." He said that included Palestinian mortar attacks against settlements.

Arafat also urged a resumption of talks. "I would like to renew my call to the people of Israel... to return immediately to the negotiating table," he said. He concluded the half-hour speech by saying, "See you in Jerusalem."

But in the current hostile climate, talks appear unlikely any time soon.

In Washington, White House spokesperson Ari Fleischer said Arafat "spoke constructive words, but what's important is that they be followed up by concrete action. And that's what will be measured, and that's what the president will wait to see."

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said Palestinian attacks were not only undermining peace efforts, they were also weakening Arafat's stature as leader. "He is being attacked and his authority is being destroyed by Hamas and (Islamic Jihad)," Powell said.

U.S. National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice was sharply critical of Arafat. "We're asking him to lead his people rather than continuing to carry out and deal in behavior that makes the situation impossible for achieving peace," she said. "We think there is an awful lot he needs to do (and) he needs to do it quickly, because the chances for peace will slip away if he doesn't act quickly."

In his speech, Arafat said he was aware the U.S. campaign against terror was having an impact on the Middle East. "We understand the changes in the world," Arafat repeated three times.

Earlier Sunday, Arafat prayed at a modest mosque in Ramallah to mark the holiday, and afterward called on Muslims to support the Palestinians. "We hope the Arab nation, and hope the Muslim nation, will stand beside us to defend our holy places, the Christian and Muslim holy places," he said. "I call on my people to be patient because, in the end, the Palestinians will achieve what they want," he said.

But on Monday, Hamas and Islamic Jihad militants in the Gaza Strip and West Bank rejected Arafat's call to end armed attacks and suicide bombings.

In interviews with Al Jazeera and Abu Dhabi television and in statements released in the West Bank and Gaza, the groups said they wouldn't obey the order.

Palestinian sources said that in a statement released Monday morning in the West Bank and Gaza, Hamas and Islamic Jihad called on Palestinians to continue the armed resistance to Israeli occupation. The statement said Arafat and the PA were acting to appease Israel and the United States, and were causing a rift among the Palestinian people.

The statement also said the Americans are enemies of the Palestinian people and targets for future attacks.

Canada concerned over deteriorating Mideast situation

CJN Wire Services

Foreign Minister John Manley expressed concern last week at the deteriorating situation in the Middle East, while Prime Minister Jean Chrétien urged the parties to return to the negotiating table to find a solution to the spiralling wave of violence.

Speaking to reporters, Chrétien said Canada still considers Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat to be the legitimate leader of the Palestinian people.

"He is the spokesman for the Palestinians. For me, he is the authority there," Chrétien said.

"So it's not for me to decide who should be speaking for the Palestinians. They have elected him as the chairman of the population, so he is the one who is there."

The prime minister's remarks came as Israeli officials repeatedly insisted there is no point in further talks with Arafat. Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called the Palestinian leader "irrelevant."

Meanwhile, in a news release, Manley expressed his "deep concern at the serious deterioration of the situation in the Middle East and his outrage at the further loss of life."

In one attack of several incidents last week, gunmen attacked an armoured bus near the West Bank settlement of Immanuel, killing at least 10 Jews. Members of Arafat's Fatah faction claimed they participated in the assault.

"Canadians are struck with horror at the latest series of fatal attacks on civilians and by the gravity of the situation," Manley said.

Canada called on Arafat and all Palestinians to bring an end to the armed intifadah and to dismantle terrorist networks. The PA, the foreign minister said, must take strong, clear and immediate measures to bring to justice all those who use violence.

Manley expressed his condolences to the families of all victims, both Israeli and Palestinian, saying force, in the absence of political options, would not bring about a peaceful solution to the conflict.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's lobbying arm on Israel, condemned the latest wave of terrorist attacks and called on Canada to "join the United States and the European Union in calling for aggressive steps by the PA to dismantle the Hamas and Islamic Jihad terror network and to impose discipline over militant factions of Fatah.

"It is inconceivable that Canada should be lagging behind the European community in conveying to Arafat that the continued existence of his regime is dependent on his taking meaningful, verifiable and sustained steps to imprison terrorists, confiscate illegal weapons and end incitement to violence against Israelis," CIC national chair Joseph Wilder said in a statement. "If Canadian claims of friendship and support for Israel are to have any meaning, we must see significant movement on the government's part with respect to these issues."

Conference focuses on crisis of Argentine Jews

By FLORENCIA ARBISER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — Like the more than 2 million Jews who came to the United States at the turn of the 20th century in search of the American dream, thousands went further south – to Argentina – hoping to find a brighter future.

Now, however, with Argentina in the throes of a wrenching economic crisis, the immigrants' descendants find their dreams shattered.

About 220,000 Jews live in Argentina, and of these, approximately 50,000 are living below the poverty line, said Bernardo Kliksberg of the Inter-American Development Bank.

Asociación Mutual Israelita Argentina, (AMIA), a centre assisting poor Jews, is helping 1,500 families this year, said Elida Kisluk, the director of AMIA's social action department.

Tzedaka, a Jewish organization dedicated to social assistance, estimates that it will assist 3,553 families this year.

Another 80 families are on a waiting list, said Nora Blaistein, Tzedaka's director of social programs. The waiting list started after the economy worsened in 1999.

Thirty percent of the people receiving assistance from Tzedaka are considered long-term poor, while the other 70 percent are called "new poor" – those who used to belong to the middle class until they lost their jobs as a result of ineffective economic and political policies the government implemented in the 1990s.

Not only can they no longer satisfy their cultural and educational aspirations; they can't fulfil basic needs such as food, medicine and shelter.

"Feelings of shame, impotence and frustration make this group break ties with family, friends and Jewish institutions," Blaistein said.

"Around 40 percent of people" in this category "are so ashamed that they do not ask for help," she said.

"They go for assistance only when the rope around their necks gets too tight."

AMIA's Kisluk told a similar story.

"The people we receive at AMIA are in anguish; their self-esteem is broken," she said. "Their family roles have been changed."

The typical family structure – with the father as breadwinner – simply doesn't hold up in such an emergency, placing a strain on family relations.

Main challenges are unemployment and homelessness

To deal with the crisis, a conference called "Confronting Poverty: Solutions, Experiences and Projects" was held last week in Buenos Aires.

The conference was organized by the Latin American Jewish Congress, the Inter-American Development Bank, the Tzedaka Foundation and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

About 650 people – including 200 who came from other Latin American countries, the United States and Israel – attended, including Argentina's president, Fernando De la Rua; Eliane Karp de Toledo, first lady of Peru; Enrique Iglesias, the president of the Inter-American Development Bank; Avi Beker, director of the World Jewish Congress; Chaim Chesler, treasurer of the Jewish Agency for Israel; Rabbi Israel Singer, president of the World Jewish Congress; and members of the World Bank, International Monetary Fund and Organization of American States.

Kisluk and Blaistein agree that the number of middle-class families sliding into poverty has accelerated since the mid-1990s.

"In the 1990s, seven million middle class Argentines became poor," Kliksberg said, adding that only 25 percent of today's Argentina is middle class, as opposed to 53 percent in 1960.

The main challenges now for the Jewish poor, both aid workers say, are unemployment and homelessness.

Some 300 Jewish families now live in shantytowns, Kliksberg said.

In some cases, the housing crisis has forced up to four generations of a family to live under one roof, said Monica Gruska, co-ordinator of a social assistance centre that works with Tzedaka.

Both organizations provide credit for building or repairing houses, paying rent, buying food and medicine and getting psychological assistance, as well as grants for clubs, schools, recreational and cultural events.

One of AMIA's programs connects people who need a room to rent but can't pay a deposit with people who have space to rent and need money. So far, 35 rentals have been arranged.

Tzedaka, meanwhile, has built 12 houses in the Buenos Aires area.

In addition to Tzedaka and AMIA, the JDC and Chabad-Lubavitch are helping as well.

But the government and many nongovernmental organizations are unprepared to work with these middle-class families that became poor, Kisluk said.

And efforts by social assistance organizations are often not enough.

Susana and Ricardo Schatz are far from achieving the dreams that many Jewish immigrants to Argentina once had.

They still remember the night they met at a Jewish ball in 1974 at the Romanian Embassy here. Susana, 45, wore a golden necklace with her name on it; Ricardo, 48, read it and won her heart by addressing her as if they already knew each other.

Nothing could separate the two after that night of dancing. The humble origins of Ricardo's family initially bothered Susana's parents, but eventually they accepted him. After the wedding, Susana's parents bought the couple a three-bedroom house.

Ricardo worked at his father-in-law's small clothing factory. When Susana's father sold the factory, the couple rented a small store and ran their own clothing business.

The 1980s were good years for the Schatzes. They employed Susana's father, Ricardo's brother, two cutters, a seamstress and a presser. They travelled around Argentina and to Brazil. After years of expensive medical treatments, they were able to have children.

At the beginning of the 1990s, however, their business began losing money. They lost clients because of competition with bigger shops, and started to write cheques that couldn't be covered by the funds coming in. They took on more debt until they had to close the business. When their mortgage payments became too high, they lost the property at auction.

The Schatzes moved in with Ricardo's parents for two years, and have lived with Susana's parents for the last three, but the family's economic situation have made relations with his in-laws intolerable for Ricardo.

"I do not speak to them," Ricardo said of Susana's parents. "I even go to a gas/coffee shop to wait until it is late enough not to see them."

Ricardo and Susana now sell manufactured goods to retail shops, but the factories they work for are behind on their payments. They pawn whatever jewelry they have. Their children go to Jewish schools on grants.

With almost no income, the Schatzes cannot even accept a grant to start renting an apartment, because they won't be able to make subsequent payments.

Yet they rejected the food box Tzedaka offered.

"We know we are poor from here," Susana said, putting her hand on her pocket. "But we couldn't accept a donation."

The family is considering trying to make a new life in Israel – a solution for many struggling Argentine Jews.

Rice calls on Lebanon, Syria to dismantle terrorist networks

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — White House National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice called on Lebanon and Syria to dismantle the military arm of Hezbollah in an interview last week with the London-based Arabic language television channel MBC.

Rice called on the two states to dismantle all terrorist networks.

"That's what we're asking of everybody, including Lebanon and Syria," she said.

Rice told MBC that Iran's support for Hezbollah was one of the main obstacles to a rapprochement between Washington and Tehran.

Rice expressed understanding for Hezbollah's political and social roles in Lebanon, but said it also has a military wing that bears a heavy responsibility for the situation in the Middle East.

She noted that several Hezbollah members appear on the United States most-wanted list issued after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Rice said the United States had conveyed to Syria and Lebanon that it was inconceivable to support the battle against Al Qaeda while at the same time supporting Hezbollah's terrorist operations.

Hezbollah secretary-general Hassan Nasrallah accused the United States of lying after its ambassador in Lebanon, Vincent Battle, defined Hezbollah as a terrorist organization with a global reach.

Jewish militants arrested in L.A.

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Canadian leader of the Jewish Defense League believes a U.S. colleague charged in an alleged bomb plot may have been the target of an agent provocateur trying to discredit the organization and to deflect attention from Muslim terrorism.

Meir Halevi said it would be "100 percent out of character" for U.S. JDL chair Irv Rubin to consider bombing Arab and Muslim targets in southern California.

"He's never been involved in anything like that," Halevi said. "There is no credibility [to the allegation] that Rubin would want to blow up a mosque full of people."

Rubin, 56, and Earl Krugel, 59, have been charged with conspiracy to blow up the King Fahd Mosque and the Muslim Public Affairs Council, both in Los Angeles, as well as the offices of Republican Congressman Darrell Issa. Issa, who is of Lebanese descent, is a vocal critic of Israel.

Rubin and Krugel were denied bail after a judge found them to be flight risks and dangerous to the community. Law enforcement officials were seen carrying away weapons from Krugel's home.

While most mainstream U.S. and Canadian Jewish organizations condemned the alleged bomb plot, Halevi suggested it was no more than "a set up" – the kind he said the JDL has experienced both in the United States and Canada. Halevi said both organizations have been approached by "plants, put into the organization to discredit it and to try to get people arrested."

The reason, he suggested, would be deflect attention from the upsurge of anti-Jewish attacks since the onset of the Palestinian intifadah and "to show there are Jewish terrorists and Arab terrorists."

The U.S. charges allege that an informant reported attending a meeting with Rubin and Krugel in October, during which the informant was asked to help bomb the alleged targets.

Krugel allegedly commented during the meeting that Arabs "need a wake-up call," while Rubin allegedly said the JDL needed to let people know that it was "alive in a militant way."

One of Rubin's attorneys, Bryan Altman, claimed federal authorities wanted to demonstrate their "even-handedness" by balancing terrorist charges against Muslims with similar charges against Jews.

Rubin, a native of Montreal but a longtime California resident, was named national chairman of the JDL in 1985 by its founder, the late Rabbi Meir Kahane.

Halevi said he invited Rubin to visit Canada five or six years ago to try to increase the JDL's profile. Currently, the group has "somewhat of a presence in Montreal" that is "trying to take root."

Recent stories deemed newsworthy

The presence of two national newspapers in Canada affords readers the opportunity to see, daily, how news judgments are made, which stories get attention, how much attention they receive and what is deemed newsworthy.

As of this writing, the Israeli government has just announced that it is cutting off all contact with Yasser Arafat following the attack on the bus in the West Bank that left 10 Israelis dead and many others injured.

The Globe and Mail's Middle East correspondent, Paul Adams, reported that story on p. 1, "Ambush prompts Israelis to cut off Arafat" (Dec. 13), but the paper gave far more front-page prominence to the arrest of the Montreal-born head of the Jewish Defense League and one of his followers – on charges that they planned to carry out terrorist attacks on American Muslim targets in Los Angeles.

The attention given by the Globe to the JDL story with its Canadian angle roughly matches the space devoted the previous day to the announcement of the U.S. indictment of Zacarias Moussaoui, the first person charged in the attack on the World Trade Center. (To the charge in the Muslim community that they have been treated unfairly by the media, the attention devoted to Irv Rubin, head of the JDL might show that terrorism or allegations of terrorism, from whatever source, will receive equal treatment.) The story of the alleged JDL plot is attention-grabbing and has therefore received substantial scrutiny in most North American media, even though the JDL is a marginal group. Perhaps because it is so marginal and represents an isolated, anomalous occurrence within the North American Jewish community, the National Post, like the New York Times, placed the story on the inside pages ("U.S. Jewish activists charged in bomb plot," p. 15) and gave more p. 1 attention to the Israel-Arafat story, "Israel gives up on Arafat."

Another news decision around this time is also of interest. On Dec. 10, in a groundbreaking decision, the European Union (EU) declared Hamas and Islamic Jihad terrorist organizations and called upon Arafat not only to dismantle them but also to put an end to the "armed intifadah." The Globe mentioned this development, but only in one paragraph of a story about Israeli retaliatory strikes, filed from Hebron by Nasser Hiyouki of Associated Press. Hiyouki wrote that EU foreign minsters called for Arafat "to dismantle Palestinian radical groups and declare an end to the violent uprising against Israel." On Dec.12, the day after the EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana met with Arafat in Ramallah, the National Post devoted a full story to the EU move, filed by Timothy Heritage of Reuters. Heritage noted Solana's call on Arafat "to fight the terrorists" and the previous day's call by the EU for Arafat to dismantle the "terrorist" (not merely "radical") Islamic groups.

Centenarian looks back on 100 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — She is spry. She is articulate. She is optimistic. And she will be 100 years old on Dec. 29.

Clare Frilegh, who has lived at Pine Villa Retirement Home for four years, said she is "very lucky lady to be alive.

"I have many grandchildren and great-grandchildren and two wonderful children, Selma Adler and Marshal Frilegh. And I was so lucky to be at my great-granddaughter Stacy Walton's wedding and walk down the aisle."

Frilegh's granddaughter and Walton's mother, Niki Parker, said "My grandmother didn't walk down the aisle at the wedding, she danced down and the guests all applauded."

Blind and hearing impaired, Frilegh spoke of the many changes in her life and the world since her birth in the Lower East Side of New York City in 1901.

Born in an age of horse-drawn carriages and no electricity, the centenarian now speaks of the World Wide Web and space travel. Keenly aware of the day-to-day events, she said she is very concerned with what is happening in the United States and Israel.

Claire Levy was 12 years old when her parents moved to Toronto. She attended Ogden Public School and clearly remembers World War I and her happy home with seven sisters and brothers.

She spoke of dating Isadore Frilegh, who was her neighbour on Baldwin Street. "We dated for four years and often went skating free on Grenadier Pond or at Varsity Arena for 15 cents.

They were married in 1919. From 1923 to 1949, the Frileghs lived in New York and returned to Canada when they went into the retail ladies wear business with their son-in-law, Joe Adler.

"I was a salesperson in the store in those days. And I worked hard for Hadassah. We joined the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue on St. Clair Avenue when the shul was in the basement and you knew everyone. In those days, you had your own seats."

Her husband died 11 years ago. "I had good luck to have had such a wonderful husband. And we have such a close family. I am very grateful."

Looking back, Frilegh said when she saw the first car that a neighbour bought on Baldwin Street, "we thought it was a miracle and would just stand there and look at it. In those days, when you bought a car, the company taught you how to drive."

With excitement, she recalls the thrill of her first refrigerator and washing machine and seeing an airplane for the first time. "And now we are into the computer age. It is unbelievable, and they are all miracles."

Much has changed during her 100 years, Frilegh said, but "family was always the most important thing in my life."

She and her family remain close.

"My children don't perceive my grandmother as being old. They call her a friend and they can gain a great deal from her," Parker said.

She said Frilegh "never feels sorry for herself and nothing was ever too hard for her... She exemplifies the song, Accentuate the Positive."

Asked what she would like for her birthday, Frilegh said she "would like to live to see Stacy have a baby so we can be a five-generation family. I have been very content with my life and this would make me so happy."

New treatment for low-grade non-Hodgkin's lymphoma

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new Canadian study has shown that the drug Fludara (fludabarine phosphate) is very effective in treating low-grade non-Hodgkins lymphoma (NHL), but with fewer side effects than conventional treatments, it was announced at a recent press conference.

Health Canada approved the drug for treatment of low-grade NHL at the end of October, making Canada the first country in the world to do so. It has been used for about 10 years as a treatment for chronic lymphocytic leukemia, the most common form of leukemia in the western world, and a disease very similar to NHL.

Non-Hodgkins lymphoma is a cancer of the white blood cells that affects mainly the lymph nodes, spleen, and bone marrow – parts of the body that fight infection. Because of that, it is also referred to as cancer of the immune system.

In Canada each year, 6,200 new cases are diagnosed and the disease causes 2,500 deaths, which means that someone dies of NHL every 3½ hours, said Deborah Skerrit, president of the Lymphoma Foundation Canada.

The disease forced hockey superstar Mario Lemieux to temporarily retire and killed Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis and Jordan's King Hussein.

Peter Anglin, medical oncologist at Credit Valley Hospital in Mississauga, explained that low-grade NHL, which accounts for about 40 percent of NHL cases, develops slowly, usually over six to 12 years and often no treatment is given at first. He said the disease is very difficult to cure, since the cancer is dispersed throughout the body, and cannot be simply removed by surgery.

The usual therapy for NHL has been a cocktail of three drugs called CVP – cyclophosphaminde, vincristine and prednisone. Other treatments include radiation therapy and bone marrow transplants from a patient's own body.

All of these treatments have serious, debilitating side effects, which can include hair loss, nausea and vomiting and extreme fatigue.

Best of all, Anglin said, Fludara appears to be more effective at shrinking the tumours and sending the disease into remission for longer than CVP.

He said researchers don't know yet if the drug will improve long-term survival rates, but it does appear to improve a patient's quality of life.

The drug is administered intravenously for four to six cycles – which each take place over five consecutive days – and there are several weeks between cycles. Sessions last about 30 minutes, and there is no need for hospitalization.

Bruce Tucker, a 43-year-old sergeant with Waterloo Regional Police, said that, at age 37, he was diagnosed with non-Hodgkins lymphoma after a routine physical.

"The doctor said that I would live a long time with it – two to five years. At 37, two to five years is not a long time."

During CVP treatment, Tucker said he gained more than 80 pounds and became so fatigued that he had to leave his position on the emergency response team and take administrative duties.

But with Fludara, he was able to perform his regular duties. He is currently in remission.

Francois Charetter, vice-president of scientific affairs for Berlex Canada Inc., the company that developed the drug in co-operation with the U.S. National Cancer Institute, said that although the cost of Fludara is higher than the cost of CVP (roughly $7,000 per cycle, compared to about $2,000 per cycle for CVP), the difference is offset by the cost of the drugs needed to treat the side effects of the drug cocktail.

Bar mitzvah sparks an inspirational book idea

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Robin Mednick racked her brain to come up with a bar mitzvah gift idea for her youngest son, Zale, that would be meaningful and lasting.

On a plane headed back from Australia, where she served as co-ordinator – or more informally, team mom – for Team 2008 (the athletes involved in Toronto's 2008 Olympic bid), Mednick realized the answer was right in front of her.

"I thought, here I am, surrounded by excellence, by people I admire," she recalls. Right then and there, she asked the athletes on her flight if they would write some "advice for life" taken from their sporting experience.

The result was a unique "book of wisdom," similar to those she had compiled for two of her three older children, using different sources.

But Mednick – whose home office, with its neatly filed clippings and well-utilized wall space, attests to her organizational skills – was not content to stop there. What a shame, she thought during the stop-over in Hawaii, that the words of Canada's top athletes would be accessible only to her family.

With support from the bid staff, Mednick and a small delegation approached Canadian publisher McClelland & Stewart Ltd. about the idea of a book of reminiscences by Canadian athletes.

After a two-hour meeting, Mednick – a lawyer (and a speech and drama teacher) by training – had only five weeks to collect the stories that apear in Heroes in our Midst.

"I came out of the meeting tremendously excited and scared out of my wits."

By the end of the five weeks, Mednick and co-editor Wendy Thomas had 160 stories, 110 of which appear in the book.

Not surprisingly, Mednick is reluctant to name a favourite piece. "Depending on what I need at the moment, there's a story for each mood."

When the book was launched on Sept. 17, Mednick – agonizing over the appropriateness of going ahead with the event in the wake of the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon – recalled International Olympic Committee member Paul Henderson's story about the murder of Israeli athletes in Munich 29 years ago in the Tough Choices chapter.

Henderson, then a member of the Canadian sailing team, consulted with Jewish teammate Allan Liebel, who is now a lawyer, he wrote.

Liebel's advice, wrote Henderson, was, "We should be racing today, and the Games must immediately go on. If we stop, the terrorists, whose only raison d'être is to disrupt normal behaviour, win! I have always governed my life by that day."

Mednick also mentioned the 13 stories written by Paralympians, including Jewish swimming gold medalist Rebecca Bornemann, who has cerebral palsy. "When I ever bemoan any circumstances I may have, I look to these stories," she said.

Robin Mednick, co-editor of Heroes in our Midst, is seen with speed skater and book contributor Gaetan Boucher.

The chapter Get Back on the Horse begins with a poignant reminiscence by runner Patrick Jarvis, who lost part of an arm in a childhood accident. The advice of his "gruff old" surgeon inspired the chapter's title, and underscored his story about the feelings he experienced during his first attempt to play football after his accident.

Mednick has always had a passion for the Olympics. The mother of four teenagers, she volunteered for the bid committee for a year before being offered the job.

As a university student, she was on the cross-country ski team at the University of Toronto as an undergraduate, and rowed at Oxford University where she earned an MA in politics and economics before attending Osgoode Hall Law School. These days, she keeps fit by walking and downhill skiing.

Winning isn't always about bringing home the gold medal, Mednick said, referring to some of the stories that have messages about sportsmanship and the joy of sport.

"There's such accomplishment in knowing you did the job. That, to me, is what makes these people heroes."

Mednick was also struck by the humility of the athletes, as well as their courage, strength and struggles.

"That, to me, is what makes the book so compelling."

Some of the stories make her cry, and others make her laugh, she said.

Proceeds from the book, which sells for $26.99, are being donated to the Foundation for Athletes and Sports Training to benefit junior developing athletes.

Thornhill teen actress learns the facts of life

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Golden Globe and Academy Award winning actress Mercedes Ruehl made 14-year-old Mallory Margel of Thornhill, Ont., cry on the set of their upcoming television movie, Guilt By Association... and the young actress was thrilled about it.

"Mercedes actually taught me to cry," Margel says. "She told me to think of something sad that was close to my heart and not hold back my emotions – just let it out. That really helped me and it works. I really learned a lot from her."

Guilt by Association, which is the first television movie for the U.S. cable network Court TV, will air in the new year.

"It is a drama about family struggles," says Margel, who plays Ruehl's daughter in the film. "The mother's boyfriend is dealing drugs and said the mother was involved to get his sentence reduced [and] the mom is sent to jail for 20 years."

Margel, a Grade 9 student at Vaughan Secondary School, says that filming Guilt by Association was a new experience for her.

"Guilt by Association is very different from most of the movies I've done in the past, because I usually do comedy," she says. "The atmosphere is a lot more serious – it isn't funny all the time like the comedy sets. I really enjoy doing both."

Margel got her start in community theatre at CharActors Theatre Troupe under the direction of Shari Quallenberg, who now acts as her agent. Her first acting job was for a Kool-Aid commercial 3½ years ago. Since then, she has appeared in numerous television commercials and on Sharon, Lois and Bram's Skinnamarink TV, a music video for singer Shawn Colvin, the made-for-television movie Trapped in a Purple Haze, starring Jo Beth Williams, Colm Fiore and Hayden Christian, who will be starring as Anakin Skywalker in the next Star Wars movie. Margel wishes she were still in touch with the handsome actor, who now lives in Los Angeles.

On the big screen, Margel has acted in the 1999 film Superstar with Saturday Night Live's Molly Shannon and Loser, starring Mena Suvari, Greg Kinnear and Dan Aykroyd. Her most recent credit is The Facts of Life Reunion, in which she plays Jo's daughter Jamie Bonner, who comes to the Peakskill, N.Y., reunion without her mother, who is working as a police officer in Los Angeles.

For those who remember the original series, it is almost uncanny how much the real-life soft-spoken Margel looks and acts like the tough-talking Jo.

"My mom used to watch the show, so when I had the audition, she helped me," Margel says. "The cast was so friendly – Lisa Welchel, Kim Fields and Mindy Cohn really took care of me. On set was great, we were joking all the time."

Margel, who took improv classes at Second City last year, says she likes acting because she gets to play a variety of different characters so unlike herself without worrying about what people think. Though she will sing if a role calls for it, she considers herself an actress and dancer and hopes to make acting her career (secondary choices are working as a director or casting director). She would like to act in more theatre roles, but feels her niche is in film and television.

The teenage thespian enjoys meeting new friends in the business.

"At auditions you meet lots of kids that share the same interest as you," she says. "I'm not competitive with them at all. I'm happy when they get a role, too."

Under the watchful eyes of her parents, Margel is putting her acting income away. Her biggest expenditure to date is a computer, though she admits she's not really a computer person and finds it hard to learn.

Besides acting, her other passion is shopping for retro clothes. Her favourite line is Miss Sixty.

A BITTERSWEET DRAMA, WALKING TO RUSSIA DEBUTS IN JANUARY

Jonathan Garfinkel, whose first play Walking to Russia is set to debut in January, is a Toronto poet whose works have appeared in numerous literary journals, including Parchment, the annual journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing. He is playwright-in-residence of the Blyth Festival.

Theatre Asylum, which is presenting the play, calls it a "bittersweet drama" and "a poetic and cathartic voyage through the nature of memory." The story concerns an elderly Jewish couple who is haunted by the spirit of their lost daughter.

Garfinkel says it was partly inspired by the experiences of his grandparents who emigrated from Russia to Winnipeg. The elderly Jewish couple are played by Aron Tager and Anne Tager Page, who are married in real life as well.

Theatre Passe Muraille Backspace, 16 Ryerson Ave. $18-$25. Previews Jan. 10 and 11; the play runs Jan. 12 to Jan. 27. 416-504-7529.

Literary Corner: These four worthy books would have been featured on our recent Chanukah Gifts books pages had space permitted. All will satisfy adult readers, but the first is intended especially for children.

Stories and Poems for Extremely Intelligent Children of All Ages, selected by Harold Bloom, is geared for youngsters whose parents wisely restrict television watching and Internet surfing. The editor's thesis is that children are best prepared for Shakespeare, Chekhov, Jane Austen and Henry James if they have first sampled Lewis Carroll, Edward Lear, Robert L. Stevenson, Rudyard Kipling and scores of other authors included in this imaginative anthology.

Bloom, a Yale professor, holds that much of modern academia has been tainted by political polemics; he has, accordingly, chosen small works by Melville, Tolstoy, Wharton, Whitman and others, mostly from the 19th century or earlier. The book is suitable for all readers prepared to give time to their reading, to think as they read, and to absorb some grand and classical concepts of life as they go along (Scribner).

It's a truism that great readers make great writers – or, as Stephen King observes in On Writing: A Memoir of the Craft, "If you don't have the time to read, you don't have the time or the tools to write."

On Writing seems almost as crafty and entertaining as any of King's novels. Besides offering much practical advice, he gives us fascinating insights into how he wrote books like Carrie and The Shining. In a final, intensely personal chapter, he tells how he was sideswiped by a reckless driver and almost killed while walking near his home. This happy marriage of two genres – how-to guide and autobiography – is yet another great page-turner from King (Scribner).

The story behind the composition and publication of English literature's most famous and thorough biographies is the subject of Boswell's Presumptuous Task: Writing the Life of Dr. Johnson, by Adam Sisman.

Boswell's Life of Dr. Johnson is the gold standard of biographies; Sisman has, in turn, produced what may be the gold standard of backstories behind the making of a literary landmark. The book offers a riveting account of Boswell's reverence for Johnson and his troubled relations with his own father; and Johnson's fatherly affection towards Boswell, whom he openly encouraged as his biographer. It also details how the younger writer knocked his subject from the standard lofty pedestal and forever revolutionized the art of English biography (Penguin paperback).

Since Jane Austen has been the focus of a resurgence of popular interest over the past decade, Carol Shields's new biographical study, Jane Austen, may find the wide audience it deserves. Shields displays a rich and intimate knowledge of Austen's life and works, and brings us many fresh and remarkable insights. The book is also a compelling meditation on how great fiction is created (Viking).

Director returns to the stage for Walking To Russia

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — The world premiere of Walking To Russia, a play by Jonathan Garfinkel, begins its run at Theatre Passe Muraille on Jan. 12.

The play, which takes place in Winnipeg, is about an elderly Jewish couple, Ben and Bella Berck, who are in a disagreement: Bella wants to move to California, but Ben wants to move to Churchill, a town in northern Manitoba. Just as Ben is offered a job and a chance at a Nobel Prize if he moves immediately to Churchill, the couple's daughter, Masha, who disappeared 30 years ago at the age of 19, reappears as a post modern dybbuk.

"Ben is an environmental scientist, a Marxist who hides from his daughter the fact that he is a Jew, but his wife wants to identify herself as a Jew and looks for a place where she can attend services," says artistic director of Theatre Asylum Jennifer Herzman Capraru.

"[Masha] carries a message which is directed to all Jewish Russian descendents, including those who are assimilated," Capraru says.

"The language Masha speaks is poetic and emotional, but before she arrives, the Bercks are portrayed in naturalistic dialogue which brings out the best in Jewish humour without being sterotypical. They have genuinely funny scenes."

Walking to Russia marks the return of Theatre Asylum and its artistic director to the Toronto stage. Capraru, who took three years off to pursue filmmaking, says her "first love is theatre and I can't afford to stay with it unless I have another source of income."

Capraru has directed Theatre Passe Muraille's production of Gut Girls, a play about the exploitation of women in British stockyards, as well as its production of My Mother's Courage, which she describes as a "bridge" to her interest in Jewish themes and to Theatre Asylum's commitment to Jewish plays, as well as dramas about women.

Jennifer Herszman Caparu

"I studied theatre directing in Germany, and there is no more important place for a Jew than Germany," Caparu, who is a Jew of Romanian descent, says. "I met George Tabori there, the author of My Mother's Courage. He is 85 now, but still writing, and I plan to direct one or more of his plays here."

The play's cast includes the real life couple, Aron Tager, and his wife, Ann Tager Page, who play the Bercks, and Susannah Hoffman, also a Jew of Romanian descent, who plays Masha.

Tager is a talented artist whose real paintings are credited to Masha, who is an artist.

"I directed Elizabeth Shepherd as the woman who goes to Auschwitz in My Mother's Courage and I've done the same with Ann Tager Page, who is not Jewish, to make them real, not stereotypical Jewish women," Caparu says.

Jonathan Garfinkel

Garfinkel, 28, is the playwright-in-residence at the Blyth Festival and has collaborated on three Paul Thompson collectives. His poetry has appeared in literary journals across Canada, including Descant and Parchment.

Walking to Russia, his first play, is partially inspired by his Russian grandmother who immigrated to Winnipeg before the Holocaust and his grandfather who was an environmental scientist.

Walking to Russia begins 18 performances on Jan. 12. For tickets and more information, call the box offfice at 416-504-7529.

Civilization and the Jews now on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

After more than 20 years, the landmark PBS television series, Heritage: Civilization and the Jews, hosted by former Israeli foreign minister Abba Eban, has finally arrived on video.

This comprehensive history of the Jewish people was originally telecast as a nine-part miniseries and covers Jewish existence from biblical times to the modern era.

The series is a sweeping historical journey that follows the Jewish people from the time of Abraham through the Exodus and the glory times of David and Solomon to the destruction of the First and Second Temples. It then accompanies the Jews into exile, into the Golden age in Spain, through the farthest reaches of Eastern Europe and the death camps of the Holocaust; and to the creation of the State of Israel.

The series is available on both VHS and DVD, with the DVD release including a bonus CD-ROM that contains historical documents, maps and explanatory essays and a fully searchable index, all from the Encyclopaedia Judaica.

The series was highly praised when it was first broadcast and won a number of prizes, including the coveted Peabody Award.

On VHS, it comes in a five-cassette boxed set. On DVD, it comes in a three-disc boxed set

Abba Eban himself has said the Heritage: Civilization and the Jews project: "is a matter of profound importance... audiences in the U.S. and around the world, both Jews and non-Jews, can now experience, through television and new technologies, the long, continuous, sombre, sometimes tragic, yet noble story of the Jewish journey across the theatre of history."

This series is available now in video stores or from Morningstar Entertainment Inc. in Toronto.

Musical, magical Louisiana certainly worth exploring

BY BRAM EISENTHAL
Special to The CJN

SHREVEPORT, La — When you think of Louisiana, many images spring to mind. Hot, sweaty days. Picturesque, glassy-surfaced bayous. Crawfish. Voodoo. Anne Rice. And of course there's the music. Creole and Cajun, jazz and blues – intermingling into a mesmerizing sound that follows you everywhere, with the ghosts of Louis Armstrong and Leadbelly leading the parade.

If you're extremely limited with your time, New Orleans is the place to go. But if you've got more at your disposal, you should start your exploration in Shreveport.

The blues mecca that inspired Jelly Roll Morton to write the Shreveport Stomp, this is where the one and only Leadbelly walked the streets, playing the blues, in the early 1900s.

Tabby Thomas, owner of Tabby's Blues Box, a local club that features the finest blues anywhere. [Bram Eisenthal photo]

Consider beginning your journey at the Hollywood Casino and Hotel, a glitzy, Las Vegas-style establishment that attracts gamblers and tourists alike, especially from throughout the so-called "ARK-LA-TEX" region.

While the old legends are long gone, you can still catch latter-day greats doing their thing at James Burton's Rock N' Roll Café.

Recently inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, Burton is still thriving musically, which he recently demonstrated in a memorable jam session for a group of tourists. The guitarist backed up Ricky Nelson, toured with Elvis from 1969 until his untimely death in 1977, and also played with the likes of Buffalo Springfield, John Denver, Roy Orbison and Elvis Costello.

A veritable field of dreams is found at the Municipal Auditorium, a 1929 art deco building that was home to the Louisiana Hayride.

This legendary show ran from 1948 to 1960 and attracted many top-line entertainers of the day. But its most famous personality played there from every Saturday from October 1954 to April 1955. Walk inside and stand on stage on the X that marks the very spot Elvis rocked packed houses.

Baton Rouge is also quite historic, but few of its tales are more compelling than the ones about former governor Huey Long, one of the more charismatic and flamboyant politicians in American history. He had hoped to become president some day, but his assassination ended those dreams.

Stop into the old Governor's Mansion, now a heritage site. The man who built it and lived there just prior to Long, governor Jimmy Davis, was renowned in his own right and musical to boot. Davis, who wrote You Are My Sunshine, died recently at age 101.

At night, head to Tabby's Blues Box, a local club that features the finest blues anywhere, courtesy of the venerable Tabby Thomas. The chow's not bad, either, but it's the music – Tabby calls it Hoodoo – that's food for the soul at this jammin' joint. Thomas plays a mean piano and his band, the Swamp Cats, always leaves patrons boogying into the wee hours.

From Baton Rouge, take the drive to Lafayette, home of the famous Festival International de Louisiane. This free outdoor event is held in the spring just prior to the Louisiana Heritage Fair (or Jazz Festival) in New Orleans. In addition to local legends like Allen Toussaint, you may even discover some new Canadian talent, such as PEI's fledgling girl band, Celtitude.

Take the family to the Vermillion-ville Acadian/Creole Tourist Center for a taste of what life was like here for the area's pioneers. It's a recreation of an Acadian village and an entertainment complex in one.

Finally, there's New Orleans, which is a story in itself. Soak in the atmosphere, for it's unlike any other place else in the world. To experience something very unique, albeit a bit macabre, you won't want to miss a jazz funeral – should someone pass on while you're in town, that is. They won't simply arrange it for you.

Sylvester "Hawk" Francis operates the unusual Backstreet Cultural Museum, at 1116 St. Claude St. (504-525-1733). His exhibits showcase the history of jazz funerals and other customs. In Louisiana, even death is a reason for musical celebration.

Jewish couple in Mephisto faces life-and-death dilemma

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — In 1941 Germany, when the Nazi policy of Judenrein was in full swing, Magnus Gottschalk had to decide whether to leave his Jewish wife or give up his role as a lead actor of the Peppermill Theatre.

On the night before the Gestapo was to arrest the couple, Gottschalk decided to die with his wife in front of a speeding train.

The couple is portrayed in the Equity Showcase Theatre production of Mephisto, a story about Jews being hounded out of their jobs in Berlin in the late '30s and early '40s.

The play ran recently at Studio Theatre, Harbourfront.

Alan Rosenthal, who played Gottschalk, said, "It was a role that came close to my own roots."

In Mephisto, Lorraine Sinclair plays a famous Jewish actor who emigrates to Russia.

Allan Aarons plays Knurr, Peppermill's stage doorman and caretaker, who though German by birth, is persecuted because of his belief in true socialist ideals.

Michael Battell, Equity publicist, said "Mephisto was unusual in that there were 20 people on stage at one time for most of the play. All the actors had to go through a rigorous audition schedule."

Director Bruce Pitkin, a Torontonian, first came across Mephisto while on an educational scholarship in Germany, and read the novel by Klaus Mann in the original German to improve his knowledge of the language.

The Academy Award-winning movie of the same name starred Klaus Maria Brandauer in 1981.

Pitkin said he was intrigued with Mephisto, but it took him seven years to bring it to Canada.

"Gottschalk's wife (acted by Catherine McGregor) was a Jewish revolutionary activist, and it was made clear to Gottschalk that he would retain his leading role in the theatre if he ditched her," said Pitkin.

"He decides to die with her so that they [could] leave a legacy to other artists."

Knurr, the stage doorman, is still alive at the end of the play (he refuses to give testimony on behalf of Gottschalk) "but his eyes are open to the reality, and to the role of the artist in society," said Pitkin.

Productions of Mephisto were revived in New York, and one, under the direction of Tim Robbins, is still running in Los Angeles.

Equity Showcase's next production is The Road by British playwright Jim Cartwright, running Feb. 12 to 24.

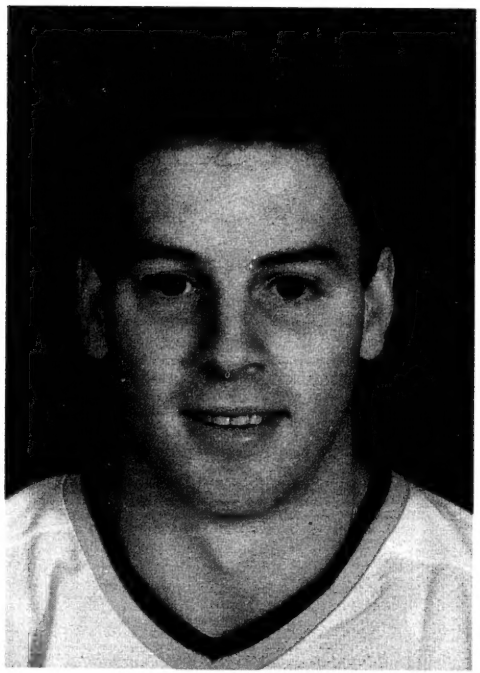
Jewish skaters reach for the hockey heights

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — As a wise poet once stated, "A man's reach should exceed his grasp or what's a heaven for."

Well, in terms of those who would aspire to loftier goals, there are now several Jewish hockey players labouring diligently in the minor leagues whose prime goal in life is to perform under the big tops of Los Angeles and New York, instead of in outposts like Peoria or Dayton.



Steve Dubinsky

Thus far only a handful of Jewish skaters have managed to succeed and obtain a seat on the NHL gravy train. The rest of the crowd is still jostling to mount the station platform.

Thirty-two-year-old Mathieu Schneider is a King these days, not only because he plays defence in the National Hockey League with Los Angeles, but also because he earns a monarch's ransom of $2 million per season to patrol the blue line and quarterback the power play.

The 2000-01 season he enjoyed in California was his best in seven years. Following a miserable two-year stint with the New York Rangers, the 14-year veteran who stands 5-foot-10 and weighs 192 pounds scored 16 goals and added 35 assists. Very impressive numbers for a rear-guard.

Schneider is personable, articulate and friendly, and he identified proudly with being a member of the Jewish faith.

In the early '90s when he played for Montreal, a Buffalo Sabre player once referred to him as a "Jew boy." From that juncture on, Schneider made a point of checking him hard into the boards on a regular basis.

His father Sam, who was a youth hockey coach, taught his son how to play the game with an edge. Not dirty, but physical.

His mom, Aline, is a French-Canadian who converted to Judaism when she married. Although now divorced, she continues to identify as a Jew.

Schneider, who has also played in the NHL with Toronto and the Islanders in his 13 seasons, is married with a son who is a few months old. As his mom did, his bride is preparing for conversion.

Centre/left-winger Jeff Halpern of the Washington Capitals is an evolving talent whom many teams covet. The 25-year-old, now in his third season in the NHL, established himself primarily as a quality checking-line specialist. Now he is being perceived as a player with good hands and a bit of a scoring touch.

The Princeton grad popped 21 goals last season to go with 21 assists and he enjoyed a plus-minus rating of plus-13. He is described by an appreciative management as "having outstanding defensive instincts and flawless penalty killing ability."

The 6-foot, 195-pound native of Potomac, Md., earns $510,000 per season. Not bad for a guy who was never drafted. Instead, he signed as a free agent in March 1999.

Centre-right winger Steve Dubinsky, 31, was an unrestricted free agent last summer following a stint with the Blackhawks. In 60 games, he scored six goals and added four assists.

Not overly impressive numbers, but the 6-foot,190-pound skater is known as a grinder and a solid face-off centre in the NHL. It is those attributes that have helped him to spend parts of eight seasons in the bigs.

Dubinsky has played part of the season on loan to Norfolk of the American Hockey League.

As for the wannabes, they abound.

Left-winger Max Birbraer was snapped up by New Jersey in the third round of the 2000 draft. In Albany last season he scored seven goals and added six assists in 50 games.

The former Ontario Hockey Association, tier 2 junior is Kazakhstan-born and a former member of the senior Israeli team at the 1997 IIHF Pool D championships. He helped the team win its first-ever gold medal in international competition.

He lived in Israel for a time, and while many parents attend the celebrated hockey draft and shed their tears in the arena seats, Max's parents did their sobbing back in Israel.

He is a solid 6-foot-2 and weighs 195 pounds. He has the size and speed to play any style. The Devils consider him a serious prospect.

Other prospects in the AHL to watch for are David Hymovitz at Grand Rapids, Michael Henrich, a former Oiler first round selection now playing in Hamilton, goalie Greg Gardner in Syracuse, Andrew (Bubba) Berenzweig in Milwaukee, and Jeff Dessner with the Chicago Wolves.

In the East Coast Hockey League, be on the lookout for the likes of Shawn Mamane at Peoria, Sandy Cohen in Reading and Aaron Fox at Richmond.

The United Hockey League features Harold Hersh of Quad Cities and Aaron Vicker, a netminder with the Missouri River Otters.

Jamie Sokolsky, a fine defenceman, is with Long Beach of the West Coast Hockey League.

At the major junior hockey level are Eric Himelfarb and goalie Robert Gherson with the Sarnia Sting, Cory Pecker in Erie with the Otters, and Adam Henrich (Michael's brother) with the Brampton Battalion.

A rebirth of Jewish hockey talent, you think?

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

A guy at school recently invited me to a movie. I like him, and normally I would have said yes right away. The problem is, a few weeks ago he broke up with my best friend. Does that make it wrong for me to go out with him? Would I be betraying her trust? Please help me, I don't know what to do.

Confused

Dear Confused,

You need to be honest with your friend right from the start. Explain the situation to her, and tell her how you feel about this guy. It may be difficult to talk to her about it, but the longer you keep it secret from her, the harder it will become.

Ask her how she feels about your going out with this guy. She may still be getting over her break-up and it's possible that seeing you with him will cause her to be more upset. On the other hand, they may have had a good break-up and are still friends. In that case, she may be happy to see you with him, because she knows that it will make you happy.

It is also important that you think about the reasons he and your friend broke up. It's possible that there are things about him you don't know, and maybe he's not a good guy for you to be with. Your friend might have some of these answers for you.

Only you can decide the right thing to do. You need to take some time and think about all your options before coming to any decision. Think about how you would feel if you were in your friend's position. Would you want her to go out with someone you just broke up with? If the answer is no, then you should probably say no to the guy as well. It is more important to keep a good relationship with your friend. Remember, even if you do say no, there will be many more guys in the future.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.
